THE SABBATH-KEEPING CHURCH AT NATTON, ENG.

By the Editor.

The Natton Church is situated near Tewkesbury, in the west of England, about ninety miles from London, thirty-five from Birmingham, and fifteen from Gloucester. The exact time of its organization is not now known. It is certain, however, that it existed as early as 1660; and it is quite probable, that there were Sabbath-keepers in that region as early as 1640, who were prevented from forming a regular separate gospel church by the unsettled condition of the country, and their own exposure to persecution.

The first pastor of the Natton Church of whom any tolerable account can now be given, was Mr. JOHN PURSER, who is spoken of as a very worthy man and a great sufferer for conscience's sake. It seems that he was descended from an honorable family and was heir to a considerable estate, but that his father disinherited him because he kept the seventh day as the Sabbath. Notwithstanding this wrong, it pleased God to bless him abundantly in the little he had. He became a reputable farmer, and lived at Asston-upon-Carrant, in the parish of Ashchurch, in the county of Gloucester, during the reigns of Charles and James the Second. In common with other nonconformists, he suffered much for his religion. One instance is mentioned in which his persecutors came upon him while he was ploughing in the field, and took from him his team. A person who was present said, "Don't let them have the plough and the hatchet;" to which Mr. Purser replied, "Let them have all." The laws at that time were very severe against the Dissenters, and it was customary to take any thing which could be found for the payment of fines. Not unfrequently the officers went far beyond the law, and were made to suffer for it. Such was the case in this instance; for one William Surman, Esq., a conformist, but a man who saw the cruelty and injustice of depriving an honest man of his property in that way, took his part, and obliged his adversaries to return the property to Mr. Purser. Other instances of his difficulties from his religion are mentioned, and it is a general tradition that he suffered much during the persecutions between 1660 and 1690. But after enduring all with cheerfulness and resignation, he came out of the furnace doubly refined.

It is probable that Mr. Purser began to preach about 1660, but was not ordained until some years later. In the mean time, a Mr. Cowell was the chief preacher at Natton, who published a book called "The Snare Broken," which occasioned considerable uneasiness between the observers of the first day and of the seventh day. Mr. C. is spoken of as somewhat unstable and wavering, which might have occasioned in part the difficulty. After his death, which occurred July 31, 1680, (as we learn from his tomb-stone at Tewkesbury,) a more peaceable state of things prevailed, and Mr. Purser took the principal charge of the church. At that time the congregation was widely scattered. The principal place of meeting was at Mr. Purser's house at Asston, but other meetings were held at different places within a range of twenty-five miles. Although Mr. P. kept his farm, and reared up a large family, yet he served the church faithfully in the ministry. While his hands were industriously occupied, his heart was much upon things above. Indeed, he tells us, that while his hands guided the plough, it was common for him to enjoy much of the divine presence, as was the case with many of the most worthy ministers of that time. One source of our information says, that "all his children walked in his steps, and many of his grand-children." Many of the following generation, however, adopted the first day for the sake of convenience, and are now members of the different Baptist churches. Mr. Purser was unable to preach for some time before his death, which occurred about 1720.

Mr. EDMUND TOWNSEND succeeded Mr. Purser in the pastoral care of the church. He was a plain man, but much respected for his integrity and sincerity. Soon after his ordination he was sent as a Messenger to the Sabbath-keeping churches in London. He labored there for a time with the Mill Yard Church; and then, in 1727, accepted a call to the pastoral care of the Cripplegate Sabbath-keeping Church, which had been left destitute by the death of Joseph Stennett. [A farther account of him will be given hereafter.]

When Mr. Townsend left Asston, there were two young men in the church who exercised their gifts and gave promise of great usefulness—Mr. PHILIP JONES and Mr. THOMAS BOSTON. Mr. Jones was chosen pastor of the church, and discharged the duties of that office until his death in 1770—a period of nearly fifty years. He lived for several years at Cheltenham, preaching sometimes there, then at Asston, Natton, Paxford, and other towns, for the purpose of accommodating members living at each of those places. In 1731 he removed to Upton, but continued his ministry in different places. To serve the church in this way, he went through many difficulties, sometimes traveling in the worst weather, and at other times running great risks from the floods of the Severn and Avon. Yet inconveniences and dangers seldom detained him from the meetings, when duty called. "His character at Natton is, that he was a holy man of God, and a great and lively preacher of the Gospel; but few were better acquainted with the Scriptures, for, whatever his subject was, he could have chapter and verse to prove the whole. In short, he was a living concordance; a man of unblemished character; a sincere friend, and a faithful reprover, but always in the spirit of meekness. Perhaps but a few living had a greater command over the passions than he had."

Before Mr. Jones died, in 1770, Mr. THOMAS HILLER, his nephew, was chosen pastor of the Baptist Church in Tewkesbury, near Natton. He was a Sabbath-keeper in opinion and practice, and was therefore invited to serve the Sabbath-keeping Church at the same time that he remained pastor of the first-day Baptist Church. He accepted the invitation, and continued to minister to both churches until his death a few years ago. His ministry is spoken of in a record before us, as having been "successful at Natton as well as at Tewkesbury." In what form that success was seen, we know not. We simply know, that the church at Natton, of which it is said, that in the early ministry of Mr. Jones "the members were rather numerous, and not many years ago the numbers were thirty," has now become a mere handful of Sabbath-worshippers, in the greatest need of spiritual strength and encouragement. That Mr. Hiller was a man of worth, no one can doubt, who has seen in what veneration he is held by his former parishioners. That he felt deeply interested in both the churches of which he was pastor, is evident from his remembrance of them both in his last hours. But we must think, that the history of his connection with the Sabbath-keeping church in Natton proves, what was equally well proven by the history of Samuel Stennett's connection with the Sabbath-keeping church in London, that no man can successfully serve two masters. A minister of the Gospel, who is at the same time pastor of one church worshiping on the seventh day of the week, and another church worshiping on the first day of the week, can never be faithful to them both.

Since the death of Mr. Hiller the congregation at Natton has been without a pastor. It has, however, enjoyed on the Sabbath the assistance of a worthy Baptist brother from Tewkesbury, in whose company we attended a Sabbath service there, at which eight or ten persons were present.

It is in place here to state, that in 1746, Mr. Benjamin Purser, the youngest son of Rev. John Purser before mentioned, purchased an estate in the village of Natton, where the meetings had formerly been held only at irregular intervals. He there fitted up, at his own expense, a chapel adjoining his house for divine worship. It is a small room, with a boarded floor, a pulpit, one pew, a row of benches, a communion table, and a small gallery. He also walled in a corner of his orchard for a burying ground. When he died, in 1765, he left the meeting house and burying ground to the church, together with five pounds a year out of his estate to all succeeding ministers. He was a worthy benefactor of the church, and died at the age of sixty-nine years, much lamented by all who knew him. At the present time the congregation is so small that the chapel is not used for regular Sabbath services. It is opened on occasions of special interest, such as a funeral. It also serves as the depository for a small collection of old books, in brushing the dust from which, Mr. Black and myself found employment, amusement, and profit.

THE BIBLE.

A single book has saved me; but that book is not of human origin. Long had I despised it, long had I deemed it a class-book for the credulous and ignorant; until, having investigated the Gospel of Christ, with an ardent desire to ascertain its truth or falsity, its pages offered to my inquiries the sublimest knowledge of man and nature, and the simplest, and at the same time, the most exalted system of moral ethics. Faith, hope, and charity, were enkindled in my bosom; and every advancing step strengthened me in the conviction, that the morals of this book are as superior to human morals, as its oracles are superior to human opinions. [M. L. Bautain.

THOMAS A KEMPIS, author of the Imitation of Christ, was born at the little village of Kempen, near Cologne, in the year 1380—the son of an ordinary mechanic. His name was Thomas Littlehammer (Hamerken)—the a. Kempis, or von Kempen, designating his birth-place. He lived a retired and quiet life, writing devotional works, and copying valuable books—the art of printing not being then known. He wrote a beautiful hand, and took great delight in beautiful manuscripts. An elegant copy of the Bible in four volumes, and select works of St. Bernard, written out by his own hand, are still preserved at St. Agnes, where he died at the age of 91.

THE DEATH-BED.

BY THOMAS HOOD.

We watched her breathing through the night,
Her breathing soft and low,
As on her breast the wave of life
Kept heaving to and fro.

So silently we seemed to speak,
So slowly moved about,
As we had lent her half our powers,
To eke her being out.

Our very hopes belied our fears,
Our fears our hopes belied;
We thought her dying when she slept,
And sleeping when she died.

For when the morn came dim and sad,
And chill with early showers,
Her quiet eyelids closed;—she had Another morn than ours.

THE BIBLE IN COLLEGES.

Rev. Dr. Humphreys, who has been the President of Amherst College since the year 1823, until his late resignation, stated, at the inauguration of his successor, that the institution during that time, had enjoyed seven special revivals of religion; and that no class had yet graduated, without passing through one or more of these refreshings from on high. Of seven hundred and sixty-five students who had graduated, four hundred were now in the ministry, or in a state of preparation for it—one hundred of whom were settled pastors in that State, thirty were foreign missionaries, and the others were scattered through seventeen States of the Union.

These facts illustrate the importance, in seats of learning, of systematic religious instruction, drawn directly from the Bible, the fountain of unmingled truth and purity. This College has from its infancy honored the Book of God above all other books, not only by using it at morning and evening public devotions, but by employing it regularly as a text-book for careful study and recitation in all the classes. How long will it be ere the period arrive, in which those who believe in the tremendous realities of revelation, and who occupy the highest seats of moral influence, shall generally proceed with their charge under the full impression, that without the moral image of God, the mightiest human intellect can be nought but mightiest rebellion and suffering forever? And how long will it be ere all, who aspire to be truly great among men, shall, like Sir Matthew Hale, Sir William Jones, Sir Isaac Newton, and others, who have stood at the head of human kind, count it their highest honor and privilege to commune, through His Word, with the Infinite Source of all greatness and intelligence?

FOREIGN MISSIONS.

The Baptist Board of Foreign Missions held a meeting in Boston a short time ago, at which Rev. Mr. Dean, from China, delivered a very weighty and earnest discourse on the erroneous impressions which exist in regard to Foreign Missions. The following report of the discourse is from the Boston Morning Chronicle:—

He was glad, he said, to find, as he thought, an increasing disposition among his brethren, to put their attachment for the cause of missions on the simple ground of Scriptural duty, and not rely on excitements and impulses, that die away almost as soon as they begin. He had no sympathy with this clamorous demand for some "interesting statements," which are relied upon to "stir up the people" to a little flashy liberality. When he met these things, he sighed to have them look to the Bible, and to the examples of Jesus Christ and the apostle Paul, to arouse a missionary spirit among the people.

He wished he could draw aside the drapery which distance throws over the work of missions, so as to show the naked reality as it is. That would do more to awaken a permanent interest in the cause, than all other statements. Many persons seem to think of missionaries as if they were a superior order of beings, or at least a very peculiar class of men, if not almost super-human. But it is not so. They belong to the same family with Christians in this country, and are peculiar beings in no sense except that in which all Christians are said to be a peculiar people. They suffer the same vicissitudes, are exposed to the same temptations, and subject to the same wants. People seem to think that missionaries are beyond the reach of the devil, and that the Christian warfare is at an end with them, and they have no longer occasion for self denial, and watchfulness, and prayer. But, my brethren, said he, rely upon it, there is no missionary road to heaven. We all have to travel the same road and fight against the same enemies, and conquer by the same weapons.

The trials of the missionaries are equally misapprehended. They are not the same that are felt at home. The anxiety is not, with them, what they shall eat or drink. He felt very little concern about that, although he had lived for months together without bread, and very seldom ate milk, or butter, or cheese, and lived in a bamboo house without windows and roofed with leaves. He did not reckon these among the trials, but could say that he enjoyed life as sweetly as at home. Neither are severe domestic afflictions, personal dangers, and such things, properly called missionary trials, for they are not peculiar to the missionaries. But the missionary has trials, such as, if he had foreseen when, ten years ago, he entered upon the work, he could not tell whether he should have had faith and zeal enough to encounter. But he would say, after them all, that he had never seen the day in which he had regretted his enlistment, and that not one promise of the gospel had ever failed.

The severest trial of all was to look upon some hundreds of millions of dying pagans, going to the grave without a Saviour and without hope, and to look upon plans proposed as inadequate in giving them the salvation of the gospel, and to feel compelled to relinquish all such endeavors, from the fact that the friends of Christ in this country, who had the means of executing, withhold their contributions. This thought rests more heavily than any other on the heart of a missionary.

He then gave some pretty plain suggestion in regard to the appointment of missionaries for the heathen. An idea seems to prevail, that no man should be a missionary unless he is specially imbued by the Holy Ghost, and so impressed with his duty to go, and to go to that particular field, that he will insist upon being sent there. Now, said he, these are just the men we don't want—men who have such strong impressions and so much conscience that they can only think one thought, and only go to one place, and only do one thing.

We want men of principle, who are willing to labor any where, and do any thing, for Christ's sake and the salvation of souls—Men of sober judgement, modest and humble, who will not force themselves on the board, but who think less of themselves than others think of them—men whom the board can tell to go to the heathen, and they will go, because they are called to go. He also begged them to consider that it costs as much to send out a fourth or fifth-rate man, and support him in the field, as to send and support a man of powerful mind and energetic character, who could do tenfold more good. He pointed out the bad policy of sending men who were deficient, or deformed, or inferior in appearance, and who would necessarily become a laughing stock to the heathen before ever they could show what was in their minds.

COMPLETENESS OF THE SAINT IN CHRIST.

We have often thought we should like to hear a sermon on that text, "And you are complete in Him." It is a great consolation, when weighed down beneath a sense of our own ignorance, weakness, sinfulness and unworthiness, to think of that text, "You are complete in Him." It is a good text for the poor and ignorant, the despised and the afflicted. You may be in want of every thing, but you are complete in Christ. You may be ignorant of every thing that the "self-approving world" calls knowledge, but if you love Christ, you are complete in him. You may be despised of the world, and your name cast out as evil, but if you are a child of God, the despite of the world cannot harm you, you are complete in Christ. Your friends may all be taken from you, or may all desert you, but you are not the less perfect for that; you are complete in Christ. Your property may be taken from you, and you may have to beg your bread, or to suffer from hunger and nakedness, but still you are complete in Christ; in him you are perfect and entire, wanting nothing. You may lose your health, may suffer with lingering and painful disease, may be helpless and bed-ridden, but still you are complete in Christ.

If you be a child of God, and stay yourself on Christ, nothing can take away from this completeness, nothing can diminish it. Nor can any thing add to it. If you had all the wealth of the Rothschilds, it would not make you any more complete in Christ. If you possessed all the thrones of Europe, or could sway the sceptres of the world, it would not add to your completeness in Christ. If you had all the learning of Scaliger, and all the genius of Milton, it could add nothing to the perfection of your character as a child of God; it could not make your robe whiter, or your roll brighter—it could not make you more complete in Christ. In him, and not in the world, are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. And ye are complete in him.

Let this be the saint's triumph and independence, that he is complete in Christ. Let him say within himself, as the gaudy shows of the world pass by him, well, after all, what matters it though I be so poor and ignorant; in Christ I have all riches and knowledge. What matters it who knows me here, or who knows me not, who cares for me here, or who despises me; if Christ deigns to know me, I am complete in Christ, I care not for anything else. I want nothing else, if Christ be made unto me of God my wisdom, my righteousness, my sanctification, my redemption.

Complete in Christ! O how delightful is the thought! There is nothing in this wide world that we need, but just Christ. We are perfectly independent of the world, in Christ. Though having nothing, we are possessing all things, in Christ. In him we have riches, food, drink, light and life. He is our bread, our wealth, our health, our sun, our shield, our rock, our refuge, our exceeding great reward. Let the Christian go about the world singing, Complete in Christ, Complete in Christ! [N. Y. Evan.

ANOTHER HOLY ROBE.—The Greek church is claiming in her turn the possession of a robe of the Saviour of mankind! A letter from Moscow says: "It is perhaps not known in Germany that, besides the holy tunic of Treves, we possess in our Cathedral of the Assumption a piece of the Lord's tunic. It is of linen cloth, of a yellowish color, and the fabric very coarse. After the conquest of Grusinie, the Shah took away this fragment from the church of Mzhat, and eventually presented it as a cadeau to the Czar Michael Foderowitch. A portion of it is still preserved in the imperial chapel of St. Petersburgh. At the baptism of every member of the Imperial Family, a small fragment is placed in the cross which is worn by all the true believers on their naked bosoms from the hour of their birth until their descent into the grave, as a sort of holy talisman!"

AN INTERESTING [illegible]ER.—When the celebrated Dr. Owen, [illegible] distinguished theologian of his age, [illegible] by Charles II., "how a learned man, su[illegible] was, could sit and listen to an illiterate tin[illegible]ke John Bunyan," he replied, "May it [illegible]your Majesty, could I possess that tink[illegible]es for preaching, I would most gladl[illegible] all my learning."

HEATHEN PRAYERS.

In several parts of India, a brahmin, or priest, goes down to the side of a river, and makes a god from the mud that lies on the banks. When he has formed it into a strange shape, he dries it in the sun; and then he prays to what his own hands have made. First he strikes his elbows against his sides, then he snaps with his fingers round about his head, stamps with his left foot on the ground, and beats his cheeks with the fingers of his left hand, whilst his lips mutter strange sounds. When he has finished his devotions, he takes his mud-god, carries it to the river, and throws it into the water from whence it first came. This is hea[illegible]

The people called Gallas, in Africa, worship a large tree, that grows on the side of one of their rivers. Crowds come from every part of the country, to ask of it every thing they desire. One asks for health; another, for money; another, for good crops; and another, that he may overcome his enemy. Only the men are allowed to present their prayers at this spot; for they suppose females are unworthy of the honor of praying to the great tree!

The Tartars have a praying machine. It is a round hollow box, fixed upright like a grindstone; a string leads from it to what is called a spindle. By treading on the spindle, the machine turns just like a grindstone, when men sharpen their knives. Now, in the inside of this box are rolled up long pieces of parchment, joined together, sometimes to the length of several hundred feet; on the parchment a prayer is written over and over again, perhaps as many as a thousand times. When the machine is set in motion, the parchment prayers are moved about, which they say pleases the gods, and brings down their blessing. The heathen thus make prayer by the wholesale, for they suppose every time the box moves round, as many prayers are offered as are written inside.

Every Chinese, when he goes to worship his idols, takes with him two painted candles, and receives from the priest in return, six slips of scented wood. He then bows his head to the ground, to let his god know that he is about to pray. Next he lays three of the pieces of wood on the altar, bows nine times, gives money to the priest, and retires. During this ceremony, a large gong or drum, is fiercely struck, so as almost to stun the people; this is done to call the attention of the god to the prayer that is offered. [Miss. Sketches.

FALSE SPIRITUALITY DETECTED.

That must be a false spirituality that gives to those who cherish it a distaste and disrelish, either for the study of the truths of the Bible, or for active labor in any department of God's vineyard where self-denying work is needed to be done. The truly spiritual man is earnestly intent on the investigation of Christian doctrine—and is ready to welcome, gratefully, the most humble post of duty and usefulness.

The man is most spiritual—is most under the influence of the Holy Spirit—who most readily apprehends and most cordially relishes the Christian doctrines, and who sees the spiritual beauties and glorious blessedness of duty doing, wherever the Providence of God places him.

The devout lady who thought herself wholly sanctified, and yet dared not attend a meeting where the claims of the enslaved were to be urged, lest she should lose her spirituality of mind, had yet to learn wherein true spirituality consists. And many who find fault with the self-denying pioneers of unpopular reforms, that they are not sufficiently spiritually-minded to be safe guides, betray their own standard of spirituality when they conveniently stand aloof from such labors, and select a less unpopular department of service, under the implied plea that they are too spiritual and heavenly minded to attend to such low matters. When they admit that a work of benevolence, or of reformation, needs to be done, yet think themselves too holy to help to do it, thus leaving the work in the hands of those whom they consider less spiritual than themselves—and then again adduce the low attainments of those who enlist in the work as an additional reason why they do not co-operate, there is evident injustice and inconsistency in their course. For seventeen years past, and in relation to the Temperance, Moral Reform, Anti-Slavery, and Church Reform enterprises, the developments just hinted at, have been continually witnessed. And it is quite remarkable that those who were too holy to do any thing for the inebriate and the enslaved when the cause was most grievously suffering for want of laborers, find their scruples to give way, and their spirituality to permit their co-operation, just in proportion as the heavy work has been done up, the sea become smooth, and the gale favorable. Just at the present time, it is held a sure symptom of a want of deep-toned spirituality, for a person to be earnestly intent on the discussion of church organization, lay ordination, and clerical caste. But there will be no want of spirituality in marching over the ground, and erecting triumphal arches, after the battle shall have been fought, the victory won, and the rubbish removed.

The spirituality that the cause of Christ needs, is that which can walk by faith, not sight; which can afford to suffer the loss of a reputation for spiritual-mindedness, which can seize fast hold of divine service for its exercise—which never needs to inquire whether a reformatory work will succeed, after it has ascertained that it is a work that God approves and man needs. To the truly spiritual man, the discovery of truth is the discovery of duty, and the discovery of success. To follow the right, and to follow the Saviour are one and the same thing. To serve humanity is to glorify God. To obey is to enjoy—the task-field is the temple—self-denial is the crown of glory, and the love and communion of God is the keeping of his commandments, without finding them grievous. [Goodell.

MOSHEIM pertinently remarks, 'After Christianity became incorporated with the government, it is difficult to determine whether Heathenism was most Christianized, or Christianity most heathenized.'

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, June 26, 1845.

THE PAST AND THE FUTURE.

We enter to-day upon the second volume of the Sabbath Recorder. In doing so, we cannot refrain from expressing our gratitude to God who has thus far smiled upon our undertaking, and to those friends who have encouraged us in carrying it forward. We knew well enough beforehand, that it was not an easy task so to conduct a denominational paper as to give it a character of its own, and at the same time furnish no just occasion of complaint to those who might differ from us. But notwithstanding the difficulty of the task, we ventured upon it, and have endeavored faithfully to meet it. Whether our endeavor has been crowned with success or not, we leave others to judge. It is sufficient for us to know, that if we have failed it has been from some other cause than a want of interest and diligence on our own part. It is perhaps needless to say, that the past year has been to us one of anxiety and toil, since this was to be expected in commencing a new enterprise which only assumed to be an experiment. We may also say, that the year has been one of many pleasures, for which we are indebted to the frank expressions of confidence from our friends, the growing interest in the discussion of the Sabbath question, and the certain indications that our own people are awaking to the importance and dignity of their mission. In view of these things, we can but feel grateful for the privileges of the past, and look forward hopefully to the labors of the future.

Our course during the coming year will be, we trust, consistent with what it has been during the past year. In regard to the subject of the Sabbath, it will be our aim to elucidate and enforce its claims, to mark and chronicle whatever movements may seem to us important in their bearings upon it, and to express our opinion fearlessly of those doctrines and measures which may be promulgated respecting it. At the same time, we shall not knowingly overlook any other important enterprise in which our fellow Christians are engaged; but shall speak freely, as we have heretofore done, of any and all the various benevolent and reformatory movements of the day—not shunning to rebuke that which may appear to us wrong, nor to identify ourselves with that which we judge to be right and true, whether such things are found in high places or low places. Thus doing, we hope to enjoy the continued support of our friends, and to carry about with us a conscience void of offence.

VALIDITY OF ROMAN CATHOLIC BAPTISM.

We have already announced that the Presbyterian General Assembly, at its late meeting in Cincinnati, Ohio, after much discussion, decided that baptism in the Roman Catholic Church is not valid. We have since been not a little amused, by reading the comments of Presbyterian, Episcopal, and Catholic papers, upon this decision. It seems to be conceded by them all, that the decision is one of considerable importance, both on account of its practical influence, and the spirit which it develops. But of its prudence and liberality very widely different views are taken.

As might have been expected, the Old School Presbyterian papers regard the decision as wise and needful—as a just rebuke to Romanism, and an act indispensable on the ground of consistency. The Assembly had, ten years ago, "declared the Papacy to be apostate from Christ, and no true Church." Hence a sort of necessity was laid upon it to deny the validity of those ordinances which had been administered by such apostates. And so the question became simply whether baptism by Rome is baptism according to the Presbyterian standards.

Now how does this strike Episcopalians? Let the following quotations answer the question. The organ of the high church party in New York, says, "The reverend divines do not attempt to prove their point by the Bible, their professed Rule of Faith, but are fain, spider-like, to spin it out of their own vitals." Again, "In disregard for express Scripture, it is a match for any article in the creed of Pius IV." Still again, "Their decision, in fine, is a development fresh from the mint of modern Romanism, which cuts free from Scripture and antiquity, and claims authority for no other reason than because it is a development."

But the Catholics object to the decision on very different grounds. They find fault with the position taken in the discussion, that Catholic baptism is defective in matter and defective in form—not baptism therefore in any sense, but an impious substitute for it. If this be true, say they, then John Calvin, who received the rite according to the Catholic Church, was never baptized; and so those who were baptized by Calvin, having received no baptism at all in any scriptural sense, were equally unqualified to baptize others, and this disqualification has thus been handed down in the Presbyterian Church from Calvin's day to the present time, and all their baptisms are invalid.

These facts are sufficient to show, that a spirit of inquiry is awake in regard to the questions at issue between Catholics and Protestants, which will not be put down by the mere ipse dixit of any body of men, however orthodox in their own estimation. The decisions of such ecclesiastical bodies as the Assembly will be tried by the avowed principles and practices of the men who compose those bodies. If, after all their pretensions of adherence to the Scriptures, they will, without a text of Scripture, unchurch a large portion of those who claim to be a part of the church as much as themselves, they must expect to be referred to their own professions. If, notwithstanding their charges against the Baptists of bigotry and uncharitableness, they carry out the very same principle, how can they expect to escape the censure which they have so liberally heaped upon others? For our own part, we are glad to see the discussion going on. We hope it may lead to greater watchfulness and consistency on the part of those who undertake to condemn others.

HINDRANCES TO EFFECTIVE PREACHING.

It is common to remark the correspondence of the religious character of a community with that of the occupant of its pulpit. The human mind is framed to be influenced by motives; and it is the business of a gospel preacher to bring these to bear in subduing the hearts of men. If he be himself characterized by the strength, fervor, and spirituality of his religious views, his words can hardly fail to exert a quickening and invigorating influence upon those who listen to them. If, on on the other hand, he be lax and enfeebled in spirit, with obscure moral perceptions, and a disingenuous heart, he will do little to hold in check the corruption and licentiousness to which human nature is constantly tending. The design of the Christian ministry, it should be remembered, is Remedial as well as Conservative; it is to remove evil as well as to foster and protect anything absolutely good. Yet from this high position, involving as it does the necessity of arduous labor, there is a constant tendency to descend. It is much more easy, with the wide world of theological speculation and mystery spread out before it, by culling the flowers which here and there bloom on the surface, to furnish the means of pleasurable excitement, than to speak to men of the appalling truths of Human Depravity and Divine Justice. Hence the multiplied and mournful instances of the apparent inefficiency of religous instruction. Hence the necessity that those whom it has pleased Heaven to send forth at intervals to reform and purify the Christian church, should renounce the position of mere ministers of religious recreation, and pursue such a course as will ensure for them the sustaining energy of the all-renovating Spirit.

A variety of influences are constantly at work to blunt the edge of religious truth, and prevent its natural effect upon the minds of men. Among these may be named the habit of indiscriminately discussing the ill-defined distinctions of metaphysical theology. It is a remarkable feature of this kind of speculation, that it affects in precisely the same manner entirely different classes of minds. The rude as well as the refined—the sinner not less than the saint—experiences a kind of intoxicating pleasure in contemplating the ingenuities of mystic exposition, and the enigmas of scholastic discussions. Yet even the most simple and ingenuous minds, though intent upon finding the truth, when they enter upon this field, where Scripture is set at defiance by sophistry, are in danger of losing all their symplicity in a warfare of logic. It is in reference to this, that a modern writer has hazarded the assertion, "that a long course of profane and reckless sensuality, does not more effectually obliterate from the heart its native awe of the Divine Authority, or its reverence for the justice, sanctity, and power of God, than does a thorough initiation in the brazen abstractions of the antique logical theology." Whenever a preacher of the Gospel, therefore, consents to take his stand on such ground, he surrenders the most effectual means of awakening the drowsy consciences of sensual religionists and dissolute sceptics.

Another of these influences may be found in the tendency of frequent repetition to conceal the thought which religious phrases were designed to convey. The truth of this is illustrated in the experience of every man who has struggled to maintain spiritual life. Nothing less than a constant and wakeful effort has enabled him to do it. But let this consideration be extended to congregations and communities. If the sincere and thoughtful, set free from the dissipating influence of showy assemblies, find it difficult to overcome this tendency, what else can be expected from those whose minds are already rendered callous by sensuality and stupid by indulgence, than that the heavy monotony which characterizes much of religious service, should add to their long-cherished and deadening insensibility? It cannot be doubted that this is a frequent consequence; and that the most solemn responses to religious truth—even such as are connected with prayer for divine help to obey it—are often given by the thoughtless tongues of those who would tremble at their own blasphemous act, if called upon to translate it into plain language. It behoves the preacher especially to beware of this tendency; and not until he can break up these incrustations, will the truth produce its full effect upon the naked and sensitive souls of men.

An unfeeling manner of presenting gospel truths has often robbed them of all their power. It is easy, in every department of human interest, to make affirmations in such form as to show our own want of belief in them, and thus prevent their natural effect. The danger of this is greatly increased when things spiritual are the theme. If he who speaks upon such a topic fails to indicate an apprehension somewhat proportioned to its intrinsic importance, no abstruse reasoning nor impassioned bursts of eloquence can supply this deficiency. He may vindicate the rigor of divine justice, and demonstrate the certainty of the final punishment of transgression, or paint with accumulated figures of terror the awful scenes of future retribution, and the words will fall powerless from his lips. The covetous man will continue to count his treasure; the ambitious man will plot the destruction of his rivals; and all will feel that in these pro-found sublimities or this vehement declamation there is no occasion for serious alarm or apprehension.

The means by which these influences are to be counteracted, and men prepared to speak efficaciously of the Divine Justice and its awful consequences, deserve the study of the religious teacher. The foundation for it is unquestionably to be laid in the condition of his own heart, and requires the presence of the rarest moral qualities. The first preparation for it is a clear perception of the coincidence of the different attributes of the Divine character. His justice and his love must be seen and felt to agree in their requirements. A mere intellectual conviction of this truth is not sufficient; there must be that deeper emotion, which language cannot describe, for which communion with the dread Majesty on high only can prepare the soul, and which the Father of Spirits only can convey.—A deep feeling of sympathy and compassion for sinful men is another essential element, This gains access to the human heart, disarms it of all prejudice, and imparts a tenderness and pathos and power to pursuasion, which secures effect for the truth. The bond of both these is furnished by an unwavering belief in the characteristic doctrines of the Gospel. If man be not exposed to future punishment, it is cruel to add to those smothered forebodings of conscience from which every natural mind strives to escape. If there be a future punishment, and yet no way of redemption, it were equally cruel and idle. A doubt of either of these truths, paralizes the heart, and brings the darkness of scepticism over the soul. But with a pervading conviction of the certainty of them both, their sincere and earnest enforcement can hardly fail to carry conviction to the darkest heart.

RELIGIOUS NEWSPAPERS.

That sermon which we spoke of some time ago, called, "A Plea for Religious Newspapers, by a Connecticut Pastor," contains so many good and true sayings that we cannot help repeating some of them for the benefit of our readers. The good man's text was, "Give attendance to reading;" and the doctrine of his discourse was, "Every one who is capable, ought to read a religious newspaper. Every family—and especially every pious family—ought to take such a paper. There are few—almost no—exceptions." This is pretty high ground; let us see how he sustains it. He first proves, that "the habitual reading of a religious newspaper tends in a high degree to make a well-informed Christian." Next he maintains, "that those who read no religious newspaper take little or no interest in the departments of religious enterprise." He then sets forth that a religious newspaper "is another weekly preacher to stand by the side of the pastor and second his efforts;" and that, "as a volume of practical hints upon religious duty, a well-conducted religious paper for a year exceeds almost any other volume that can be named."

Thus much to prove the duty of reading a religious newspaper; now for his proof that it is the duty of every family to take one. On this point he first gives seven reasons against borrowing a paper. He then takes up the excuses of different men for neglecting to take a paper. One man says, "I can not afford the expense;" to whom he replies, that "if nine-tenths of those who make this plea would cease to waste their time in lounging about stores and taverns; or would forego some expensive and pernicious habit; or would deny themselves some less important advantage or comfort; they would find no difficulty in taking a religious newspaper." Another man says, "Religious papers are not interesting to me;" to whom he answers, "In the greatest struggle—by far the greatest—which is now going on in the world, you can not be interested! Poor man! I pity you; I do from my soul! But I hope that you do not call yourself a Christian?" A third man says, "I have not time to read a religious paper," in reply to whom he says, "The man who cannot find time to read a religious newspaper cannot find time to acquire any valuable information in any way; to read any books or papers, or to cultivate his mind in the least. He probably can find no time for reading his Bible or worshiping his Maker."

Such are the views of the "Connecticut Pastor." We have read them with considerable interest, and hardly know how to get away from them. Indeed, we are pretty well convinced of the truth of his doctrine, "that every one who is capable ought to read a religious newspaper," and "every pious family ought to take such a paper." What think you, reader?

BISHOPRIC IN JERUSALEM.—Some time ago the King of Prussia, through an Envoy Extraordinary, presented to the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London, the question in how far the English National Church, then in possession of a parsonage on Mount Zion, would be inclined to accord to the Evangelical National Church of Prussia a sisterly position in the Holy Land. The principal reason given by his Majesty of Prussia for such a proposition, was, that Evangelical Christianity in the Holy Land has no hope of success unless it presents as much as possible one united body. Reference was also made to the position of Turkish affairs as indicating the necessity of presenting Evangelical Christianity in a united form in all the Eastern countries. For the purpose of securing so important an object, the Prussian King professed a readiness to hold out his hand to the Episcopal Church of England in full confidence, and to allow the clergy and members of his National Church, in countries where a bishopric of the English Church exists, to unite with it and receive ordination from it. This proposition gives evidence of a commendable interest on the part of the King of Prussia in the religious welfare of the inhabitants of the Holy Land. If responded to by the English Church, it may lead to important results. It seems to us, however, that the best way for England and Prussia to manifest their zeal for the inhabitants of the Holy Land, particularly the Jews, would be by removing the disabilities which press upon them in those professedly free countries. This done, the way would be prepared for consistent and acceptable labor on their behalf abroad.

SABBATH-BREAKING—ACCIDENTS.

"How is it that the elements combine, as they seem to do, against Sabbath-breaking? That those who amuse themselves on the water on the Sabbath are more apt to be drowned than other people, has long been notorious. As this world is not a world of retribution, we cannot well ascribe it to any miraculous interference with the laws of nature for the punishment of the guilty. The cause must be sought in the Sabbath-breaking state of mind." [New York Evangelist.

We have been somewhat puzzled to understand the above paragraph from the Evangelist. The writer of it seems to have commenced for the purpose of giving currency to the old notion that the very elements combine against Sabbath-breaking. But seeing that this notion would conflict with his own theory of the present world being no place of retribution, his first bold suggestion dwindles down to the conclusion, that the cause of Sabbath accidents so-called must be found in a Sabbath-breaking state of mind. He thus gives up the whole question about how the elements combine against Sabbath-breaking, and acknowledges just what we have long contended for, that Sabbath accidents are to be referred to the state or condition of the person, and not to any direct interference on the part of God through the elements. Let that concession be marked, then, and we have one question to ask, viz: How is this Sabbath-breaking state of mind most likely to be cured--by enforcing civil laws with their penalties in favor of the first day of the week, or by enforcing the law of God in its simplicity and power in favor of the seventh day of the week? Will the Evangelist answer that question?

ENCOURAGING FROM WESTERN NEW YORK.

The following is taken from a business letter of Elder Nathan V. Hull, dated Clarence, June 19. We cannot express our satisfaction on learning that brother Hull is at work under such encouraging circumstances. He says:—

"I have just been to Chautauque County, and preached a few sermons, where none of our ministers have ever been, and only one family of Sabbath-keepers has lived in the region. My brother, it would have done your soul good, could you have been there and witnessed the earnestness and attention with which the multitude listened to the defence of the Sabbath of the Lord, and the eagerness with which they sought our publications. Many immediately declared their conviction of the truth of our position with regard to the Sabbath. I have no doubt but that country would be good missionary ground."

LEGISLATION IN FAVOR OF SUNDAY.—The Legislature of Pennsylvania, on petition of members of the Lehigh Canal Company, together with other citizens, has passed a law relieving all companies from any obligation which their charter may have imposed to facilitate the passage of boats or other vehicles on Sunday.

A NEW PLAN.—The Presbyterian Synod of Missouri has formed a plan to raise a fund of $10,000, to be loaned without interest, in sums of from $50 to $400, to assist feeble congregations within the bounds of that Synod in erecting plain houses of worship. An agent has been sent forth for the purpose, who represents the people as being anxious to have such places of worship, and willing to contribute liberally towards it, but destitute of ready money.

RECALL OF MISSIONARIES.—The Baptist Foreign Mission Society has been for some time greatly embarrassed by a debt of about $40,000, in consequence of which the Board has seriously contemplated recalling some of its missionaries. It is sincerely to be hoped, that the churches of that denomination will so respond to the call which is made upon them, as to prevent the necessity of curtailing their foreign labors.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY IN CEYLON.—Rev. Mr. Hoisington, in a letter published in the Boston Recorder, states that there were 26,000 slaves in Ceylon in 1838. Measures were adopted by government to reduce their number gradually, by which means they have been voluntarily reduced to less than fifty. This is the only British colony which has emancipated its slaves without receiving compensation. The missionary expresses a hope that the time may soon come when he can speak as honorable things of America—when he can meet Englishmen on this subject without blushing.

BLUE LAWS.—This title was given to the early laws of Connecticut, it is said, because they were first printed on blue paper. Be that as it may, there are some of them sufficiently amusing to merit reprinting on white paper. Here are four of them, which were enacted by the Colony of New Haven at its first settlement, about two hundred years ago:—

1. "No one shall run on the Sabbath day, or walk in his garden, or elsewhere, except reverentially to and from meeting."
2. "No one shall travel, cook victuals, make beds, sweep houses, cut hair, or shave, on the Sabbath day."
3. "No woman shall kiss her child on the Sabbath or fast day."
4. "The Sabbath shall begin at sunset on Saturday."

PROSPECTS OF THE RECORDER FOR THE SECOND VOLUME.—We are greatly encouraged by the letters received during the past week. They in most cases express entire satisfaction with the location and character of the Recorder, and evince a determination to encourage it in the right way, which is by increasing the number of its paying subscribers. We are gratified also to find, that some of our subscribers who are able, are likewise willing, to pay both for their own papers and for copies to be sent to their friends who are not able. This is the right spirit, and will do much to advance the object for which the paper was established. If our friends throughout the denomination will take hold of the work in earnest, the Recorder may be placed upon a firm basis before the end of the second volume, and its permanent publication ensured. Here is an object—is it not worth laboring for?

PROPOSAL.—We should be glad to send the Recorder for the coming year to every College, Theological Seminary, and Reading Room in the United States. Nothing is lacking but the means, which we trust our friends will supply. To encourage it, we propose to forward the paper for $1 a year to any of these institutions which may be named to us in connection with the money sent. We trust there are many persons who will cheerfully give one, five, or ten dollars, for the purpose of supplying such a number of literary institutions with reading matter upon the subject of the Sabbath.

WORK FOR SOUTHERN BAPTISTS.—The Editor of the Alabama Baptist, speaking of the possibility that the division between Northern and Southern Baptists may lead those of the South to abandon the foreign field, consoles himself with the thought that there is still work enough to do at home. We think as much, if the following statements of the editor can be relied upon. Hear his account of the matter:—

"In some parts of our own State, and almost in our very midst, there is a more profound moral darkness, if possible, than in the jungles of India, or the benighted regions of China—for there the people are shrouded in the mists of idolatry, but here some are sunk in the depths of ignorance, while sitting almost in the very sun-light of Truth. Could it be thought, that within twenty miles of a village, where God's holy temple is frequented every Sabbath, and the sound of the church bell is heard summoning worshipers to his altar, there are men who never heard the sound of the Gospel? Such is the fact! And if the truth were known, it is the case elsewhere. Let us look about home."

A NEWSPAPER IN JERUSALEM.—Mr. Warder Cresson, United States Consul at Jerusalem, has issued proposals for publishing a paper quarterly at Jerusalem, to be called "Daybreak." The prospectus says:—

"The design of this Periodical is, 1. To convey to the reader the fullest information relating to Jerusalem and the East, and also as to the relations of the Ottoman power in regard to the Christian's Hope and Faith, the coming of the Messiah. 2. The religious and physical condition of the Jews, and their hopes and expectations. 3. The climate, vegetables, expenses of living, mineral productions, and state of health. 4. Agriculture, animals, rents, and taxes and duties levied by Government. Persons desirous of becoming subscribers to this Periodical, are requested to forward their names to Mr. Warder Cresson, Jerusalem."

REFORM MOVEMENT IN GREMANY.—By the last foreign arrival, we learn that the movement at the head of which stands John Ronge, is taking a deep hold upon the hearts of the German people, and that the papers of that country are extensively occupied with discussions about the divisions of the Catholic Church. One journal says:—

"The new religious sect is gaining every day numbers of adherents, and even the lower order of the clergy join it with alacrity. In Austria no pains are spared to prevent its making its way to the people; in Catholic and bigoted Bavaria it is persecuted; but in Saxony, Prussia, and the minor states, it is either connived at or openly encouraged by the Governments. The King of Hanover has declared against it, but it is believed that eventually he will tolerate and even encourage it."

CATHOLIC CONFIRMATION.—A correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune, writing from Baltimore under date of June 20, says:—

"Yesterday morning the very imposing and affecting ceremony of confirmation, according to the rites and principles of the Catholic Church, was administered at the jail, by the most Rev. Archbishop Eccleston, to Henry McCurry, the convicted murderer of Paul Roux, who it will be remembered was arrested in the City of New York on the eve of his intended departure for Liverpool in the packet ship Yorkshire. The ceremony was performed by the Archbishop, assisted by Rev. Mr. McCorkery, his spiritual confessor, and was concluded by some appropriate and feeling admonitions by the former. He expressed himself after the reverend gentleman had retired as greatly relieved, and very happy, even in the prospect of his speedy death, this day week being that which is appointed for his execution. He is said to have made a full confession, which is not to be published until after his death."

Rev. Eli Smith, Missionary, from Beirut, Turkey, arrived in New York, on Monday, the 23d inst.

The Bey of Tunis has put an end to the sale of slaves, and declares that he will never leave the work of emancipation whilst a slave remains in his dominions. His reason is, "for the glory of mankind, and to distinguish them from the brute creation."

The "Friends" in Rhode Island have just held their yearly meeting. A part of the meeting, consisting of about 120 persons, who are designated as the Wilborite party, withdrew from the main body, and set up a separate organization.

General Intelligence.

FOURTEEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The regular mail steamer Caledonia reached Boston on Thursday afternoon last, bringing English papers to the 4th inst. The following summary embraces the principal items of intelligence.

The excitement in relation to the Oregon question had entirely subsided. Little had been said in the Parisian journals during the last fortnight on American affairs; but in the few articles that have appeared a very decided opinion is expressed, that however menacing the Oregon question may appear, in will be settled amicably, the United States and Great Britain both having an immense interest in the preservation of peace.

The new treaty between England and France for the prevention of the slave trade on the coast of Africa, has been signed at the Foreign Office.

Germany appears to be in a state of high excitement in consequence of the schism by M. Ronge, the new Luther, who demands marriage for the Catholic priesthood, and the celebration of mass in the native instead of the Latin language.

Poland is still in a disturbed state; at Warsaw the prisons are daily increasing the number of their victims. The danger of correspondence is greatly augmented.

The abdication of Don Carlos in favor of his son is the most striking event in Continental news. The obstinate old man was very unwilling to give up the semblance of royalty, and was only induced to do so, it is said, at the earnest entreaty of cooler and wiser heads. The resignation of Don Carlos, coupled with the declaration of his son, points to an alliance with the young Queen of Spain—a project which would be supported by a large party in that country.

The advices from Stockholm to the middle of May state that a famine is generally apprehended in Upland. The Captain-General of the district has requested the local authorities to inform him of the necessities of their vicinities, and to mention the securities they can offer for the repayment of the sums advanced for their relief.

The sixth annual meeting of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society was recently held at Exeter hall. Mr. J. J. Gurney filled the chair. The report, read by Mr. Scoble, contained a mass of statistics, and touched upon many of the standing topics. It deplored the fact that 400,000 Africans are still annually kidnapped for the slave-markets of the Spanish Colonies, Brazil, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, Persia, and India.

The Diet of Sweden has responded to the appeal of the King in such a manner as to secure the abolition of slavery in the Island of St. Bartholomew, in voting 10,000 piastres yearly, for five years, to be expended in redeeming slaves of that Island, and in compensating the loss of their masters.

A portion of the Highland proprietors have commenced the process of clearing their estates of the poor peasantry. In one case 90 glen-men have been ejected. One of the accounts says—"The air of universal dejection over the sad, silent groups of women and children, sitting beside their little bits of furniture outside their huts, was really infectious."

The poor of Prussia are said to be suffering from the long and severe winter. The King has purchased a quantity of potatoes for them.

The protracted winter and cold spring has caused considerable anxiety in England. From the country the most unfavorable reports arrive; the low range of temperature has done much mischief, and opinions are already stoutly advanced that the present year's grain crops will not half equal those of the last.

At Oxford, on the 28th ult., two young men, members of Pembroke College, and who had just passed their examination for their degree of B. A., met their death by drowning, by their skiff upsetting. Their names are Ede and Harris.

The Post Office financial accounts, just published, show that the revenue derived from the penny postage exceeded in 1844 the amount of the previous year by £84,000. The nett revenue of the last year was £719,957.

Mr. Hunt has put a notice of motion on the books of the House of Commons, to the effect that the course pursued by Great Britain, since 1813, relative to the slave trade, has not mitigated the traffic or its horrors.

The naval force of Great Britain consists of 680 ships of war, carrying from 1 to 120 guns each. Of this number, there are 125 armed steam-vessels constructed on the most approved principles. This immense fleet employs in the time of peace 23,000 able-bodied seamen, 2,000 stout lads, and 94 companies of Royal Marines.

The widow of one of the brothers Bandiera died on the 15th ult. at Venice. Her death is attributed to grief for the loss of her husband.

It is stated that the British trade at Shanghai, in China, during the last year, amounted to nearly one million sterling, in a barter of silks and tea for manufactures.

The reigning Duke of Brunswick has prohibited corporeal punishment in the army.

A genuine autograph of Shakespeare, it is said, is about being submitted to the hammer in London.

Glass pipes, for the conveyance of water and gas, can be made, it is said, cheaper and stronger than metal pipes.

Some American hops, recently introduced, sold at 60s. for exportation, and were superior to former importations.

The grant for education in England is to be increased £35,000 this year, making the total £75,000.

Brussels carpets are now being manufactured by steam power, which will cause, of course, a reduction in the price.

M. Arago, in giving an account of his recent experiment with the Electrical Telegraph, estimates the rapidity of transmission at the rate of 32,000 leagues per hour.

Those who take an interest in the private habits of the Duke of Wellington, declare that to his early rising, a mattrass bed, constant exercise in the open air, temperate habits, and the constant use of the cold bath, may be attributed the excellent health which he enjoys.

The distance between London and Birmingham was lately performed in one hour and 45 minutes. 110 miles in 105 minutes by railroad.

A seafaring man, named Land, who eloped with a young woman, whose personal charms are considerable, from the roof of her parents, the fugitives carrying with them £37, the property of the girl's parents, was arrested last week, in consequence of a description of their persons having been forwarded by the electrical telegraph on the South-western Railway. The officer was in attendance at the terminus before the parties alighted from the train.

The sums expended by many of the railway companies before Parliament, endeavoring to procure their acts, are enormous; in some instances the outlay amounts to £1000 and £1500 per day!

The efforts of Dr. Bartlett, of the New York Albion, to induce the British Government to introduce Indian Corn extensively into England, and to encourage the consumption of it by the English people, are exciting some attention on this side of the water. Cobbett, many years ago, vainly endeavored to draw attention to this excellent article of food.

Returns upon woollen manufactures have been issued by order of the House of Commons. It appears that the declared value of the British woollen manufactures exported from the United Kingdom in 1844 was £8,204,936, of which £2,444,789 worth was exported to the United States of America.

The Catholic Bishops are up in arms against the measure now before Parliament for establishing colleges in the North, the South, and the West of Ireland.

The Magnetic Telegraph.—The efforts to establish Magnetic Telegraphs, touching at the principal cities throughout the country, are now likely to be successful. The cost of construction in this country is estimated at $130 per mile. We shall soon have Boston bound to New Orleans, and New York to the great West. Another line is in contemplation, to be called the Atlantic and Mississippi Route. It will commence at Philadelphia, (connecting with the lines from New York and Washington,) and run so as to touch all the State Capitals and large towns that can conveniently be reached on the route to St. Louis. Branch lines will run Southwardly from this main route to the capitals of Kentucky and Tennessee, and to the cities below Pittsburgh on the Ohio River, so as to include Wheeling, Cincinnati and Louisville; and other branch lines will run Northwardly from the main route, so as to include the principal places along the lakes, between Buffalo, Detroit, Chicago, Milwaukie, &c. The arrangements for completing this great central line are entrusted by Mr. Kendall to Henry O'Reilley; and it is understood that enough of the work will be finished with despatch for transmitting to Harrisburgh (if not to Wheeling via. Pittsburgh, or even to Columbus in Ohio) an abstract of the President's Message at the commencement of the next session of Congress.

Dining with Colored People.—An officer attached to the U. S. African Squadron, writing to the Newark Advertiser, says:

"We have now been here just one week. Monday last the Commodore, Captain, and three other officers and myself, dined by invitation with the wife of the Governor, (Mrs. Roberts,) he being absent. We had a very excellent dinner, several courses, silver forks, and fine napkins. The Commodore sat opposite Mrs. R. at table, the Captain on her right, I on her left; two blacks completed the company, one on either hand of the Commodore. This is the first time I ever partook of the hospitality of the African race. But there was nothing in the matter or manner to offend the most fastidious taste. The Governor's wife is really a pretty woman. She was genteelly dressed, free from affectation, and I soon forgot her color. They talked of the ladies and gentlemen of the lower orders of society," &c., &c.

Gen. Donald McLeod.—A correspondent of the Buffalo Commercial Advertiser says:

This distinguished veteran, who took an active part in the late Canadian Rebellion, and who has been in exile in this country since 1837, has received an unconditional pardon from Sir Charles Metcalf, Governor of Canada, and is on his way to report himself to the Canadian authorities at Montreal.

Gen. McLeod was one of the patriot leaders excluded from the benefits of the general amnesty, granted by Lord Durham, in 1839. During the rebellion, rewards were offered for his person, by the Canadian authorities, to the amount of ten thousand dollars, besides a reward of five hundred dollars, offered by Gov. Marcy, of this State, for his apprehension for a violation of our neutrality laws. After the burning of the Robert Peel, he was pursued on this side from one end of the frontier to the other, and after many hair-breadth escapes, was arrested near Detroit, tried and acquitted.

Factory Wages.—There is now in the employ of the York Manufacturing Company, a girl, who, during the five months preceding June, has worked 123 days, for which labor she has received, within that time, $121 52, averaging $5 93 per week—deducting her board, $1 20 per week, she has earned $4 73 per week; at the end of the year, at this rate, she will have $245 94 clear of board.

In a single room, in one of the factories of the York Company, there are fifty young women—each of these the past five weeks, has earned over twenty dollars, and one has actually earned and received thirty dollars, or one dollar per day.

Crops.—Harvesting Wheat is now in progress in Virginia and Maryland, and the yield is generally good—more than an average. We have advices from Western Illinois that the wheat looks well in that region also—the stalks not very luxuriant, but the heads long and full. Corn is looking better every where since the late rains, and the average product will be good. Ohio and Michigan may have a short yield of wheat, but we hope no serious deficiency. In our own State, we trust there will be no lack, except of fruit, which appears to be pretty thoroughly destroyed by the repeated heavy frosts throughout the whole country north of this latitude. Along Lake Erie, we hear that there will be a partial yield, but none a few miles back. In Albany County, the Citizen says the prospect generally is as good as usual at this season, though many things are backward, and garden vegetables have been badly bitten and grapes nearly destroyed by the frost. [Tribune.

The Friends.—The Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of Orthodox Quakers, lately convened, urged, among other things upon their members a more frequent perusal of the Bible, and condemned the reading of pernicious books. They also passed strong condemnation upon the use of intoxicating drinks; the system and practice of slaveholding; war; oaths; clandestine trade and lotteries; and resolved upon more vigorous efforts to secure universal education, and to befriend the Indians.

The Evidence of Marriage.—It has been decided by Judge Parsons, that in Pennsylvania marriage is a civil contract, and as such may be proved by admissions and acts of the parties, without the necessity of any particular ceremony. In the case before him, it was proved that there had been no ceremony performed, but the parties had lived together as man and wife, and the man had treated the woman as a wife in the presence of acquaintances. This, it was held, according to the law of Pennsylvania, was sufficient to constitute a marriage, and endow the woman with the rights of a wife.

Case of Conscience.—A letter was received at the Commercial Bank of this city, says the Albany Evening Journal of Monday, this morning, through the post office, addressed in printed Roman characters "Cashier Commercial Bank, Albany, N. Y.," containing the following words, also in Roman characters:

"Supposed to have been overpaid by the Teller ten or eleven years ago, 50 dollars—restitute a many instructions from Jehovah—See Ezekiel chap. 33, verses 14 and 15—With interest—1845."

The sum of one hundred dollars in good bankable money was enclosed, which, it is presumed, was intended for repayment of principal, and compound interest, in full; the receipt of which is hereby gratefully acknowledged. J. T. Cashier.

Mexican Heroes—Quite a Coincidence.—On the 7th instant, the British mail steamer Medway arrived at Havana, having on board Gen. Santa Ana, his wife and family, who had been banished from the Mexican territory. The same day arrived at Havana, in the British steamer Dee, Gen. Bustamente, on his way to Mexico. The latter was exiled upon the accession of the former to power, and now, the tables being turned, he meets his old enemy, banished from his country, while he goes to be welcomed back to Mexico.

Mr. Healy.—This gentleman, with the portrait he painted of Gen. Jackson for the King of the French, left Nashville on Thursday night last for Lexington, whither he proceeds with the view of painting for the same distinguished individual, a portrait of Mr. Clay. The individuals specially embraced in his mission were, we believe, Gen. Jackson, Mr. Clay, Mr. Webster, Mr. Adams, and perhaps Mr. Calhoun.

The War in Scinde.—A despatch from Sir Charles Napier, dated Shahpoor, gives and account of the taking of Shahpoor, and a post ten miles east called Ooch, on the previous day. These posts were held by outlaws of the Doomkee, Jackranee and Boogtie tribes. It is reported that 45 of the outlaws were wounded and 40 killed at Ooch—among them Deria Khan, Chief of the Jackranees. He received a grape-shot in his breast. About 3,500 head of camels, cattle, &c. were taken. On the other side, 15 men and 21 horses were killed or wounded. Azim Beg, Resseldar 6th Irregular Cavalry, died of the wounds received at Ooch. [Tribune.

Another Monster Unearthed.—Dr. Albert C. Kock, the discoverer, in 1840, of the bones of the great Missourium of Missouri, has recently unearthed, in Washington county, Alabama, a very nearly complete skeleton of a most colossal and terrible reptile, that may be justly termed the king of reptiles. Its length is one hundred and four feet—the solid portions of the vertebræ are from 14 to 18 inches in length, and from 8 to 12 inches in diameter, each averaging 75 pounds in weight. Its greatly elongated jaws are armed with not less than forty incisors or cutting teeth, four canine teeth or fangs, and eight molars or grinders. These teeth all fit into each other when the jaws are closed, and it is clear that the animal was of the carnivorous nature. The eyes were evidently large, and were prominently situated on the forehead, giving the animal the power of keeping a constant and vigorous watch for its prey. The body had members attached resembling paddles or fins, which in proportion to the size of the animal were small, and were doubtless intended to propel the body of this enormous creature through the waters of those large rivers and seas, which it inhabited or frequented. Each of these paddles or fins is composed of 21 bones, which form, in union, seven freely articulating joints. The ribs are of a very peculiar shape, and exceedingly numerous. They are three times the thickness at the lower that they are at the superior extremity. This is, in substance, the Doctor's description of his prize, which he has removed to Mobile.

Musk.—Musk is a concrete substance, found in an animal having a near affinity to the deer tribe, a native of Thibet, China, and Siberia. The musk-deer is a timid animal, and rarely appears during the day; consequently, the musk collectors watch and surprise it at night. The best musk comes from China; and to have it genuine it should be purchased in the natural bag or pod, as it is very often adulterated. The Bengal musk is inferior, and that from Russia the worst of all. The hair on the pod of the best musk is a fawn color; that on the inferior a dirty white. A variety of musk is found in the musk-rat of Canada, an animal about the size of a small rabbit. Musk is of a bitter taste, and of an odor more powerful than any thing known; substances in its neighborhood become strongly infected by it, and when once perfumed with it, long retain the scent. It has been known to affect chests of tea placed at a considerable distance, even though both had been packed up in leaden boxes; for which reason the East India Company gave an order not to import musk and tea in the same ships. Many persons dislike the odor. It has the property, when imployed in very small quantities, of augmenting the scent of other substances, without imparting its own.

[Encyclopœdia of Domestic Economy.

We noticed ten large wagons heavily freighted with furniture, and some 12 or 15 persons, passing down the avenue yesterday, to take passage to Wisconsin on one of the propellers. We have no doubt when the conveniences offered here shall become known, that all in this section of country will take passage at this port, as it saves the labor of transhipment at Buffalo. [Roch. Burington Anthony, the newly appointed Marshal for the District of Rhode Island, has sued Rev. T. F. Norris, a Protestant Methodist Clergyman, and Editor of the Olive Branch, a religious paper published in Boston, for libel, laying damages at $5,000.

"He's a queer chap, that Lord Eldon," said Patrick. "Faith you may well say that," said Teddy; "how can he help it, when the words spelt backwards make a droll noddle?"

SUMMARY.

A great Funeral Procession in memory of General Jackson, came off in New York on Tuesday of the present week. We fear many who composed it did not know the difference between a Funeral Procession and a Fourth of July Parade.

The Governor of Delaware has issued a proclamation in which he earnestly enjoins upon all Magistrates, Constables and Conservators of the Peace, to use the most unceasing vigilance in arresting those who intrude within the limits of that State for the purpose of fighting duels, their aiders, abettors, and confederates, and in bringing them to justice. He also declares his purpose to pursue and bring within the criminal jurisdiction of the State all such offenders wherever they may be found, that they may undergo the punishment due to so flagrant a violation of the laws of God and man.

The Tunkhannock (Pa.) Recorder has the following paragraph concerning a dreadful accident at Wilkesbarre: We learn verbally, that on Friday last, while several miners were about the mouth of Loyd's mine, endeavoring to guard against the impending danger, a fall of earth buried them underneath. Three men were taken out dead and horribly mangled, and another was so much injured that his recovery was not anticipated.

Mr. Holmes, of S. C., in his speech in Congress upon the annexation question, gravely urged the acquisition of Texas to make room for the future slave population of the country. In half a century, he estimated the increase of the number of slaves to 20,000,000. Only think of twenty millions of bondmen in this model of a free Republic!

Gen. Van Zandt, who was knocked down by a horse that had been frightened by a fire-cracker, died on Tuesday afternoon. He is the first victim of the season to the detestable practice of firing crackers in the streets.

We learn that Mr. Fitzgerald, the inventor of the Tuscan Braid Machine, has disposed of the right of patent for this country for several thousand dollars, and intends going to Europe with his machine. The price of the machines is $275 each.

The annual sheep-shearing at Nantucket took place on Thursday and Friday of last week, the washing having been performed on Monday and Tuesday. On Friday, notice was given that the stores would be closed, as a general holiday.

The Brooklyn Daily Advertiser says: "We learn that a son of Chancellor Walworth, born and nurtured in the faith of the strictest Presbyterianism, has abjured Presbyterianism and joined the Roman Communion, intending to enter its ministry."

A machine has been invented in Bangor by a Mr. Foster, by which he is enabled to press hats into any form, oval, tapering, or bell-crown, with any sweep of brim. It is done by several eccentric irons, and is a great saving of labor.

The Boston Chronicle suggests the name of Braggadocia as an appropriate name for our Country; and for brevity, we might simply call ourselves Braggs.

The friends of Bishop De Lancey will be gratified to learn that he is gradually on the gain, and has so far regained his health as to begin to attend to his correspondence.

In our last (says the Fredrick Herald) we noticed that Hon. W. C. Johnson was then in New Orleans. We hear that Mr. J. has also received a delicate compliment to his abilities in the shape of $100,000 fee, for settling an extensive land claim.

The colored people of Hudson intend having a grand Temperance Celebration of the 4th of July next.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

This Institution has a pleasant and quiet location thirteen miles south-east of Angelica, and six miles south of Almond, Allegany Co., N. Y., under the care of W. C. Kenyon, as Principal, and Miss Caroline B. Maxson, as Preceptress, aided by able and experienced assistants.

Teachers' Classes will be exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining every facility of a Normal School, without its usual disadvantages. Within the past year, more than one hundred and fifty students of the institution have been employed as teachers in this and the adjacent counties—a number much larger than from any other institution in the State.

Students are prepared for entering any class in College. Ample advantages are also secured to those pursuing Modern Languages and the Fine Arts. The institution is liberally endowed and supplied with a choice and valuable library, and apparatus sufficiently extensive to illustrate every department of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry. It has also well selected cabinets of Geological, Mineralogical and Conchological specimens.

The plan of instruction aims at the development of the moral, intellectual and physical powers of students, so as to render them thorough, accurate, and practical scholars.

Lectures on Chemistry, accompanied by a full course of experiments, will commence with the second week of the fall term, and continue daily to its close. During the fall and winter terms, daily lectures will be given on School Teaching. Lectures on Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, and Physiology, illustrated by experiments, will be given each term of the year.

Tuition, per term of fifteen weeks, from $3,50 to $5. Board per week, in private families, $1. The entire expense of the academic year, including tuition, board, washing, light, and fuel, need not exceed $60. No extra charges incurred.

SAMUEL RUSSEL,
President of the Board of Trustees.

War must Cease,

IF CHRISTIANS WILL NOT FIGHT.

Let the Christians of the Anglo-Saxon race say that there shall be no more war in Christendom, or in the world, and no civilized nation would dare to resort to arms to settle any question of international controversy. Let them proclaim to the world that the Christian religion has no attribute that can sanction these wholesale butcheries in the human family, and that no Christian can or will take a part in them, or give any countenance or support to military preparations, and War would cease from the earth. How the world would bow down and reverence the majesty of the religion of the Gospel of Peace, exhibited in a position so sublime by its disciples! Thus restored to its original vitality, how soon would it become the power and wisdom of God to the elevation and salvation of the whole human family! Exterminating, at a blow, the greatest monster-curse that sin ever let loose upon the human race, how soon would its principles—the hiding of its power—penetrate all the dark habitations of cruelty, and pervade and fraternize mankind!

Mr. Editor, I am no visionary enthusiast, nor do I advance a baseless or unconsidered conjecture, when I say, that if the ministers and members of Christian churches throughout Christendom, would set apart one Sabbath-day—the first one in July, for instance—for simultaneous consideration and action on the subject of Peace, they could exterminate war from the human family for ever. As the result of two hours' reverence in the house of God to the full requisitions and principles of his gospel of peace, they could rescue the immense revenue which the Belial of War annually extorts from Christian nations as a tribute to its cannibal, idol altar, and apply it to the elevation of mankind. Suppose, Mr. Editor, that on the first Sabbath of next July, it should be agreed that every Christian minister throughout the civilized world, should preach upon one of these four texts—"If thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink."—"Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you."—"All they that take the sword shall perish by the sword."—"If my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight; but now (because my servants will not fight,) is my kingdom not from hence." After having faithfully developed and applied the spirit and application of these precepts of the Prince of Peace, and demonstrated to every Christian in his congregation, that it is no more consistent for him to take the sword and redden it in the blood of his brother, than it would be for his divine Master, then let him invite every one in the sanctuary, young and old, to come forward and sign a petition lying on the table beneath the pulpit, and addressed to their Government in terms substantially these:

"We, the subscribers, believing all war to be inconsistent with the spirit and precepts of the Gospel, and destructive of the best interests of mankind, and unconditionally prohibited by Christianity, and an unnecessary and brutal method of settling questions of international controversy, do declare to the world, that we will lend no aid, nor sanction, directly or indirectly, to its continuance in the human family. And we respectfully petition your honorable bodies, or your Majesty, to take immediate measures to establish a Congress of Nations, or an International Tribunal, or a Supreme Court of the World, to which shall be referred for decision all such questions of controversy among nations, as have heretofore occasioned a deluge of human blood, vice, misery and degradation among those 'whom God had made of one blood, for to dwell on all the face of the earth' in peace."

What a Sabbath day would that be for the latest generations of the human race!—How its memory would be perpetuated in monuments wreathed with the olive branch of peace, lifting skyward their august and lofty brows, studding the whole earth like so many Pharos beacons, shedding new light of hope over the sea of time, and all the regions of humanity; lighting all the depressed and alienated tribes of men home to one happy, undivided brotherhood—to the comity and communion of one vast and peaceful family! The whole world would bow down in reverence to the omnipotent majesty of the Christian religion,—thus, by the hands of its disciples, crowning in one day its divine Founder King of earthly kings, King of nations, as he is King of saints; instating him into the Kingdom promised him from the foundations of the world, and which, long ere this, would have embraced all the islands of the sea and the uttermost corners of the earth, had his followers been true to the dignity of their calling, and to the terms of their fealty and the letter of their covenant with the Prince of Peace. What Government on earth, what King or Autocrat, would dare to lift up a banner of blood against this demonstration of moral power? Where would the red Gorgon of War, which has drunk the blood of forteen thousand millions of the human race, and preyed, like a deathless vampire, on the sinews of Labor, and burned the earth over with the Sodom fires of hate and passions that would make the flames of the infernal pit more intense—where would that monstrous Abaddon find a place to breathe on this green earth, after the doings of that Sabbath of Sabbaths, after that simultaneous declaration of the Christians of Christendom, that they will practice and learn war no more?

But I have already prolonged this article too far, I fear, for admission to your columns—a privilege, Mr. Editor, which I shall be grateful to your generosity, if you will extend to a few short communications which I propose to send to your paper upon this important subject of international peace. E. B.

OXFORD.

The massive and time-worn structures of Oxford would suggest the idea rather of baronal castles, than of calm retreats of literature, were it not for the magnificient gardens and groves that mark the place as a fit haunt for the muses. One is here constantly reminded that he is treading on classic ground. There is something strange, especially to an American, in walking the streets of a populous city, so totally withdrawn from the sway of mamon. Here literature sits in high places, and receives that homage which is elsewhere divided between rank and wealth. The antiquated scholastic costume, which is never out of sight, diamond shaped caps and black gowns being worn by all connected with the university, from the vice-chancellor down to the student in his earliest noviciate, materially enhances the impression on the visitor, that he is breathing a very different atmosphere from that of ordinary life.

The university comprises twenty colleges and five halls. So extensive are the grounds, and so numerous the quadrangles, one opening into another, around which the massive edifices are built, that I was completely lost in the labyrinth, and found myself, at the end of our walk, just as ignorant as at the beginning, of the relative position of the different colleges.

London itself did not surprise me so much as this ancient city. Multiply the population and commerce of New York by six, and give a proportionate expansion to its buildings and institutions, and you can form some idea of the great metropolis, but all the colleges in our country brought together, would bear no appreciable resemblance to the University of Oxford. The vast piles of buildings, gray with age—the churches and chapels with their lofty windows of stained glass, admitting a "dim religious light"—the towers and steeples, rising above the surrounding groves—the literary riches of the ample libraries—the old gothic archways—the long colonnades—the statues and paintings of the illustrious men whose genius still seems to hover around the scenes which they once frequented—make up an assemblage of objects, alike imposing to the eye and the imagination. No wonder that the organ of veneration is largely developed at Oxford, where the very air is redolent of antiquity; and science, far from noise and strife of the busy world, sits secure in her ancient fastness.

A WONDERFUL SPRING.

Extract of a letter from Rev. J. T. Headley, now traveling in Germany, to the N. Y. Observer:—

Wiesbaden is the Saratoga of Germany, and the chief town in the Duchy of Nassau. The Duke is the King of this little province containing 355,715 inhabitants, of whom a little over half are Protestants, 5,845 Jews, and the rest Catholics. This small duchy is filled with Brunnens, or bubbling springs—but before I give a description of them, let me sketch a day in Wiesbaden. At 5 o'clock in the morning, the servant, in obedience to my orders, knocked at my door, and with a bright sun just rising over the Taurus mountains to greet me, I threaded my way to the hot springs, a short distance from the village. A crowd had arrived before me, and were scattered around over the open area, or passing up and down the promenades, carrying a glass of the steaming water in their hands, waving it backwards and forwards in the morning air, and blowing upon the surface to cool it for drinking. This water is so hot it cannot be drank for some time after it is dipped up, and the vessel containing it cannot be grasped for a single moment in the hand. A handle, therefore, is attached to all the vessels, in which each invalid receives his portion of the scalding fluid. I stood for a long time convulsed with laughter at the scene that opened before me as I approached this spring, notwithstanding the sobering effects of the early morning air. Now an old man tottered away from the steaming spring, bowing over his glass, which he held with trembling hand close to his face, and blowing with the most imperturbable gravity and dolorous countenance on the scalding fluid. Close behind him shot along a peppery Frenchman, puffing away at his drink, and swinging it backwards and forwards with such velocity and abruptness that a portion of the hot water at length spilled over on his hand, when he dropped the vessel as if he had been bitten by a snake, and, with a dozen sacrés, stood scowling over the broken fragments that lay scattered at his feet. Old and young women were walking along the promenades utterly absorbed in their cup of boiling water, which it required the nicest balancing to keep from spilling over. This intense attention of so many people to the single object of keeping their cups right end up, and yet swing them as far and rapid as possible in order to cool the water, was irresistibly comical. Almost every man's character could be discerned in the way he carried his cup, and the success which attended his operations. Your quiet lazy man sat down on a bench, put his vessel beside him, and crossing his legs, waited with the most composed mien the sure operation of the laws of nature to cool his dose, while the ardent impatient personage kept shaking and blowing his tumbler, and sipping every now and then to the no slight burning of his lips.

After having watched for a while this to me a novel spectacle, I stepped up to the spring and received from a young girl my portion of this boiling broth, and commenced my promenade, presenting, probably, to some other traveler, as ridiculous a figure as those who had just excited my mirth had to me.

The taste of this water, when partially cooled, is precisely like chicken broth. Says a humorous English traveler, of this spring, (Sir Francis Head,) "If I were to say that, while drinking it, one hears in one's ears the cackling hens, and that one sees feathers flying before one's eyes, I should certainly greatly exaggerate, but when I declare that it exactly resembles very hot chicken broth, I only say what Dr. Greenville said, and what, in fact, every body says and must say respecting it, and certainly I do wonder why the common people should be at the inconvenience of making bad soup, when they can get much better from nature's great stock-pot, the Kochbrunnen of Wiesbaen. At all periods of the year, summer and winter, the temperature of this broth remains the same; and when one reflects that it had been bubbling out of the ground, and boiling over, in the very same state, certainly from the time of the Romans, and probably from the time of the flood, it is really astonishing what a most wonderful apparatus there must exist below, what an inexhaustable stock of provisions to ensure such an everlasting supply of broth always formed of the same eight or ten ingredients, always salted to exactly the same degree, and always served up at exactly the same heat. One would think that some of the particles in the receipt would be exhausted; in short, to speak metaphorically, that the chickens would at last be boiled to rags, or that the fire would go out for want of coals; but the more one reflects on this sort of subjects, the more the old fashioned observation forced upon the mind, that let a man go where he will, Omnipotence is never from his view.

The water, like that of Saratoga, is good for every thing; for those too fat and those too lean, for those too hot and those too cold, for all ages and conditions and sexes.

ENTIRE SANCTIFICATION.

Should you ask, how many baptisms, or effusions of the sanctifying Spirit are necessary to cleanse a believer from all sin, and to kindle his soul into perfect love: I reply, that the effect of sanctifying truth depended upon the ardor of faith with which that truth was embraced, and upon the power of the Spirit with which it is applied. I should betray a want of modesty, if I brought the operations of the Holy Ghost and the energy of faith under a rule which is not expressly laid down in the Scriptures. If you ask your physician how many doses of physic you must take before all the crudities of your stomach can be carried off, and your appetite perfectly restored, he would probably answer you that this depends upon the nature of those crudities, the strength of the medicine, and the manner in which your constitution will allow it to operate; and that, in general, you must repeat the dose, as you can bear, till the remedy has fully answered the desired end. I return a similar answer: If one powerful baptism of the Spirit seal you unto the day of redemption, and cleanse you from all (moral) filthiness, so much the better. If two or more be necessary, the Lord can repeat them: his arm is not shortened that it cannot save: nor is his promise of the Spirit stinted: he says in general, Whosoever will, let him come and take of the water of life freely.—If you, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more will your heavenly Father (who is goodness itself) give his holy (sanctifying) Spirit to them that ask him! I may, however, venture to say in general, that before we can rank among perfect Christians, we must receive so much of the truth and Spirit of Christ by faith, as to have the pure love of God and man shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost given unto us, and to be filled with the meek and lowly mind which was in Christ. And if one outpouring of the Spirit, one bright manifestation of the sanctifying truth, so empties us of self, as to fill us with the mind of Christ, and with pure love, we are undoubtedly Christians in the full sense of the word. From the ground of my soul, I therefore subscribe to the answer which a great divine makes to the following objection.

"But some who are newly justified do come up to this (Christian perfection:)—What then will you say to these?" Mr. Wesley replies with great propriety: "If they really do, I will say, they are sanctified, saved from sin in that moment; and that they never need lose what God has given, or feel sin any more. But certainly this is an exempt case. It is otherwise with the generality of those who are justified. They feel in themselves, more or less, pride, anger, self-will, and a heart bent to backsliding. And till they have gradually mortified these, they are fully renewed in love! God usually gives a considerable time for men to receive light, to grow in grace, to do and suffer his will before they are either justified or sanctified. But he does not invariably adhere to this. Sometimes he cuts short his work. He does the work of many years in a few weeks: perhaps in a week, a day, an hour. He justifies or sanctifies both those who have done or suffered nothing, and who have not had time for a gradual growth either in light or grace. And may he not do what he will with his own? Is thine eye evil because he is good? It need not therefore be proved by forty texts of Scripture, either that most men are perfected in love at last, or that there is a gradual work of God in the soul, and that, generally speaking, it is a long time, even many years, before sin is destroyed. All this we know. But we know likewise, that God may, with man's good leave, cut short his work, in whatever degree he pleases, and do the usual work of many years in a moment. He does so in many instances. And yet there is a gradual work both before and after that moment. So that one may affirm the work is gradual; another, it is instantaneous, without any manner of contradiction." Plain Account, page 115, &c. Page 155, the same eminent divine explains himself more fully, thus: "It (Christian perfection) is constantly preceded and followed by a gradual work. But is it in itself instantaneous or not? In examining this, let us go on step by step. An instantaneous change has been wrought in some believers: none can deny this. Since that change they enjoy perfect love. They feel this, and this alone. They rejoice evermore, pray without ceasing, in every thing give thanks. Now this is all that I mean by perfection. Therefore these are witnesses of the perfection which I preach. 'But in some this change was not instantaneous.' They did not perceive the instant when it was wrought: it is often difficult to perceive the instant when a man dies. Yet there is an instant in which life ceases, there must be a last moment of its existence, and a first moment of our deliverance from it. 'But if they have this love now, they will lose it.' They may; but they need not. And whether they do or no, they have it now: they now experience what we teach. They now are all love. They now rejoice, pray, and praise without ceasing. 'However, sin is only suspended in them; it is not destroyed.' Call it which you please. They are all love to-day, and they take no thought for the morrow." To return:

3. When you firmly assent to the truth of the precepts and promises, on which the doctrine of Christian perfection is founded:—when you understand the meaning of these scriptures, Sanctify them through thy truth, thy word truth.—I will send the Comforter, (the Spirit of truth and holiness) unto you; God hath chosen you to (eternal) salvation through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth:—When you see that the way to Christian perfection is by the word of the Gospel of Christ,—by faith,—and by the Spirit of God: in the next place get tolerably clear ideas of this perfection. This is absolutely necessary. If you will hit a mark, you must know where it is. Some people aim at Christian perfection: but mistaking it for angelic perfection, they shoot above the mark, miss it, and then peevishly give up their hopes. Others place the mark as much too low: hence it is that you hear them profess to have attained Christian perfection, when they have not so much as attained the mental serenity of a philosopher, or the candor of a good natured, conscientious heathen. In the preceding remarks, if I am not mistaken, the mark is fixed according to the rules of scriptural moderation. It is not placed so high, as to make you despair of hitting it, if you do your best in an evangelical manner: nor yet so low, as to allow you to presume, that you can reach it, without exerting all your abilities to the uttermost, in due subordination to the efficacy of Jesus' blood, and the Spirit's sanctifying influences.

Causes of Infidelity.

These are strange times on which we are fallen; infidelity in numerous forms now lifts its hydra head in every direction, and points the finger at the numerous defects and foibles of our once glorious Zion, and says, "How are the mighty fallen!" It is an old adage, and not the worse for being old, that straws show which way the wind blows. What means such a saying as this? While a friend was urging his neighbor to join the church, the reply was, "I am afraid they would find I had religion, and turn me out." Had this man's moral character been defective, then had there been some reply for the church, but here he was invulnerable. But alas, poor Zion! she was bleeding at every pore—her slavery, rum-dealing, war spirit, and the cruel, anti-Christian aristocracy and hatred to color, makes her powerless.

One of our circuit judges, who has been for the last eight or ten years making fruitless efforts to prevent the different courts of ——— from granting licenses for the sale of 'indulgences,' or intoxicating drink, stated that he has had more difficulty with the church than all the rest of the people put together. This man was not a professor of religion, and with this dark picture before him, what must have been his views of the so-called Christian Church?

A letter-writer to one of our city papers, after having been disgusted with the inhuman and anti-Christian conduct of an Episcopal Bishop, freighting on the same steamboat, human beings, with the swine-dealer for a southern market—and then the impiety and barbarity of such a man as Rev. Mr. Thomson, Baptist minister, who refused to let a mother's worse than fatherless children be sold together, because he was interested in the sale—writes thus: "I look upon the Christian church denominations as at this time in a deplorable state. While Christ has many thousands of personal friends who would lay down their lives for the truth, the action of the organizations, as such, is almost wholly based upon the principle, of first securing their own interest and influence with mankind, and then consulting how much truth and goodness they may practice. This, as I understand it, is distinctly abdicating the Christian ground, by placing the Church, its rules, and welfare, before and above Christ—and I am perfectly convinced that there must be a general reform in church action, or a total abandonment and destruction of church organizations."

Some have reached this crisis in their minds already, and the only remedy for these evils is the destruction of the church. Now the true position is, between these extremes—a pure gospel church, in opposition to the no-church system on the one hand, and the non-reformatory measures on the other. Can any with propriety argue from the abuse of the church, to the disuse of it, or the impossibility of its being made a blessing to the world, when conducted on Christian principles. The errors into which many of the inhabitants of Europe fell, and especially France, during the last century, was, that too many of them took religion to be what the church and clergy represented it to be. Instead of going to the Bible for the truth, they stumbled over a false religion.

Mr. Simpson, in speaking of the causes of over-spreading infidelity in France, says—"Who is to blame for the spreading of infidelity? The bishops and clergy, more than any other persons in the kingdom. We, as a body of men, are almost solely and exclusively culpable; our negligence, lukewarmness, worldly-mindedness, and immorality, will ruin the country." And are not these remarks, in a greater or less degree, applicable to our own church and country? If ever there was a time for Church reform, it is now, and reformation must not be partial or superficial; but if that confidence, which every where seems to be lost, be regained, it must be by the church's setting the moral standard as high as truth itself, and with vigilance and unsparing assiduity to bring all to conform to it. For which we labor, suffer, and pray. S. H. Chase.

A Spring Morning.—How cheerfully do these little birds chirp and sing at the approach of the sun, and the return of the spring; as if their life had departed and returned with those glorious and comfortable beams.

Thus the penitent and faithful son is affected towards the true Sun of righteousness, the Father of lights. When he hides his face it is troubled, and silently mourns away that sad winter of affliction. When he returns, in his presence is the fulness of joy; no song is cheerful enough to welcome him. Oh thou who art the God of all consolation, make my heart sensible of the comforts of thy gracious presence, and let my mouth ever show forth thy praise. [Bishop Hall.

A Fugitive.

Once when I was lecturing in Vermont, I fell in with a colored boy, about eighteen or twenty years of age, whose sorrowful and downcast looks, and servile demeanor, led me to suspect he was a refugee from injustice; and on inquiry, I found he was. He secreted himself in a vessel, and was fed by a friend, and landed at Boston. He came from East Florida, where he lived with about 200 other slaves. He said their allowance was a peck of corn and pint of salt per week, and this was the allowance of the surrounding plantations. Their excuse was, it would injure them to eat meat. He could not read, and never saw a Bible till he came away. He had three large scars upon each side of his neck, made with a red hot branding iron when about ten years old, and all his comrades wore the same mark; each plantation has its peculiar brand. I alluded to the ignorance of the slaves, and he quickly replied, they are not so ignorant as you think they are—and so I found it; for although he knew but little of Northern affairs, he understood Southern matters well, and could give much light upon the dark subject of slavery. A man who had been in the South, said in his hearing, "I wish I could be as well off as the slaves, living in parlors, dressed in silk jackets, and fed with rich crumbs from their master's table." This roused the man in him, and stepping towards the pale-faced ninny, he said, "If you wish to see slavery, go into the field and the cabins; and as for those in the parlor, perhaps you will hardly get your back turned and out of hearing, before they will hit them a cut with a raw hide. I know! You needn't tell me!"—And he looked him out of countenance.

He said many of them are whipped most cruelly, and though he generally escaped, his overseer once in a drunken fit, knocked out two of his teeth. When he came away, he had 25 dollars to help him with, which he saved by working on the Sabbath!

Volcanoes.

The word volcano is said to be derived from Vulcan, a heathen God. We will not give our readers a particular history of this fabulous deity, but only say that he was the god of fire, and is represented as a great blacksmith, working melted irons. He is said to have manufactured thunder-bolts for Jupiter. Our readers will understand that this is all fiction.

We said the word volcano, was derived from Vulcan, because Vulcan was the god of fire, and a volcano is a burning mountain, which roars like dreadful thunders, and vomits out streams of liquid fire and smoke, withering and destroying all around. It is said that there are about two hundred known volcanoes. They are generally near the sea, but this is not always the case. Jorullo, one of the burning mountains of the Andes, is more than a hundred miles from the sea.

Volcanoes have sometimes been known to throw out water and mud. Sometimes they send up immense volumes of steam, which, as it is condensed or cooled by the surrounding air, falls down in torrents of rain. When fire and lava is vomited out, the scene is dreadful; masses of red hot rocks and stones are thrown several hundreds of feet into the air, presenting an awful aspect in the night.

The eruptions generally take place periodically, or at intervals. Stromboli is said to have burned over two thousand years without intermission, while some others are said to have been dormant from one thousand to seventeen hundred years, and then to have broken out anew. Whole cities have been sometimes destroyed by eruptions.

How wonderful, children, are the works of God! If such dreadful fires burn within the bowels of the earth, how soon would the whole be destroyed, should He who made the world, let loose all the chained agents which are bound together in it by the laws of creation?

PROSPECTUS

OF THE

LITERARY EMPORIUM.

A COMPENDIUM OF

Religious, Literary, and Philosophical Knowledge

We shall be modest in our pretensions, while we give as true a description of our intended course as we can, in plain English. In the first place, light literature will find no place in its pages, i. e. love tales, literary trash, &c. In the second place, sectarianism will not be admitted into the Emporium; that is to say, it will favor no particular denomination of Christians; but we do not mean by this that it will not advocate the religion of the Bible. It is intended that it shall do this, and in the strongest terms. It will urge the necessity not only of a change of heart, but of a virtuous and holy life, in order to be truly happy in this world, and to be prepared for that which is to come. It is intended that its religious matter shall be of such a nature as will be calculated to cultivate, to inspire and please a good and correct taste—that which will inform, expand, and elevate the mind, and also excite in the soul love to God, holiness, virtue, and humanity. In regard to its literary character, it is designed to be of such a nature as to water the thirsty soul that is studiously endeavoring to acquire a knowledge of man in his past and present condition; also, some information in relation to the different sciences and arts, and the variety of the works of nature, with such miscellaneous reading as will invigorate the faculties of the mind, give scope to the imagination, while it shall address itself to the good sense of all who desire to be truly elevated by reading.

Each Number contains 32 pages of handsome paper and type; it also contains splendid plates; is published monthly, at $1 a year, if paid in advance. One third allowed to persons who procure subscribers for the work. Good agents wanted to circulate the Emporium. All letters, orders, &c., should be addressed to

We have placed at the head of our article quite a formidable array of pamphlets. We have done this, in order to show those whose views we may feel it our duty to oppose, that all the arguments and facts which they have been able to compress into some ten or twelve publications, are fully within our reach. That these publications, be they great or small, good or bad, true or false, are the proper and legitimate awards of honest critisms, none can doubt.

The article that stands at the head of the list, is an elaborate and rather spirited appeal to the Baptists in the United States, charging them with a deliberate and habitual violation of the fourth commandment, because they do not keep the seventh day holy. Twenty thousand copies have been ordered for gratuitous distribution! Tracts, proclaiming the same serious charges, are given to the winds, and scattered broad-cast over the land. Missionaries are sent forth to proclaim to the deluded and wicked members and ministers of the "First Day" churches, that all are sinning most grievously against the Lord of heaven, because they do not sabbatize on the seventh day! This, to say the least of it, is a begging of the question. What good can such publications be expected to accomplish? They can only strengthen the hands of infidelity, and remove the restraints of public morality. The great body of the Christian church in this country, of all sects and parties, is now making strong and united efforts to produce a better and more general observance of the Sabbath of the Land, and as they honestly believe, the Sabbath of God. Whilst they are doing all they can to influence mankind to obey the commandments of Jehovah, and especially the fourth command, here we see a body of the professed followers of Jesus Christ, putting forth every effort to convince the world that all or nearly all who do now, or have, for the last eighteen hundred years professed and honored the name and revered the religion of Jesus Christ, have been in error on this subject. They say the law is, "The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord;" that neither Jesus Christ nor his apostles ever changed, or had a right to change, the time of keeping the Sabbath; that the keeping of the seventh day is a part of the moral law; that the keeping of the first day is anti-Protestant; that it is one of the signs of the beast; that it hinders the progress of true Christianity. The men who utter and propagate such sentiments may be honest in their views, but they are unquestionably doing more harm than good. They may think, like Paul, that they are doing God a service, but, like that once infatuated Jew, they are doing all in their power to injure the cause of religion.

From the Minutes of the last Conference of the Seventh-Day Baptists, held at Hatfield, [Plainfield,] New Jersey, Sept. 1843, we learn that they have in their connection 59 churches, 49 ministers (ordained), 20 licentiates, in all 69, and 6,077 members in the United States. The preachers of this sect seem, at this very time, to be making more systematic and vigorous efforts for the dissemination of their peculiar notions, than have perhaps ever been made in any age or country. Dogmatism and unfounded assertions are palmed upon the public as unanswerable arguments. These circumstances seem to require an impartial examination into the merits of the case. We design merely to throw out a few hints in relation to the most important features of this controversy. Hence we shall endeavor to show:

I. That the apostles of Jesus, Christ did uniformly in their lifetime celebrate the first day of the week as the Sabbath. If we can show that the appostles did celebrate the first day, and not the seventh, and if we believe that they were divinely inspired, then it must follow that the change was made by the sanction of Jesus Christ, either expressed or implied, unless we adopt the absurd position that inspired messengers of heaven, whose express business it was (Matth. 28: 20) to teach the commandments of Jesus Christ to all nations, could err. If God commanded all men, from the giving of the law downwards, to keep holy the Sabbath, and the apostles did not keep that day holy unto the Lord, (and there is no evidence that they did) then it follows that they (although all orthodox Christians admit their inspiration) lived in the habitual violation of the fourth commandment. This is one of the absurdities into which Sabbatarianism drives us!

The Sabbatarians contended that the fourth commandment, not only in its spirit, but also in its letter, is a part of the moral law, and that it cannot be abrogated, and must therefore be binding on us; that εν μια των σαββατων does not mean "on the first day of the week," but "on one of the sabbaths." Swedenborg also maintains this translation, although a First Day Christian. The main question in this controversy is this, viz. Is the observance of the fourth commandment in all its circumstantial exactitude, a part of the moral law, or is it only in its moral spirit, and ceremonial in its letter? Dr. Gill says, "The law of observing the seventh day Sabbath is not of a moral nature, if it were it would be binding upon all mankind, Jews as well as Gentiles, and could not have been dispensed with, nor abolished." In loco. Dr. Gill's distinction is a very nice one, although he gives no proof in its support. The Seventh-day Baptists are not satisfied with mere human opinions, they want proof from God's word. Nor are they satisfied with our translation; they want a fair translation. They shall have it. Let us examine John 20: 19. Ουσης ουν οψιας τη ημερα εκεινη τη μια των σαββατων. Before attempting a fair translation of these words, we shall furnish the reader with a specimen of Sabbatarian philology, from the Sabbath Vindicator, Vol. I, No. 2, August, 1840. Here it is. "From Acts 20: 7, which in our English version reads thus: 'And upon the first day of the week, when the disciples came together to break bread, Paul preached unto them,' it is inferred, that the first day of the week was the day usually devoted to breaking of bread and preaching. But this translation of the text is not authorized by the literal or intended sense of the original, εν δε τη μια των σαββατων, to which we object, because its proper and literal signification is, 'and on one of the Sabbaths.'" Now to prove that the man who wrote this criticism either did not understand the Greek, or wickedly endeavored to pervert the word of God, we refer to John 20: 1, τη δε μια των σαββατων, "but on one of the Sabbaths." Would not this be as good a translation as the other? And yet would it not destroy the very sense of the passage? Does not the Evangelist intend to convey the idea that Christ arose on the first day of the week, and not on one of the sabbaths? If the learned philologist who wrote such nonsense will look into any lexicon, he will find that σαββατων, both in the singular and plural, means, not only a sabbath, and the Sabbath, but also a week or a period of seven days. But then this modern Porson goes on and betrays his ignorance of the Greek still more glaringly: "Thus δε answers to the conjunction, and, εν to the (not proposition, but) preposition, in, on, or upon; μια is the Greek word for one, in the fem. gen., singular num., dative case, and therefore cannot govern των σαββατων, which is in the gen. plural, neuter gen. Hence the necessity of supplying the word ημερα, a day, with which μια agrees; and we shall therefore read 'one of the sabbaths.'" This is certainly a new system of philology! We would merely say "en passant," if those men who are so vigorously pressing the claims of the seventh day upon our attention, wish to make any impression upon us with philological arguments, they must study the Greek grammar more carefully. But to proceed with a translation of John 20: 19. The following, we contend, is a literal, and the only correct translation which can be made. "Now being late in the evening, that first day of the week," or perhaps thus, "Now the evening being far spent on that first day of the week." That the disciples had met on this occasion for religious worship is admitted on all hands. That they met for the same purpose on the following first day, or eight days afterwards, is evident from verse 26. That they met on the seventh day cannot be substantiated any where. That they did not meet on the seventh day is very probable from a number of circumstances connected with the sacred narrative. It appears from the narrative that Thomas was absent on the meeting of the first evening; when those who were present saw him, they informed him of what had occurred, and he seems to have been deeply interested in the facts stated; when they came together again, Thomas was there also. Now it seems very evident that there was no meeting on the seventh day, preceding the second meeting, for if there had been, surely Thomas would have been there! If the disciples did meet on the seventh day it is very certain that the Saviour was not with them; but it is positively certain that he honored them with his presence on the first day of the week. Let this fact go for what it is worth. Now the question very naturally occurs, why did the disciples meet on the first day of the week [and not on the seventh? As Jesus had given his apostles private instructions on many points, may he not have informed them of his will on the subject of the Sabbath? Who dare to affirm that it was the will of Jesus that his disciples should meet for religious worship, and should sabbatize on the seventh day, and that they positively disobeyed him in this respect? But we are told, "The moral law is unchangeable, the keeping of the seventh day is a part of the moral law, and therefore it is binding on all men, and must be observed through all coming time." Let us examine this position. Christ says, Matt. 5: 17, "Think not that I am come to destroy the law; I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil," πληρωσαι. Ex. πληρω, to complete, to make perfect, to supplying what is wanting, to explain. See Rom. 15: 19, Col. 1: 25. That the meaning is to make the moral law better understood, to set it in a clearer light, to give it a larger and more comprehensible and spiritual meaning, is very evident from Matt. 5: 27 and 28: "Thou shalt not commit adultery; but I say, whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery." Here we have an instance of Christ's manner of fulfilling the law: he makes it more general and universal in its application; he explains it in a wider sense. He does not destroy the law, but fulfils it in all its extent. Now as there is nothing in the nature of the seventh day to prevent its being changed to the first, and as the change of time could not in any way affect (so far as we can see) the great moral and natural question of the Sabbath; and there are many strong reasons, aside from the example of the apostles, why the first day of the week should be observed and honored as the Sabbath of the new dispensation; the great probability is that it was changed by the Saviour himself. This position is very much strengthened by what Christ says, in Mark 2: 28, "The Son of man is Lord also of the Sabbath." The meaning of this passage is, that Jesus Christ, to whom all power in heaven and on earth was given, had an absolute right to do, on and with the Sabbath, what he pleased. To say as Seventh-Day Baptists do, that Jesus Christ himself had no right to change the time of keeping the Sabbath, is, to say the least of it, a daring attack upon his divinity, it is treading on dangerous ground, it savors of Arianism! We have seen above, that the change from the seventh to the first day was actually made; now whether it was made by an express command of Jesus Christ, or by the united concurrence of his inspired apostles, does not seem to be very material; for the apostles had the promise of the Holy Ghost who should guide them into all truth. But let us see whether they did invariably meet on the first day. We affirm that they did, as Christians sabbatize on the first day. If they did not hold their religious meetings on the first day, then they had no Sabbath at all, for there is no evidence that they sabbatized on the seventh day. That the Jews, in Judea and in the countries whither they had gone, kept the seventh day, all admit; and that the Jewish converts might have rested on the seventh day in conformity to the usages of their country is very probable. But that the heathen converts ever considered, or were taught to consider the seventh day sacred unto the Lord, either in Jerusalem or out of it, we defy any man to prove, Yet this is the point that must be proved, before we can give up the first-day Sabbath.

In Acts 2: 1, we have another meeting on the first day. That the day of Pentecost was on the first day, or the Christian Sabbath, is proved to demonstration by Doddridge, (Expositio in loco.) Here then we find the apostles of our Lord, in the course of forty-nine days, at three different religious meetings, all on the first day of the week, and no intimation that they met at any time on the seventh day, or that they rested or sabbatized on that day. Does not this seem very remarkable? Why is this? The plain inference is, that the apostles considered resting and attending religious worship on the first day, equivalent to the full observance of the fourth commandment. And is it safe, is it proper, is it wise, in us, to say they were wrong? Let us examine another strong passage in our favor. Acts 20: 7, εν δε τη μια των σαββατων, upon the first (day) of the week," for we stated that "σαββατων" means the hebdomadal week. In Luke 18: 12, we have, Νηστευω δις του σαββατου. "I fast twice in the week. Would it not be nonsense to say, "I fast twice on the Sabbath?" Did not the Saviour know the usus loquendi of σαββατον? In this passage nothing can be predicated, but the hebdomadal week. In Mark 16: 9, we have πρωτη σαββατου. This, according to the Sabbatarians, should read, "Now when Jesus was risen on the first day of the Sabbath." Would not such a version destroy the very sense of the passage? The Evangelist was just telling us that Jesus did not arise on the Sabbath, but the Seventh-Day Baptist, in order to make out his case, makes the Evangelist swallow his own words, and makes him prove the very thing he is trying to disprove?

We come now to εις μια σν. This numeral adjective is one of the strong holds of Sabbatarians. It is used, they say, two hundred and ninety times in the New Testament, and in every case as a cardinal; and is uniformly so translated, only where the attempt is made, to prove the first day of the week the Sabbath of God. That εις generally means 'one,' we readily admit, but that it is sometimes used as an ordinal, we will not attempt to prove. Dr. Stockius, one among the most learned lexicographers of the last century, in his "Clavis Linguæ N. T.," says, "Εις, μια, εν, unus, una, unum, primus, a, um, quidam. Pro numerali, ordinali, etiom legitur apud Polybium, p. 1401, εν τη μια και εικοστη βιβλω. In primo et vicesimo libro." That by μια των σαββατων we are to understand the first day of the week, or the Christian Sabbath, seems to be evident. If εις μια εν των σαββατων does not mean the first day of the week in the New Testament, then there is no evidence in the New Testament that Jesus rose on that day. Now if Jesus did arise on the first day of the week, as all reasonable men, whether Sabbatarians or anti-Sabbatarians, must admit; then it follows that the apostles met on the same day for religious worship, and they met eight days afterward—and they met on the day of Pentecost—and they met at Troas (Acts 20: 7) on the same day. If this is not a chain of evidence, then there is no such thing to be found in the Bible. Nor will it invalidate the force of this reasoning, to say, as the Sabbatarians do, that from the day of Pentecost to the meeting of Troas, twenty-six years had elapsed; for the length of time between the two points, only shows the uniformity of the practice to greater advantage. Some ten or twelve years after the outpouring of the Spirit at Jerusalem, we are told in Acts 13: 14, that Paul preached at Antioch in the Jewish synagogue on the Sabbath, i. e. on the seventh day. This was quite natural, it is hardly to be expected that a congregation of wicked and prejudiced Jews (such as the last part of the chapter shows those of Antioch to have been) would worship on the Christian Sabbath. Paul availed himself of the opportunity afforded by their coming together on the seventh day, to proclaim Jesus to them. But is there any thing said about the breaking of bread at Antioch? The meeting at Antioch was a Jewish and not a Christian meeting, and as every rational man would suppose, was held on the Jewish Sabbath. The same may be said of the meeting by the river-side at Philippi.

Now let us look at 1 Cor. 16: 2. Κατα μιαν σαββατων, Upon the first day of the week, not upon one of the Sabbaths. "That there be no gathering when I come." The Corinthian Christians were in the habit of meeting on the first day of the week. They were heathen converts, and evidently kept the first day, and they must have done it at the instigation of the apostles, who planted the Christian church among them. Human tradition is here out of the question. If the example and instructions of the inspired apostles are human traditions, then are we guilty of "teaching for doctrines the commandments of men." Dr. Mosheim, Ch. His., vol. i. p. 45, says: "In the first century all Christians were unanimous in setting apart the first day of the week, on which the Saviour arose from the dead, for the solemn celebration of public worship. This pious custom, which was derived from the church of Jerusalem, was founded upon the express appointment of the apostles, who themselves consecrated that day to the same sacred purpose, and was observed universally, as appears from the united testimony of the most credible writers. The seventh day was also observed as a festival, not by the Christians in general, but only by such churches as were principally composed of Jewish converts." This quotation proves the very point we have been endeavoring to establish. Dr. G. F. Seiler, one of the most learned and impartial writers of Germany, says in his Tabellen, Cent. I., "Van feyerte den Sabbath fast an den meisten orten nech mit den Juden wenigsten in Palistina bis auf die Zertorung Jerusalems. An den Tagen des Hern hielten die Christen aber auch feyerliche Zusammen kunfte." This was no doubt the true state of the case. About twenty years after the destruction of Jerusalem, John, in Rev. 1: 10, says, "I was in the spirit on the Lord's day." Every Christian in those days knew what day was intended. It was the holy day on which all Christians worshipped God; it was the day spoken of by David as the "day that God had blessed;" it was the day on which the Lord rose from the dead; the day on which the apostles first met their risen Saviour; the day on which Thomas had thrust his hand into the wounded side of his Lord and his God; the day on which the Holy Ghost was poured out upon the infant church; the day on which the disciples habitually celebrated the Lord's supper; the day on which the Corinthian church regularly met for divine service.

In the apostolic age, the propriety of celebrating the first day was never called in question. Now as other matters of less importance often caused bitter contentions, such as the eating of meats, circumcision, the keeping of Jewish festivals, (Rom. 14: 5,) etc., and as no difficulty ever arose about the Sabbath, the strong presumption is, that this matter was settled by the Lord himself, and the apostles had nothing to do but to keep the first day in honor of Christ's resurrection, and teach all that loved the Saviour to do the same. That the first day was sacredly observed, and observed too as the Sabbath, in the age immediately following that of the apostles, is abundantly proved by the [illegible]. Thus Ignatius, (Epis. ad Magnes.,) about A. D. 100, just six years after the death of St. John, says: "Let every friend of Christ celebrate the Lord's day." He uses the same expression that John had used, την κυριακην. This day, i. e. the first day of the week, he calls the Lord's day——the day consecrated to the resurrection—the queen and prince of days." We quote from Prof. Stuart. Caius Plinius Cæcilius Secundus was born 62, A. D. His letter to Trajan was written 107, from Bithynia, just seven years after Ignatius, and eleven after John was in the spirit on the Lord's day. One of the crimes laid to the charge of the Christians in Bithynia and Pontus was, that they were "wont on a stated day to meet together before it was light, and to sing a hymn unto Christ, as to God." Now that this stated day was the Lord's day, i. e. the first day of the week, is, we think, conclusively proved above. But it may be asked, what does this prove? Why, it proves that the Christians in Bithynia and Pontus did not keep the seventh day. That the Jews, both in Jerusalem and in Pontus, met on the seventh day for divine worship, was well known both to Pliny and Trajan; and if the Christians had met upon the same day, the great probability is, that Pliny would have said so. Justin Martyr, who was born about this time in Neapolis, says, "On the Lord's day all Christians in the city and in the country meet together, because that is the day of our Lord's resurrection; then they who are able and willing give what they think proper for the orphans and widows." This quotation is from Calmet, and throws a flood of light on 1 Cor. 16: 2 and Rev. 1: 10. Irenæus, a disciple of Polycarp, 197, says, "On the Lord's day, every one of us Christians keeps the Sabbath." This is a strong testimony in favor of the change of the Sabbath from the seventh to the first day. The fact is, there is no getting over it. Theophilus of Antioch, 162, says, "Both custom and reason challenge from us that we should honor the Lord's day, seeing on that day that it was our Lord Jesus Christ completed his resurrection from the dead." Dionysius of Corinth, 170, says, "To day we celebrate the Lord's day." Tertullian, 192, says, "The Lord's day is the holy day of the Christian church."

This is enough. We do not wish to come down to a later period. From these quotations, it appears evident that the Christians in the first and second centuries, did invariably observe the first day of the week as the Sabbath. If we, who observe the first day, are wrong, we err in good company. If we are wrong, we have been led into error by the holy apostles and martyrs—by the united testimony of all the best men that ever lived in the Christian church. That we keep the day that meets the approbation of the great Head of the church, may be inferred from the fact that he causes his blessing to rest upon those who most religiously keep it.

These hints are thrown out to induce some of your more learned correspondents to take up the subject, and give it a more thorough examination.

The Saco Baptist Repository, speaking of the 10 or 15000 persons, who within a few years have fled from this country to Canada, says—"They have left a republican country and gone to that, where there is a monarchial form of government, and there they are free. But such republicanism will be the scorn of those who may live in after ages."

KIND WORDS.

BY SOLTAIRE.

Like gentle rain upon the parched earth;
Like Heaven's sun-light in some deep lone dell;
Like mother's hope at her fair infant's birth;
Like voice of freedom in a prisoner's cell,
Or joyous warbling of a spring-time bird,
Falls on the heart a low ton'd kindly word.

The pent-up fountains of the drooping soul,
Gush forth, like sweetest music, at the sound,
And upward, onward, for the distant goal,
The faltering spirit, now, doth hopeful bound,
Wreathing its magic spell—a kindly word.

DEEDS OF OLD MEN.

From the Christian Mirror.

There are some old men who are not to be despised. Some are apt to think that none but young men can do much. I noticed, some years since, an account of a settlement of a minister, where it was observed that the settlement was interesting among this for other reasons, that the preacher was young, and therefore was likely to occupy his post for a long time. I thought this calculation was quite groundless, as it proved to be so, in a few years. Had it been said that the preacher was between forty and fifty, and was likely therefore to last well, it would have been more just. Some indeed shoot up like a rocket, and long retain their eminence; but most commonly they who shoot up like a rocket, go out like a rocket. Others rise slowly, like fixed stars, and, as they are slow to rise, they are slow to set. But whether men get to their zenith slowly or rapidly, they may be very useful, even to old age. Wickliffe, the morning star of the reformation, was most active and useful from 48 to 60 years of age. The martyr Latimer, was, in King Edward's days, a diligent preacher, and a hard student. He was at his studies about two o'clock in the morning, summer and winter, though his body had been bruised by the fall of a tree, and he was about sixty-seven years of age. Cromwell was only a captain when he was 41, and his greatest deeds were performed between 47 and 59, when he died. Young was an old man when he wrote some of his best poetry, and he was sixty when he began his Night Thoughts. Thomas Scott wrote as much at 70, as at any period of his life. What a wonderful old man Talleyrand was! To eighty years of age he stood at the head of affairs in France under Napoleon, and then under the Bourbons, and fight the French before the walls of Moscow; they put old Kutusof at the head of the army in the place of Barclay de Tolley. Old Blucher was 70 when he was defeated at Ligny, and fell under his horse, and the French cavalry rode over him, and yet, a day or two after, he led on the Prussians against Napoleon at Waterloo. After many years of warfare, those old men, Wellington and Soult, stood at the head of the cabinet, one in England, and the other in France, preserving, by their talent, the peace of Europe and the world.

Now go back to ancient times, and see the Apostle John writing his book of Revelation when he was 90 years old. Isaiah, resembling John in his inspired thoughts, prophesied for 60 years. How astonishing was the energy of old Jehoiada in accomplishing a revolution in Judah, when he was 100 years of age! And there is old Moses; he accomplished his amazing labors between 80 and 120. Surely God has honored old men. Men may become superannuated at fifty, but they may, by the grace of God, do their greatest works between fifty and seventy. I may then be humbled for my infirmities of body, mind, and spirit, but not that I am an OLD MAN.

A SLAVE'S COMMENTARY.

A slave was sent to meeting with a particular charge from his master to remember what the minister said, so as to give an account of it when he returned. The master had a son named Jonathan, to whose orders the slave was also subject. Pomp accordingly went to meeting, and was questioned by his master, on his return.

"Gorry, massa," said he, "minister tell two great lies."

"What! what!" exclaimed the master, "you mustn't talk so about the minister! What do you mean?"

"Why, minister say, 'No man serve two massas,' and I know I serve you and massa Jonathan too."

"Well, what else did he say?"

"Why he say, 'He will love one and hate the other.' Dat am a lie too; for I hate you both alike!"

"A SHARE IN THE CONCERN."—One evening, as a little sweep was running along the street, a big sweep met him, and shouted, "Halloo, Jack, where are you going in such a hurry?" Little Jack said, "Don't bother me now; I am going to the missionary meeting. I've got a share in the concern, and I want to see how things are going on." This little sweep was connected with a Sunday-School, and was a contributor to the missionary society; hence he could say, he had a share in the concern. Are there not boys of respectable families, who have no share in this concern?

There is, says Prideaux, in the church of St. Dominic, in Bononia, a copy of the Hebrew Scriptures kept with a great deal of care, which they pretend to be the original copy, written by Ezra himself, and therefore, it is there valued at so high a rate that great sums of money have been borrowed by the Bononians upon the pawn of it, and repaid for its redemption. It is written in a very fair character, upon a sort of leather, and made up in a roll, according to the ancient manner, but it having the vowel points annexed, and the writing being very fresh and fair, without any decay, both these particulars prove the novelty of the copy.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, July 3, 1845.

ON THE CHANGE OF THE SABBATH FROM THE SEVENTH TO THE FIRST DAY OF THE WEEK BY APOSTOLIC EXAMPLE.

An article with the above heading, from the pen of Rev. Mr. WEISER, will be found on the first page of our paper to-day. We have placed it there that our readers may enjoy the full benefit of whatever light it emits, and may also have it at hand for future reference. Mr. Weiser has expended his strength mainly in criticising the "Address to the Baptists," and an article in the Sabbath Vindicator on the translation of "First Day of the Week." We have no disposition to follow him through his elaborate critique upon those two articles, but prefer leaving that work to be done by the writers of the articles themselves. Indeed, we are half disposed to pass the whole thing in silence, because we are inclined to think that its own groundless assertions, and inconclusive reasonings, and illogical conclusions, will furnish its best refutation. There are, however, several things which seem to us extraordinary, upon which we will venture to say a few words.

Mr. Weiser betrays in the outset the motive which has led him into the discussion. The efforts of Sabbath-keepers have become so formidable that he cannot allow them to go unrebuked. We thank him for the confession, that however much some men may affect to despise their efforts, they nevertheless keenly feel their influence and writhe under it. But it surprises us, that after such a confession he should immediately, even in the same paragraph, inquire, "What good will they do?" What good, Mr. Weiser? Why, just exactly the good they were intended to do, namely, call attention to the subject, and lead persons here and there to practice according to the precepts of Scripture instead of the traditions of men. We own, however, that it is difficult for us to sympathize with that spirit which must be insured that a certain religious truth will be profitable before it is willing to investigate it. It seems a little too much like making a gain of godliness. It always reminds us of that man who, on being told that a friend had become pious and commenced studying for the ministry, immediately inquired, What does he expect to make by that? Such questions are in keeping with a kind of Christian philosophy which prevails extensively, and are not therefore to be wondered at.

But does Mr. W. really believe, as he intimates in the same paragraph, that the observers of the first day "are doing all they can to influence mankind to observe the commandments of Jehovah?" Perhaps he does; but we are compelled to dissent from such a belief. The commandment says, "The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God: in it thou shalt not do any work." But they teach that the first day is the Sabbath, and that men may work as much as they please on the seventh day. The commandment gives as a reason for keeping the seventh day, that the Lord "rested the seventh day." But they give as a reason for observing the first day, that Christ rose from the dead on that day. Here then they change both the day of the Sabbath, and the reason for its observance. Is this the way to do all they can to secure obedience to the commandments of Jehovah? Monstrous absurdity! The man who propagates such an opinion may be honest in holding it, but he is certainly in error.

The next paragraph contains a statement which we have read with some surprise. It is this, that in the efforts of Sabbath-keepers for the dissemination of their peculir notions, "Dogmatism and unfounded assertions are palmed upon the public as unanswerable arguments." One would naturally expect, after such a declaration, that the writer of it would give some evidence of its truth, or at least that he would show some of those "unfounded assertions" which are "palmed upon the public as unanswerable arguments." But this he does not attempt; hence we must regard his assertion as another illustration of the old maxim, that men always suspect in others that which they find in themselves.

We hardly know what to say to Mr. Weiser's fourth paragraph. It so mixes up things entirely different from each other, that we find it difficult to separate them. He first tells us that "the main question in this controversy is, Is the observance of the fourth commandment in all its circumstantial exactitude a part of the moral law, or is it only moral in its spirit, and ceremonial in its letter?" Now in order to make the use he designs of this statement of the question, he must reason thus—The fourth commandment requires the observance of the seventh day; but the fourth commandment is only moral in its spirit and ceremonial in its letter; therefore keeping the first day is obedience to the fourth commandment. Just as though, in order to get the spirit of the fourth commandment, it was necessary to depart as far as possible from the letter!

A few sentences farther on comes up the subject of a "fair translation." Mr. Weiser speaks unwittingly, as we think, when he says in regard to a new translation of Acts 20: 7, that "the man who wrote this criticism either did not understand the Greek, or wickedly endeavored to pervert the word of God." Mr. W. probably knew that the translation he so boldly condemned corresponds almost exactly with the translation of the Bishops, Coverdale, Cranmer, and William Tyndale—translations against which a wise man, we think, would be slow to bring such a railing accusation. If he did not know it, he will perhaps judge more charitably of the translation hereafter.

Mr. W.'s argument for the first day, in the same paragraph, from the appearances of Christ to his disciples on that day, is not only inconclusive, but requires him studiously to disregard the fact that Christ appeared to his disciples on other than first days. He met them at one time when they were fishing, and was seen of them forty days after his crucifixion. Now if the mere fact of Christ's appearing to his disciples on the first day argues its sabbatic character, why not apply this rule to other days, and so make the fishing day, and indeed the whole forty, to have been Sabbath days? It is in this connection that Mr. W. asserts, without qualification, that "there is no evidence that they [the apostles] sabbatized on the seventh day." We hope he thinks so, but we really do not see how he can, with a Bible before him which plainly records about thirty meetings on the seventh day, and informs us by plication of nearly three hundred more. The whole argument in favor of the first day from the appearances of Christ to his apostles, rests upon an imaginary basis, and is held together by a chain with here and there imagimary or at least invisible links. How any Christian can allow such an argument to weigh against a "thus saith the Lord," we know not.

Mr. Weiser's concluding argument is drawn from the fact that "in the apostolic age, the propriety of celebrating the first day was never called in question." This argument, he thinks, derives additional weight from the fact that no difficulty ever arose about the Sabbath, although "other matters of less importance often caused bitter contentions, such as the eating of meats, circumcision, the keeping of Jewish festivals, etc." This he regards as indicating, that the matter was settled by the Lord himself. Now permit us to frame another supposition: In the apostolic age the propriety of celebrating the seventh day was never called in question; but the Jews of that time were very strict about the Sabbath, ready to contend for circumcision and the Jewish festivals, and would certainly have complained of the Christians if they had neglected the Sabbath; therefore, the Christians must have observed the Sabbath. We leave it with any candid mind to decide, if our supposition is not the more reasonable of the two. But we do not believe that the Sabbath of the Lord needs the support of any such suppositions. These are only needed when a humanly-devised institution is to be supported. This Mr. Weiser evidently felt; hence his effort to make this appear an important argument.

We have already said more than we intended about Mr. Weiser's article—more, we fear, than it really deserved. If the writer had undertaken seriously and fairly to answer the arguments of the Tracts he professes to review, we should have had patience fully to answer him. But instead of doing this, he has contented himself with selecting here and there a mere non-essential statement, and then battling it as though it involved the whole question at issue between those who observe the seventh day and those who observe the first day. In proof of this, notice the fact that his main strength, and the great bulk of his article, is expended upon the question of a "fair translation"—a question which, in the article he was reviewing, is distinctly stated to be not essential to the support of the claims of the seventh day. Then notice also how often he changes and how seldom he meets the true issue. If the Tracts assert that the fourth commandment requires the observance of the seventh day, he replies that the commandment is moral in its spirit but ceremonial in its letter—which is just no answer at all to the position of the Tracts. If they assert that there is not a passage in the Bible to warrant a change of the Sabbath from the seventh to the first day of the week, he replies by attempting to show that Christ met with his disciples several times on the first day! If they prove from Scripture and history that the apostles and early Christians kept the Sabbath, his reply is that Paul broke bread on the first day of the week, and John was in the spirit on the Lord's day! Indeed, though we have twice read Mr. Weiser's article with a good degree of care, we do not remember a single instance in which he has fairly stated and answered a real question at issue between him and the Tracts he is reviewing. He has asserted enough and denied enough in all conscience; but to prove his assertions or make good his denials he seems either unable or indisposed. In such circumstances, we feel free from all necessity or obligation to enter upon a more thorough review of his elaborate and truly extraordinary production.

THE AMERICAN PEACE SOCIETY held its Seventeenth Anniversary in Boston on the 26th of May last. It appears from the Annual Report that a depository has been maintained, several lecturers have been employed, and some millions of tract pages have been distributed. A plan has lately been adopted for securing the influence of the periodical press by furnishing short popular articles on the subject of peace for publication in the papers generally. This plan seems to be well received, and will undoubtedly do much to promote the object for which the Peace Society was organized. From reading the Report before us, as well as from facts which have come under our own notice, we judge that the evils of war and the advantages of general peace are coming to be more justly appreciated. God speed the day when the nations shall learn war no more.

PROGRESS OF MR. NEWMAN AND THE NEWMANIACS.—The English papers received by the last mail, have considerable to say about the Romish tendencies of Puseyism, as illustrated by the course of Rev. Mr. Newman and his followers. It had been currently reported that Mr. Newman, and eleven other members of the Oxford University, had openly embraced the faith and doctrines of the Church of Rome. But it appears from the best authorities, that Mr. Newman has not as ye embraced the Catholic faith, although he no longer makes his intention of doing so a secret. Should he secede from the English and join the Roman Church, it is more than probable that his example will be followed by many over whom he possesses more than ordinary influence. For our own part, we should deem such a result an occasion for rejoicing rather than sorrow. It would remove from the English church a bone of contention, and at the same time prove, what the Dissenters have always maintained, that the doctrines and practices of the English Church are essentially Romanish.

"GATHER UP THE FRAGMENTS."

Some months ago we published, under the above heading, several extracts from an old book on the subject of the Sabbath, entitled "An Answer to Mr. Wadsworth." We did not then know the date of the book or the name of its author, and therefore requested information in regard to both those questions. Mr. JOSEPH TRUMAN, of Preston, N. Y., has kindly furnished us with precisely the information we wanted, for which we thank him, and from which we gather the following facts:—

[illegible] was a New England minister of some notoriety, and the answer to him was written by Mr. SAMUEL BEEBEE 1st, who flourished in the latter part of the sixteenth or beginning of the seventeenth century. It is probable that he lived on Plumb Island, from the fact that his son, Samuel Beebee 2d, afterwards lived upon that Island, and owned the whole of it. Report says, that there were three brothers, of whom Samuel, the oldest, had received a liberal education. Besides his book in answer to Mr. Wadsworth on the subject of the Sabbath, Mr. Beebee wrote a book directed to the Clergy of New England, against the mode of paying ministers by a legal tax. It is said that he had suffered the loss of considerable property in that way, which might have led to his writing on the subject. The sentiments of both his books were so unpopular that he could not get them printed in Connecticut, and hence was compelled to resort to Boston for that purpose. It is not known at what time he died, or where he was buried. But his wife was buried in the old burial ground on Brown's Hill, in Oysterpond, now known as Orient. After an absence from the place for forty years, Mr. Truman visited her grave about three years ago. He found the tombstone much mutilated and defaced, which was done long ago by some evil-minded persons, because she was a Sabbath-keeper, and the wife of a Sabbath-keeper of so much distinction. The corners or ears of the stone are entirely broken off, and some words are nearly obliterated. The inscription was probably written by her husband, Mr. Samuel Beebee, and a part of it reads as follows:—

"Here lies Elizabeth,
One Samuel Beebee's wife,
Who once was made a living soul,
But now's bereft of life."

* * * * *

"Lived five-and-forty years a wife,
Was aged sixty-seven,
Has now laid down her mortal life,
In hopes to live in heaven."

Mr. Beebee's son Samuel, and his four grandsons, Nathan, Silas, Amon, and Thophilus, lived on Plumb Island. Forty-seven years ago, a large number of persons removed from the east end of Long Island, or Oysterpond, to Newport, Herkimer Co., N. Y. Forty of them, of whom Mr. Truman was one, traced their descent from Samuel Beebee. At that time Mr. Truman possessed a perfect copy of the book in reply to Mr. Wadsworth, and also the book addressed to the Clergy of New England. But they both passed from his hands, and have not since been discovered. It is not impossible that they may now be in the possession of some of the descendants of Samuel Beebee, a large number of whom are living in Newport, Russia, and Poland, Herkimer Co., N. Y., under the various names of Beebe, King, and Newbury. The books have long been rare, and highly esteemed among the descendants of the author.

☞ We publish the foregoing account for the double purpose of eliciting farther information in regard to Mr. Beebee's books, and of showing what kind of information we want in regard to all the early Sabbath-keeping authors and preachers. It is exceedingly desirable, that our aged brethren who possess facts and records which may be made of service, should put them in a shape to be used. If once written down, no matter how roughly, they can be preserved and made available at any future time.

HOW TO SEND MONEY TO PUBLISHERS UNDER THE NEW POSTAGE LAW.—The new postage law is now in operation, and under it the Post Master General has adopted the following rule:—

"Money for newspaper subscriptions, not exceeding $10 in each case, may be paid to a postmaster for the purpose of being paid to the publisher of a newspaper at any other office. The postmaster is, in such case, to give to the person paying the money, a receipt therefor, and to advise forthwith the postmaster who is to pay said amount of such deposit. Upon presentation of this receipt the amount is to be paid over. The postmaster receiving the amount is to debit himself therewith in his account, and the postmaster paying that amount is to credit himself therewith in his account of contingent expenses."

Now if you should want to send us money—(as we sincerely hope you will)—all that will be necessary will be, just to deposit the money with your own postmaster; take his receipt for it on a letter sheet; write what you please in the letter, only don't write on the back of the receipt; and send it to "GEO. B. UTTER, No. 9 Spruce St., N. Y." As soon as we receive it, we will call on the postmaster and get the money, and the next mail shall bring you a receipt for it. Isn't that first rate? Just try it and see how it will work.

ADVENTISM.—We find in the "Morning Watch," an account of a Second Advent Conference recently held in Boston. Considerable was said about the necessity of stating distinctly the present belief of the Adventists, in order to protect them against the calumnies heaped upon them. A resolution was passed repudiating many of the conflicting sentiments and practices now taught by some who claim to be Adventists, such as that the door of mercy is closed, that we are now within the vail, that we are under a third covenant, that we are to be baptized into it, that feet-washing is a gospel ordinance, that the salutation kiss is to be practiced in the church, with other kindred teachings. The necessity of supporting the Advent Herald was also much talked of; and resolutions were passed approving the course of Mr. Himes, and condemning those who have labored to destroy his influence and diminish the subscription list of his paper. We do not find in the report any distinct statement of the present expectations of the Adventists. But Mr. Miller stated for himself, that he "leaves the seventh month movement with his Father in heaven; he has nothing to say about it. As respects his future expectations, he could not fix on any day, nor any year—only to-day, and TO-DAY."

CONGREGATIONALISM AND PRESBYTERIANISM.

A great Convention of Congregational and Presbyterian ministers and laymen met at Detroit, Mich., on the 19th ult., and continued in session for several days. Among other subjects, the Convention spent much time in discussing the best means of securing tracts and books bearing upon the distinctive doctrines of the Presbyterian and Congregational Churches, especially upon the doctrine of Calvinism. It was maintained in the discussion, that all right practice must be founded on correct doctrinal views; and that while other denominations had been very careful to provide the means of making known and extending their belief, Presbyterians had strangely neglected this important work. Much feeling upon the subject was manifested by the different speakers, and a general determination was expressed to spare no pains in obtaining and publishing treatises to vindicate the "important doctrines of election, depravity, perseverance, &c." Prof. Stowe, of Cincinnati, after urging the measure pretty warmly, seems to have been somewhat troubled with a fear that such efforts might be regarded as sectarian. The following is his vindication of himself against such a charge: "Sound doctrinal views must lie at the basis of our efforts; and while the order to which we belong is deservedly distinguished for its charity and its freedom from sectarianism, for the sake of preserving this very catholicism, we must be careful to preserve the doctrines from which it springs; otherwise, the goose that lays the golden egg will be killed, and other geese, not half so profitable, fill the country."

TEMPERANCE CONVENTION.—A State Temperance Convention was held at Albany, N. Y., on Wednesday, June 25. The delegates in attendance were quite numerous, and included some of the earliest and most distinguished champions of the temperance cause. Resolutions were from time to time reported for the consideration of the Convention; also a brief Address to the people of the State, especially the friends of temperance, urging them to activity and fidelity in the discharge of their duties as citizens and voters in maintaining the ground gained at the last session of the Legislature. Among the speakers were Chief Justice Savage, Hon. E. D. Culver, and Rev. Dr. Nott. But the most forcible and effective speakers, it is said, were taken from the common walks of life, being blacksmiths, shoemakers, woodsawers, &c. They delineated the horrors of intemperance, and their own suffering and misery from it, in a manner altogether inimitable and irresistible.

SCHOOLS FOR COLORED CHILDREN.—Quite a discussion took place in Boston week before last relative to the exclusion of colored children from the public schools. It seems that there are in Boston two schools exclusively for colored children, where they are compelled to attend if they attend at all. A petition was presented to the Primary School Board, praying that those separate schools might be abolished, and that colored children might have the same privileges as other children. The subject was referred to a select committee, a majority of whom reported against the petition, and a minority in favor of it. This led to a warm debate, in which it was shown that the system of separate schools was founded on a wicked prejudice, which it contributed much to increase. The Board, however, adopted the majority report, and the subject will have to be brought up again.

ANTI-SLAVERY CONVENTION.—A very large and spirited Convention of the friends of freedom from the South and West was recently held in Cincinnati, Ohio. Several of the most distinguished anti-slavery men were present, and letters were read from Ex. Gov. Seward, Judge Jay, Cassius M. Clay, Elihu Burritt, and others. The deliberations of the Convention seem to have been very harmonious and interesting.

LIGHT IN DARKNESS.—An uncommon religious dearth has prevailed among the churches of our own country during the past year. It is gratifying to learn, however, that on the ocean and in foreign countries more conversions have taken place within a twelve-month, than were ever known in a single year. Revivals on ship-board have been numerous and powerful, while the labors of foreign missionaries have been attended with great success.

BAPTISTS IN CONNECTICUT.—The Anniversary of the Connecticut State Convention was held in New London, commencing on the 10th ult. It is spoken of as an interesting and refreshing interview. It appeared from the report of the Treasurer, that there had been a gratifying increase of benevolent contributions. For domestic missions within the State, $1,400 had been expended during the year. The amount raised for the various objects of benevolence had exceeded $10,000.

TESTIMONY AGAINST SLAVERY.

The Western Presbyterian and Congregational Convention at Detroit, Mich., adopted unanimously, after a discussion in which Dr. Beman of Troy, Rev. Mr. Blanchard of Cincinnati, Rev. Mr. Beecher, Prof. Stowe and others took part, the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas, the Convention held at Cleveland, June 20, 1844, did with great and most desirable unanimity record their solemn and decided testimony against the system of American Slavery as a great moral, personal and political evil, threatening the best interests and hopes of our beloved country, and declared it to be the duty of all men in all suitable ways to make known their hearty disapprobation of the system, especially by avoiding all such fellowship with those who uphold it as might imply any connivance at its perpetuity or extension; therefore,

Resolved, That the Convention (more numerously attended and covering a still wider field than the one here referred to) feel called upon at the present session, deliberately to adopt and reaffirm this decided declaration of sentiment on this great subject, and at the same time to express their unfeigned gratitude to God, that in every way, by the advances of his providence and the triumphs of his truth, by the more earnest counsels, the deeper toned remonstrances, and the increasingly fervent desires and prayers of the wise and good of all lands, touching the evil in question, he is affording us cheering tokens that he is about to establish the principles here recognized in all hearts, and to work a practical conformity thereto in all benevolent associations and operations throughout the Universal Christian church. In the prospect of such a blessed consumation, this Convention heartily rejoice, and for it as in duty bound, they will unceasingly pray.

EXPLOSION OF A BOMB SHELL.

BY JOHN S. C. ABBOT.

A few weeks ago there was an accidental explosion of a bomb shell in Charlton Street, New York. And as I chanced to be at the spot but a few moments after the explosion, I will give you a description of the terrific scene, as it met my eye. I was sitting in my house, about a quarter of a mile from the place of the explosion, at 4 o'clock, P. M. when the whole house was shaken by the report of apparently the heaviest piece of artillery. I was just preparing to go down town, and taking an omnibus, soon saw a multitude of men and boys running towards Charlton Street. In a moment more a crowd came around the corner of Charlton Street into Hudson Street, bearing the body of a well-dressed man, upon a window shutter. They crossed the street directly by the omnibus, and I observed that the whole back side of the head was blown off, and the blood and brains were dripping down upon the shutter. Perceiving indications of great excitement in the rapidly gathering crowd, and hearing exclamations of 'explosion,' 'terrible explosion,' I left the omnibus to hear the cause of the disaster. Entering Charlton Street, guided by hundreds who were rushing to that point from all quarters, I observed on both sides of the street, for a little distance, that the windows were entirely demolished, the frames in many places blown in, doors shattered, and holes blown actually through the sides of houses. In one place, forty rods, I should judge, from the place where the explosion took place, a hole was blown through the front of a frame house, large enough for a man to enter. Upon the side walk, in front of a shop of old iron, lay in disorder, some thirty or forty bomb shells, about eight inches in diameter. It was said by the crowd that a man had one of these between his knees, endeavoring to loosen the charge with a stick, when it exploded, producing this scene of destruction and carnage. The body of this man was torn to pieces, scattered in fragments through the streets. Observing a crowd gathered around an object in the street at a little distance, I approached it, and saw, apparently, a large piece of butcher's meat, which a boy was pushing about with his foot. On examining it, it proved to be the lower portion of a man's leg, with the crushed bones, and mangled flesh. 'The other leg,' said a by-stander, 'was blown over into Hudson Street.' A crowd was collected round a window-sill gazing at some object. It was a man's hand, the fingers burnt, and crushed, and blackened, having been torn from the body, and thrown with violence against the brick wall. The mangled trunk of the unfortunate man, headless and limbless, had been carried into the house, and the shrieks of his wife were heard over the bloody remains. Upon an iron window frame lay the torn and bloody body of another man. A fragment of the shell had torn away one half of his head. He was dead. His blood and brains were dripping down upon the pavement, and a day laborer had thumb and finger upon his eyes, to close them forever. Two young men who happened to be passing by in the middle of the street were literally blown up into the air, and fell with broken and mangled limbs upon the pavement. They both died, I believe, the next day. In the street lay a horse dead, and it was singular that he also had the whole of the back of his head torn off by a fragment of the shell. A beautiful wagon to which he was attached, was also demolished, the spokes of the wheels broken, and the vehicle almost torn to pieces.

Such was the devastation produced by the explosion of a single shell. And yet this shell did but perform its function. It was made for this very purpose—to destroy property and life. It was made to be thrown into the crowded streets of a city, there to explode, and blow up houses, and tear limb from limb. This was the function of the instrument. And this is war. To throw such missiles as these into the crowded streets of a city, is the business of war. As I looked upon this scene, and witnessed its carnage and woe, and reflected that it was the work of one single shell, and then reflected upon the consternation and horror which must be produced by raining down a shower of these shells upon a city, crushing their way through the roofs of the houses, exploding in the chambers of the dying, or in parlors where mothers, and daughters, and infant children are gathered in terror, never did I so deeply feel before the horrors,—the unmitigated iniquity of war; never before did I so deeply feel that it was the duty of every one who has a voice to speak, or a pen with which to write, to devote all his influence to promote the abolition of this fiend-like work.

When Napoleon, with his blood-stained army, arrived before the wall of Vienna, he planted his batteries, and in less han ten hours three thousand of these bomb shells exploded every hour, five every minute, in the streets and dwellings of this crowded metropolis. Who can imagine the terrors of that dreadful night when, amid the thunders of artillery, the cry and uproar of contending armies, and conflagrations breaking out on every side, these terrible shells, like fiery meteors with portentous glare, were streaking the air, and descending like hail stones upon the doomed city. Crashing through the roofs of the dwellings, they exploded at the fire-side, in the very cradle of the infant, blowing their mangled limbs, with fragments of their demolished homes, far and wide into the air. In this way Napoleon conquered Vienna. In this way England conquered Canton. And in this demoniac work thousands of our countrymen are now ready to engage for the acquisition of Texas and Oregon. The whole city of New York was thrown into excitement by the tale of the explosion of this one shell, and there is scarcely a newspaper in the land which did not record the dreadful story. And yet it is the business of war to cast these shells by thousands among the men and boys who crowd the ships of the navy and the merchant fleet, and among the aged men, the mothers, the maidens, and the children who throng the dwellings and the pavements of the city. O merciful God, save the nations from the horrors of war!

General Intelligence.

RHODE ISLAND.—On Friday last, June 27th, the Assembly of Rhode Island, in session at Newport, passed what is entitled "An Act to pardon certain offences against the sovereign power of this State, and to quiet the minds of the good people thereof." By this act, all persons in prison for the crime of treason may be at once set free, and may be restored to all the privileges of citizenship upon taking oath before a Justice of the Supreme Court "to bear true faith and allegiance to the State, and support the Constitution of the State." In accordance with the provisions of this Act, Thomas W. Dorr left the prison on the afternoon of Friday.

LIFE AND DEATH IN NEW YORK.—In a New York daily paper of Tuesday morning last, we find the following items in the order in which they here appear:—

On Sunday afternoon a drunken man made several attempts to throw himself from one of the Fulton Ferry boats. Some humane persons held him by the skirts of his coat. When we last saw him he was looking for a convenient place to jump from one of the docks.

Mr. L. V. Newkirk, aged about 40, after making some purchases at Washington Market yesterday morning, stepped into his wagon, and almost immediately fell back and expired. Disease of the heart is given as the cause of his death. He kept a store at 111 Suffolk street.

An inquest was held on Sunday at the dead house in the Park, on the body of an unknown man found dead on the dock at the foot of Dey st. He was seen on Saturday helping himself to ardent spirits from divers casks on the warf, by taking from them the bungs. Death caused by intemperance.

A woman named O'Neil, about 25 years of age, died on Saturday evening at No. 2 Leonard street. Cause of her death, drinking ardent spirits.

Yesterday morning about half past ten o'clock, a man named Sidmore, while driving from Greenwich street in a wagon, suddenly fell back and expired.

An unknown person was found drowned yesterday morning in the North River at the foot of Courtland street.

Mary Little, aged 44, died suddenly in 33d street near 8th avenue. Death caused by intemperance.

EXTENSIVE ROBBERY!—A carpet-bag, containing $10,000 in gold, in two bags equally divided, was sent by the American Exchange Bank, of this city, to the Meriden Bank, at Meriden, Conn., and deposited in the mate's state-room, on board the steamer New Champion, on Saturday morning last. During the passage through the Sound to New Haven, some one effected an entrance to the room, forced open the carpet-bag, and stole one of the bags, containing $5,000, with which he managed to escape, leaving the tag of the bag behind him, with the amount marked upon it.—From the fact that the thief left the other bag, as also a package of $2350 in bills for the Phœnix Bank Hartford, undisturbed, it is supposed that the robbery was effected by some green hand at the business—probably by some one employed upon the boat. A special messenger from Hartford met the boat at New Haven and received the carpet-bag, but did not discover his loss till in the cars some twenty miles from New Haven. Information was speedily conveyed to this city, and yesterday two hands on board the Champion were arrested, but as yet no clue has been discovered to the burglary.

EXECUTION OF HENRY MCCURRY.—This unfortunate man, who had offended against the laws of his country by murdering Mr. Paul Roux, at the tavern of Mr. Nolan in Baltimore, in January last, expiated his terrible offence on the gallows. The number of spectators to this scene was unusually large. The surrounding eminences outside of the jail were completely covered with men, women and children, of all ages and colors. Within the jail enclosure were also a large number. There were probably not less than fifteen or twenty thousand persons who made themselves witnesses of this painful event,

SENTENCED.—The Court of Oyer and Terminer of Jefferson County were occupied on the 18th ult., at Watertown, in the trial of George Brown, charged with the murder of Miss Jane Oaks. The prisoner is a young man about 18 years of age, and the shot which killed the young lady was fired from his rifle, according to his own account, for the purpose of merely frightening her. The jury returned a verdict of manslaughter in the third degree, and the prisoner was sentenced to the State Prison in Clinton County for four years—that being the longest period with which the offence is punishable. A QUAKER EMBASSY.—Many of our readers are aware that there has been a severe discussion, and finally, a separation, in the Indiana yearly meeting of Friends, on account of Slavery and Abolition. A number of important members became quite zealous in favor of Abolition, while most of the official leaders were opposed to the movement. The division has created great anxiety among Friends, and particularly among those of the London Yearly Meeting: for, being themselves prominent and active Abolitionists, it could not but be grievous to see the ecclesiastical power of the society in this country employed to put down what they were so earnestly laboring to advance. And on the other hand, they were reluctant to countenance what seemed to be a breach of religious order by the Abolition seceders.

This matter has been three or four years under agitation. At length the London Yearly Meeting have resolved to send a deputation of their wisest and best men to the United States, for the purpose of at once endeavoring to heal the division in Indiana, and of stirring up the minds of the body of Friends in this country to more direct and active efforts in the cause of emancipation.

The Boston Transcript mentions a new spinning frame just in operation at Lowell, which is creating quite an excitement among manufacturers. It is said to require but one half the power, and will make more yarn and of more even twist at about two thirds the expense of the other kinds of frames in use.

COLORS OF FLOWERS.—We observe in the Cincinnati Atlas an account of a beautiful experiment to test the dependence of the color of flowers upon the various salts contained in the earth. The stem of a beautiful white rose was placed in a solution of the yellow prussiate of potash for some four or five hours. It was then placed in a solution of sulphate of iron, and upon being examined the next morning the petals were changed to a delicate primrose, the leaves to a dark bluish green, and the wood of stem to a deep blue. The fragrance of the flower remained unchanged. The rationale of these singular changes seems to be as follows:—The prussiate of potash is taken up by a capillary attraction, and distributed through every part of the plant. The same is the case with the sulphate of iron. As the two solutions are brought in contact, the iron acting as a re-agent, revives the prussian blue, which forms the base of potash. This beautiful experiment can be tried by any one, care being taken that the solutions are not too strong.

AN ESCAPE.—A fugitive from the blessings and floggings of the "patriarchal institution," as they are dispensed in the city of Charleston, S. C., passed through town last week. His master, he stated to us, was a Methodist clergyman, who preached on Sunday and raced horses on week days. He had always been treated kindly himself, but last winter his master sold his wife and the mother of his two children to go to New-Orleans, and when in the phrenzy of agony at being thus torn away and separated forever, the poor slave attempted to rescue her from the hands of the purchaser, a bloodhound was set upon him and tore his flesh—for which he could not forgive his master. He leaves his two children and a mother still in bondage, and only desires for himself to labor for a living in the free air and among the free men of the North.—Springfield Gazette.

FRANCE.—Texas.—The Paris Constitutionel of May 30th says that France joins England in protesting against the annexation of Texas to the United States. It farther asserts that the English and French diplomatic agents in Texas had, in the name of their respective governments, induced the President of Texas not to convoke the Congress before the end of the month of July, or the beginning of August, promising him in the mean time to procure the recognition of Texas by Mexico, and the adoption by England of the debt of Texas, in return for a treaty to be hereafter entered into, favorable to the admission of English manufactures into that country.

To Destroy Flies.—A Correspondent of the Cincinnati Chronicle gives the following:

It is not generally known that black pepper (no-red) is a poison for many insects. The following simple mixture is the destroyer of the common house fly:—Take equal portions of fine black pepper, fresh ground, and sugar; say enough of each to cover a ten cent piece; moisten and mix well with a spoonful of milk, (a little cream is better;) keep that in your room and you will keep down your flies. One advantage over other poisons is that it injures nothing else; and another, that the flies seek the air and never die in the house—the windows being open.

Melancholy Mortality.—The Gloucester (Mass.) Telegraph records the loss of the fishing schr. Paris, which left that port on the 27th of February, and was seen a few days after on George's Bank, since which nothing has been heard of her. Since 1837 seven vessels from Gloucester, with their entire crews, comprising sixty men, have been lost on George's Bank. And these losses have occurred among the most experienced and careful masters, and the best vessels belonging to the port. The crew consisted of eight persons, all but one citizens of Gloucester.

Abduction Frustrated.—On Monday afternoon, a man from Louisville, Ky., whose name we could not learn, while passing up Market street, seized a young colored boy by the throat, and would have taken him off, had it not been for the timely interference of some of the spectators. He claimed the boy as his slave, and said he could produce papers which would prove his legal claim to him; but the crowd did not seem to understand the slaveholder, and in 'double-quick time" carried the boy off out of the reach of his master. The circumstance created a good deal of excitement at the time.

[Pittsburgh Chronicle.

Attempted Riot.—We learn from the Cincinnati Atlas that an attempt was made on the night of the 11th instant, in that city, to break up the sitting of the Abolition Convention. The police officers being present, promptly arrested two of the ring-leaders, and took them to the watch house.

While coming down with their prisoners an unsuccessful attempt was made to rescue them by a mob of persons. In the melee which followed several persons were considerably injured by being hit with brick bats, but no one was seriously hurt.

A Curious Question.—The Louisville Journal asks,—"Will it not be a decidedly curious state of the case if we get into a war with Great Britain for the privilege of promoting the slave trade between this country and Texas, and with Brazil for the purpose of suppressing the Slave Trade?"

SCORNERS.—We never yet knew the man disposed to scorn the humble, who was not himself a fair object of scorn to the humble. A man of liberal mind has a reverence for the little pride that seasons every condition, and would deem it a sacrilege to affront or abate the respect which is maintained with none of the adventitious aids.

SUMMARY.

MR. S. P. LAWTON, of Westerly, R. I., died on Monday last, from having taken a quantity of corrosive sublimate instead of some mild medicine as he intended. He was a much-respected laboring man, and has left a large and dependent family. His death is a warning against leaving vials of poison among others without labels.

A great fire occurred a few days since in West Moriah, N. Y., near Lake Champlain. It burnt several houses and sawmills, together with a large quantity of lumber and timber. The entire loss is estimated at over $300,000.

The President of Texas has issued a Proclamation, setting forth that England and France have undertaken to reconcile matters between Texas and Mexico, on which account he declares and proclaims a cessation of hostilities, by land and by sea, against the Republic of Mexico, or against the citizens and trade thereof, until the whole subject can be referred to the Honorable Congress and Convention of the people.

The Mayor of New York has issued a public notice that the laws forbidding traffic on Sunday, except in specified articles and within specified hours, will be rigidly enforced; and especially that there must be no selling of malt or alcoholic liquors on that day, at any hour.

Notwithstanding the Mayor's efforts to suppress drunkenness and drinking on the Sabbath, there was little if any abatement last Sunday.

On the door of the Lafayette Hall in Broadway on Sunday, we noticed the following inscription: "Closed in consequence of a kick from heavymare.

Ninety-three Revolutionary soldiers reside in Cayuga county. In the same county there are the widows of eighteen deceased soldiers of the Revolution, and three soldiers of the late War, who are pensioned on account of the wounds received.

Mr. Tyler and lady have left their retirement on James River and are now at Old Point Comfort. Among the visitors there also, is the Hon. Caleb Cushing.

The lands of the 'Wyandotte Reservation' are to be sold at Upper Sandusky, Ohio, on the 22d of September.

A Tornado swept over London, Ohio, and vicinity, on the 22d ult., carrying almost everything before it; sweeping down houses, timber and fences, and leaving whole fields and farms exposed. Whole trees were carried high in the air, and turned over like little bushes. Nobody was killed.

One of the Rochester editors has received a quantity of cherries, 32 of which, taken indiscriminately from the basket, fill a pint measure, seven weighing 2 ounces, sixty-three weigh a pound, and a great number are 3¼ inches around the middle. The fruit is entirely black and aptly named "Tartarean."

A youth in Washington City was charged with having stolen some letters from the post office, and being arrested, confessed the fact, and returned a part of the letters taken; and yet on his trial for this offence, the Jury fonnd a verdict of not guilty.

The quantities of berries of all sorts consumed every day, during their season, in New York, is almost incredible. We have made as good an estimate as possible, and feel safe in saying that 30,000 to 40,000 baskets are frequently consumed in a day.

Our Revolutionary War drew from the Treasury of Connecticut alone nearly $23,000,000; as much as $100,000,000 would be for that State now, or $200,000,000 for Massachusetts. Our last war, though cheap compared with most wars, cost us nearly $50,000,000 a year. Our Revolutionary War cost England more than $600,000,000, and her wars with Napoleon alone, more than $500,000,000.

If you feel inclined to exercise your vengeance against any one who has deeply injured you, take the first opportunity of doing him a service. If he has any feeling, you will wound him to the quick.

Foster Day, about 65 years old, shot himself with a pistol, at Elizabethtown, N. J., on Wednesday. He has left a wife and several children. Mental derangement is understood to have been the cause of the rash act.

George W. Kline, Esq., of Lebanon, Pa., recently committed suicide by shooting himself. His mind had become melancholy in consequence of the death of an only daughter on whom he doated with parental fondness. He was a distinguished member of the Bar, and greatly beloved in the community where he lived.

The works at Clinton Prison are progressing successfully and rapidly. Since the arrival of 50 prisoners from Sing Sing, 10 more have been added to their number, sentenced from different counties. Mr. Cook, the agent, is now on his way with 50 from the Auburn prison.

It is but three or four weeks since that we gave an account of the extraordinary age of Mr. and Mrs. Plaisance, then living in Redmoor Fen, in the Isle of Ely, the husband of the age of 107, the wife 105!—a case without a parallel perhaps in England, or in the world! On Wednesday, strange to relate, after a short affliction, both expired on the same day; their united ages 212! They have left one daughter, who lived with them, of the age of 84.

Among other specimens of the natural and artificial productions of the celestial empire which Mr. Peters brought with him on his return to the United States, are two intelligent and educated subjects of the "Brother of the Moon." One of these Chinese gentlemen is stated to be a man of letters, and the other a musician. The scholar is said to be preparing a journal of his travels in this country, the publication of which will be looked for with interest.

Pledging each other in drinking is a custom which took its origin from the time when the Danes were in England. Those ferocious barbarians used to stab natives at their festivals, and they invited to their banquets those island chiefs whom they wished to put out of the way either by the dagger or by poison. The consequence was, that no native would drink at a Danish festival unless his entertainers, or one of them, would "pledge" his safety in a cup of wine beforehand, and even among those barbarian invaders this pledge was deemed sacred.

A letter written under date of Philadelphia, June 29, P. M., says, so far as local news is concerned, there is a complete dearth. In marine matters the same. With the exception of several alarms of fire and one—only one—firemen's fight, all has passed off peaceably for the Sabbath in the city of Brotherly Love.

Quite a change has taken place in the public opinion, as to the crops, since the latter rains. The papers from every part of the Union now represent the prospects of an abundant crop, and every thing but hay, as being very promising. Corn never looked better, and the wheat, though short in straw, has filled and headed remarkably well. There is also a promise of a fine second crop of grass. Vegetables of every kind—including the forests—never had a more luxuriant appearance than at the present time.

From a report in the Ontario Repository, of the causes tried at the recent term of the U. S. Circuit Court for the Northern district, held at Canandaigua, we learn that the Jury, in the case of Babbitt vs. The Buffalo Steam Engine Manufacturing Company, returned a verdict of $4,500 for the infringement of the Plaintiff's patent, relative to the lining of boxes in which gudgeons as axles are to run, and by which the bad effect heretofore experienced from friction and heating are obviated.

The State Agricultureal Society has engaged Hon. Daniel Lee, a member of the Legislature from Erie county, to visit the different counties of the State, and deliver lectures on the subjects most interesting to those engaged in agricultural pursuits. He is a gentleman of extensive knowledge, and uncommonly well qualified to discarge the duties assigned to him in a manner acceptable to the people.

The St. Louis Republican of the 18th, says that the Caspian, which arrived at that city from New Orleans on the 17th, brought up about five hundred emigrants, consisting of English, Scotch, Welsh, Irish and Dutch. On the passage up, two died, a Dutch girl accidently fell into the river and was drowned, and three children were born, and, as the court journals says, are doing remarkably well.

Captain Jonathan Walker is probably ere this out of the Florida jail, and on his way homeward. The Anti-Slavery Standard says the sum required to release him was deposited in the hands of a New York house, subject to Capt. Walker's order, if needed. This generous deed was done by a friend and townsman of Walker's, who, finding that the money was not forthcoming from the public, pledged it himself.

The Boston Transcript says that bills of the denomination of fifty dollars, altered from ones, on the Chemical Bank of this city, are in circulation. They are so well executed as to deceive some of the brokers.

Rev Mr. Dean, Baptist missionary, states, that the Chinese are supposed to spend $360,000,000 annually for incense to burn before ther idols! This is one dollar for every inhabitant of the empire, old and young; and it is only for a single item in the support of idolatry.

The captain of a steamboat, on the Mississippi after he had got above Memphis, found a colored man on board who had no master. Horrible! The captain questioned him, and the man said his master had brought him on board, but by some mistake had been left at some intermediate port. The captain saw fit not to believe him—(who would believe a negro?)—and put him in irons and flogged him, and finally put him ashore in some by-place.

At the General Sessions of Monroe County, Cromwell Anthony was found guilty of bigamy. He married his first wife in Courtland County in 1826. In February last he came to Ogden, passed himself off as a minister of the gospel, succeeded in gaining the affections of an excellent young girl named Emilie Stevens, and married her. No defence was offered on the part of the prisoner.

JESUITS.—The members of the order now amount to 22,819, of whom 11,413 are priests. At the time of their suppression, in 1773, they had 24 professed houses, 669 colleges, 51 noviciates, 176 seminaries, 335 residences, and 273 missions.

PROMPT.—A Sandwich Island paper says it has but one delinquent subscriber! When we can say the same we will give a hundred dollars to the cause of missions. [Ch. Sec.

MIDNIGHT MUSIC.

BY MRS. SIGOURNEY.

What maketh music when the bird
Doth hush its merry lay,
And the sweet spirit of the flowers
Hath sighed itself away?
What maketh music, when the frost
Doth chain the murmuring rill,
And every song that summer woke,
In winter's trance is still?

What maketh music, when the winds
To hoarse encounter rise,
When Ocean strikes his thunder-gong,
And the rent cloud replies?
When no adventurous planet dares
The midnight arch to deck,
And in its startling dream the babe
Doth clasp its mother's neck?

But when the fiercer storms of life
Do o'er the pilgrim sweep,
And earthquake voices claim the hopes
He treasured long and deep,
When loud the threat'ning passions roar,
Like lions in their den,
And vengeful tempests lash the shore—
What maketh music then?

The deed to humble virtue born,
Which nursing memory taught
To shun the boastful world's applause,
And love the lowly thought—
This builds a cell within the heart,
Amid the weeds of care,
And tuning high its heaven strung harp,
Doth make sweet music there.

From the True Wesleyan.

Church Music.

Says one, whose writings will always be read, "The soul seems formed for music. The savage cannot be found so barbarous as not to have some way by which to create musical sounds; and the savage who, for the first time, hears the notes of a well regulated band, will crouch down upon the ground, entranced by notes so far exceeding any thing of which he has ever before conceived.

The band, in passing through the street, will draw every family to the window; the flute, whose soft notes float over the still waters on the summer's evening, will cause the Indian to lift the paddle from the water, and let his canoe drift noiselessly down the stream. And the proudest monarch on earth will kneel and weep during some of the strains of the mighty organ, and the choir, as they sing the Messiah.

War has pressed music into its service, and made the heart leap, even upon the field of death, by the notes of the bugle, the trumpet, and the clarion. Pleasure has made music her handmaid. The ball, the dance, the theatre, would all expire, were it not that music gives her constant presence, and pleads with a voice so sweet, that the world cannot resist it. Any price will be paid for music, if it shall have the quality of being exquisite. The man is now living who annually receives more for the music which he creates on his violin, than would support eight of our ordained missionaries."—Todd's Sabbath School Teacher, pages 283—4.

To the above truthful and beautiful extract, I may add, all animals are pleasantly affected by the sweet sounds of music.—The horse, the elephant, and even the meanest reptiles. The rattlesnake, when coiled to spring at his victim, at the sound of the flute has been disarmed, and followed the wonderful charmer with apparent delight. A gentleman confined in an old prison, used to pass off the tedious hours by playing plaintive airs on his lute, when to his utter astonishment, on one occasion, he saw a large number of mice crawling forth from their retreats, and listening to the sweet sounds. Not highly pleased with his audience, he laid aside his instrument, when his auditory dispersed, and left him once more in solitude; but the sound of his sweet instrument again called them forth. The songsters of the grove take delight in pouring forth their mellow notes upon the morning and evening air.

"Is it for thee the lark ascends and sings?
Joy tunes his voice, joy elevates his wings;
Is it for thee the linnet pours his throat,
Loves of his own, and raptures swell the note."

Music holds over man an influence that nothing else does. The heart that can be melted by no appeal, is touched and softened by the sounds of music. It expels from the mind the demon of passion and revenge, and calls into exercise the tenderest and best feelings of the human heart. It embalms in a sweet perfume the memory of friends that have died "long, long ago."

When set to religious and devotional sentiments, it leads the unthinking almost instinctively to fall down and acknowledge that God is among us of a truth.

So peculiarly ravishing to the mind of man is music, that God, to invest heaven with every possible attraction, has told us that a large part of the exercises of that blessed world, and holy throng, is singing.

It is certainly not too much to say, that the parent who neglects to have his children learn music, has most wofully neglected their education. Music being thus adapted to man's nature, has always been associated with religious worship, both among Jews and Christians, in the great congregation and the social circle. The Puritan Fathers always sung in their family devotions.

DEATH FROM TOBACCO.—We learn from the Dedham Democrat that a little boy of six years old, son of Mr. Lewis Cobbett, of West Dedham, went to the store of Mr. Jason Ellis, Jr., in that place, and asked the clerk, a boy by the name of Hank, for some kind of confectionary—that he was told they had no sugar plums, but he could have some tobacco. The child replied that tobacco would make him sick. The clerk argued that it would not, and took a cracker and put on some butter and molasses and tobacco, and succeeded in some way in getting it down the child. The little fellow was taken with vomiting soon after, and continued to do so for several days, and at length went into fits, and finally died on Thursday, the 5th inst. Mr. E. promptly discharged the clerk, as soon as it was known that he had committed the infamous transaction. Whether any farther notice will be taken of it we know not, but certainly if there is any punishment that can reach him, he should not be permitted to escape "unwhipt of justice."

Murder Prevented by the Bible.

The following anecdote is contained in a letter addressed to the Committee of the British and Foreign Bible Society, by Mr. Jeffrey Hale, Secretary to the Quebec Auxiliary, and containing a large order for Bibles and Testaments. It is dated

"Quebec, U. C., July 14th, 1837.

"Some time in the year 1836 there was a country-wedding in the county of ——, at which the usual scenes of riot and drunkenness took place, which ended in a lawsuit, and cost the bride's father a considerable sum. Revenge burned in his breast, and ended in a fixed resolution to murder the person who was the cause of his loss. The bride's father is from old Ireland, and connected with the Roman Catholics. When a boy, he had been taught to read at some of the charitable schools in Ireland, and could read the Scriptures; but he had paid no attention to that important duty from his twelfth year. During the period his mind was considering how to murder the person who he thought had injured him, a New Testament from the Quebec Bible Society was handed into the house where he lived. He took up the New Testament, and turned to 1 John iii. 15, 'Whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer; and ye know that no murderer hath eternal life abiding in him.' The word took hold of his heart, and he relinquished his diabolical design. He continues to read the New Testament, though he finds much in it which condemns his profession. On being asked what he would do if the Priest were to order him to give up his New Testament; 'No; I will not give it away,' he replied. 'I love it. It has saved two lives already: and what more it may do, I cannot tell.'"

The Head and the Heart.

'Please my lady, buy a nosegay, or bestow a trifle,' was the address of a pale, emaciated looking woman, holding a few withered flowers in her hand, to a lady who sat on the beach of Brighton, watching the blue waves of the receding tide. 'I have no half-pence, my good woman,' said the lady, looking up from the novel she was perusing, with a listless gaze; if I had, I would give them to you.' 'I am a poor widow, with three helpless children depending on me,—would you bestow a small trifle to help us on our way?' 'I have told you I have no half-pence,' reiterated the lady, somewhat pettishly. 'Really,' she added, as the poor applicant turned meekly away, 'this is worse than the streets of London—they should have a police on the shores to prevent such annoyance.' These were the thoughtless dictates of the HEAD. 'Mama,' said a blue-eyed boy, who was laying on the beach, flinging pebbles into the sea, 'I wish you had a penny, for the poor woman does look hungry, and you know we are to have a nice dinner, and you have promised me a glass of wine.'

The HEART of the lady answered the appeal of her child; and with a blush of shame crimsoning her cheek at the tacit reproof his artless words conveyed, she opened her reticule, placed a half-crown in his tiny hands, and in another moment he was bounding along the sands on his errand of mercy. In a few seconds he returned, his eyes sparkling with delight, and his countenance glowing with health and beauty. 'O mama, the poor woman was so thankful; she wanted to turn back, but I would not let her; and she said, "God bless the noble lady, and you too, my pretty lamb; my children will now have bread these two days, and we go on our way rejoicing."'—The eyes of the lady glistened as she heard the recital of her child, and her heart told her that its dictates had bestowed a pleasure the cold reasoning of the head could never bestow.

THE BEST EPITAPH.—Lord Brooks was so charmed with that rare and accomplished personage, Sir Philip Sydney, that he would have no other inscription on his tomb, than this, "Here lies the friend of Sir Philip Sydney." "Ah," says the Christian, "I envy not those whose sepulchre will be adorned with the trophies of war, the pride of heraldry, or the renown of science, if my humble grave can tell, and tell truly, 'Here lies the friend of Christ!'" [Jay.

To an Infant in Heaven.

BY THOMAS WARD.

Thou bright and star-like spirit!
That, in my visions wild,
I see mid heaven's seraphic host—
O! canst thou be my child?

My grief is quench'd in wonder,
And pride arrests my sighs;
A branch from this unworthy stock
Now blossoms in the skies.

Our hopes of thee were lofty,
But have we cause to grieve?
O! could our fondest, proudest wish
A nobler fate conceive?

The little weeper, tearless,
The sinner, snatch'd from sin;
The babe, to more than manhood grown,
Ere childhood did begin.

And I, thy early teacher,
Would blush thy power to see;
Thou art to me a parent now,
And I, a child to thee!

THE WELCOME BACK.

Sweet is the hour that brings us home,
Where all will spring to meet us;
Where hands are striving as we come,
To be the first to greet us.
When the world hath spent its frowns and wrath,
And care had been sorely pressing,
'Tis sweet to turn from our roving path,
And find a fireside blessing.
Oh, joyfully dear is the homeward track,
If we are but sure of a welcome back.

What do we reck on the dreary way,
Though lonely and benighted,
If we know there are lips to chide our stay,
And eyes that will beam love lighted?
What is the worth of a diamond ray,
To the glance that flashes pleasure;
When the winds that welcome back, betray,
We form a heart's chief treasure?
Oh, joyfully dear is our homeward track,
If we are but sure of a welcome back.

The Story Teller.

Peter Parley was a great story teller. This is known to all children who have read his books. One day as he was going by the school, the children came around him, and they all wished him to tell them a new story.

Well, says Peter, I love to please good children, and as you all appear kind and civil, I will tell you a story which you have never heard. But before we begin let us go and sit down in a cool shady place.

A long way from this place, in a land where it is very cold, and where much snow falls, and where the hills are so high that their tops appear to reach the sky, there live some men whose joy it is to help folks who pass by these hills.

These men keep large dogs, which they learn to go out and hunt for persons who may be lost in the snow drifts.

One sad cold night when the snow fell fast, and the wind blew loud and shrill, and it was quite dark, with not a star to be seen in the sky, these good men sent out a dog to hunt for those who might want help.

In an hour or two the dog was heard at the gate; and when they went to look out they saw the dog there, with a boy on his back.

The poor child was stiff with cold, and could but just hold on to the dog's back.

He told the men that he had lain a long time in the snow, and was too ill and weak to walk, and the snow fell fast on him. At length he felt something pull him by the coat, and then he heard the bark of a dog close by him.

The boy then put out his hand, and he felt the hair of the dog; and then the dog gave him one more pull. This gave the boy some hope, and he took hold of the dog, and drew himself out of the snow; but felt sure that he could not stand or walk.

He then got upon the dog's back, and put his arms round the dog's neck, and thus he held on. He felt sure the dog did not mean to hurt him; and thus he rode on the dog's back, all the way to the good men's house, who took care of the boy till the snow was gone, when they sent him to his own home.

The Fruit of Infidelity.

A servant of the late Mr. Mallet, who had made the improvement that might be expected from hearing the irreligious and blasphemous conversation continually passing at the table where it was his place to wait, took an opportunity to rob his master. Being apprehended, and urged to give a reason for his infamous behavior, "Sir," said he, "I had heard you so often talk of the impossibility of a future state, and that after death there was no reward for virtue, nor punishment for vice, that I was tempted to commit the robbery." "Well but," replied the master, "had you no fear of that death which the laws of your country inflict upon the crime?" "Sir," rejoined the servant, looking sternly at his master, "what is that to you, if I had a mind to venture that? You had removed my greatest terror; why should I fear the less?"

Behold the wisdom of propagating infidelity and atheism in a nation!

[Bishop Horne.

GOD IS EVERYWHERE.—A child, six years of age, was asked by a dignified clergyman, "Where God was?" with the offer of an orange. "Tell me," replied the boy, "where he is not, and I will give you two."

Recollect, my dear boys, that God is everywhere present; he sees you by night as well as by day: therefore let all your actions show that you think of the words of the Bible, "Thou, God, seest me."

SAGACITY AND FIDELITY OF A DOG.—An instance of canine sagacity occurred on Monday morning in connection with the fire in Crescent Place, which deserves to be recorded. Mr. H. D. Huston, who resided in a house directly in front of the carpenter's shop in which the fire commenced, was awakened about 3 o'clock by his dog, who jumped upon his master's bed and began to lick his eyes; on opening them, Mr. Huston found the flames bursting from his shop near his room, and had barely time to save himself and family from the devouring element. [Traveler.

A SAGACIOUS DOG.—On Saturday afternoon a large mastiff dog, kept by Mr. William Semmence, at High Lanes, rushed into the dwelling house, barking and howling violently. The inmates thinking this was occasioned by some person passing by, took no notice of it, till the faithful watch-dog caught one of Mr. Semmence's daughters by her clothes, and dragged her outside the house; he then let her go, and began barking and leaping up towards the roof, which the young woman immediately discovered to be on fire. It was soon perceived that there was no possibility of saving the house from destruction; the inmates, therefore, contented themselves with removing the furniture. The fire soon extended to the joining house, occupied by Nicholas Oliver, which was also reduced to ruins, the inmates succeeded in saving their furniture. [Falmouth Packet.

Mouse, Lap-Dog, and Monkey.

A FABLE.

A poor little Mouse, being half-starved, ventured, one day, to steal from behind the ceiling, while the family were at dinner, and, trembling all the while, picked up a few crumbs, which were scattered on the ground. She was soon observed, however, every body was immediately alarmed; some called for the cat, others took up whatever was at hand, and endeavored to crush her to pieces, and the poor, terrified animal was driven round the room in an agony of terror. At length, however, she was fortunate enough to gain her hole, where she sat, panting with fatigue. When the family were again seated, a Lap-dog and a Monkey came into the room. The former jumped into the lap of his mistress, fawned upon every one of the children, and made his court so effectually, that he was rewarded with some of the best morsels of the entertainment. The Monkey, on the other hand, forced himself into notice by his grimaces. He played a thousand little mischievous tricks, and was regaled, at the appearance of the desert, with plenty of nuts and apples. The unfortunate little Mouse, who saw, from her hiding place, every thing that passed, sighed, in anguish of heart, and said to herself, "Alas! how ignorant was I, to imagine that poverty and distress are always sufficient recommendations to the charity of the opulent. I now find, that whoever is not master of fawning and buffoonery, is but ill qualified for a dependant, and will not be suffered even to pick up the crumbs that fall from the table."

AN EXTRAORDINARY DISCOVERY.

A farmer of Howard county, Missouri, whilst quarrying stone on a hill side, accidentally discovered, by striking the earth with a hoe, that a spot on a declivity was hollow. He forthwith commenced digging there, and in a short time came to a regular wall, evidently built by human hands. He tore down a portion, and found that it had blocked the mouth of a cave, which has since been explored a distance of three hundred yards, and a branch from this main passage has been penetrated some two hundred yards. About thirty yards from the entrance is a magnificent room, with a ceiling of a hexagonal form, presenting a shining surface, as if crusted with diamonds. Near the entrance is the statue of a horse, the head, neck, body, and one hind leg finished, the neck formed by three pieces dovetailed together, the rest being solid. In another portion of the cavern, where the walls are smooth, are numerous hyeroglyphics, letters, and figures, which appear rather illegibly, though whether graven or painted we are not told. The figures 1, 2, 6 and 7 are quite plain. Just above these figures the letters D O N and C A R L O are legible. Further on, the letters J H S appear on the wall. Of the arm of the main cavern, which has been discovered and has been explored some two hundred yards, a writer says:

"The walls and ceiling of this extraordinary cave are pretty much the same as in the other rooms. The walls have a peculiar and extraordinary brilliancy, occasioned probably from the fact that, instead of stone, as we first believed, we found them to be of metal very much resembling sulphate of iron, but more of a silvery appearance. We had not proceeded very far before we heard a rumbling noise that ocasionally broke upon our ears, in notes the most thrilling and melodious I ever heard. We stood for a considerable time in breathless silence to catch the most enchanting sounds that ever greeted the ear of man, and it was only after an interval that we could summon courage to explore its source, which we did, and were much surprised to find it proceeded from a gushing spring in the side of the wall. The sounds we heard we found to be produced by the fall of the water, and varied by the current of air before alluded to, which we then found to be very strong. We each took a hearty draught of the limpid water of this spring; and, after surveying the diamond walls of the greatest natural curiosity in the world, we commenced retracing our steps to its mouth, when we found it to be quite dark and 8 o'clock at night." [Missouri Statesman.

'I am rich enough,' says Pope to Swift, 'and can afford to give away a hundred pounds a year. I would not crawl upon the earth without doing a little good. I will enjoy the pleasure of what I give, by giving it alive, and seeing another enjoy it. When I die,' adds the poet, 'I should be ashamed to leave enough for a monument, if there were a wanting friend above ground.'

[Within a stone's throw of the cot where I was born, stands the old church where my fathers worshipped, and back of the church is the grave-yard where I often repair when I visit my native place, to bend over the tombs of those I love, and recall their virtues to my remembrance. The spot is not far from where the Pilgrims first landed. There, of all places upon earth, do I desire to lay my bones.]

O BURY ME NOT.

Carry my bones from hence.—GENESIS 50: 25.

O bury me not in this populous place,
By the busy haunts of the city mart;
'Mid strangers here of every race,
From the graves of my much-loved friends apart.

O bury me not in the desert afar,
Where no tear on my grave shall ever be shed:
But bury me where my kindred are,
That my friends may come and mourn for the dead.

O bury me not in famed Auburn's shade,
For the visitors there will know me not:
With the learned, the great I would not be laid;
O bury me close by my own native cot.

Those whom I loved will weep o'er me there;
The tear of affection will fall on my tomb:
Then bury me, bury me, bury me where
Some friend, to my resting-place often shall come.

Temperance Among Seamen.

Among the many moral projects which have been started in our city, there is no one which commends itself to the interest and good wishes of our citizens more, than that of promoting temperance among our seamen.

Our Father TAYLOR, the benevolent pastor of the Bethel, is the champion for the poor sailor, and right well he performs his duty. We have often had occasion to observe that where a duty was to be done toward the seaman, Father Taylor was ready to perform it. His task is one of labor and perplexity; and many are the impediments which are cast in his way, by the designing rum sellers and others, who would work the sailor's ruin, for the purpose of robbing them of their hard earned money, and making them poorer and more miserable, than when they started upon their voyage!—Thus making them poorer and poorer, and more and more miserable, as they grow into years and feebleness.

Here is an instance of the depravity of somebody, whether a rumseller or not, I leave my readers to judge. A few days since, a large ship arrived in our port—the crew had all signed the pledge with one or two exceptions; and the persons most interested in their earnings, knowing that temperance sailors are not so easily bled as the Jack tars were in former times, consequently had recourse to the following infamous stratagem: A large jug filled with gin was placed by some unknown hands upon the deck of the ship, where any one so disposed could help himself, and be made drunk without hindrance and without charge. But when once drunk then farewell money, farewell happiness! The "landsharks" know full well where to find them, and know, too, well enough how to destroy them. We could not believe that we had a set of men among us who were so depraved—so bad at heart, as to have recourse to such a low and mean stratagem to decoy those who at least must be firm to any resolution of this kind to adhere to it, and to tempt those who are striving to be temperate. But such is the fact; and every one who would promote virtue among this valuable and much abused class of our community, would do well to be on the alert.

THE DEVIL INCARNATE.

From the New Orleans Picayune.

Passing through Baronne street about noon yesterday, a crowd, composed of men, women, and children, attracted our attention. The object of their curiosity, or rather of their pity, we found to be a delicate and debilitated looking mulatto boy, about ten years old. An old negro on the one side, and a stick on the other, supported him, as he endeavored to move along, although it was evident that any motion, however slow, was too much for his prostrated physical powers. We inquired what was the matter with the boy, and were answered by his shirt being raised up off his back, and heavens! how expressive of fiendish cruelty was the spectacle that presented itself! The poor boy's back and body were one mass of raw, trembling, skinless, partiputrid, lacerated flesh! Ravines, as it were, in his carcase, had been cut by the lash, and he appeared, altogether, a victim of the most wanton and heartless cruelty, which it was impossible for any other than a fiend to inflict. All we could learn of this monstrous cruelty we had from the old negro who helped the boy along; we give it for what it is worth, premising that we shall seek for the authentic facts of the case, and lay them before the public.

The old negro said that he and the boy belonged to C. Donnibourg, who lives at the corner of Annunciation and Richard streets—that Donnibourg lost a watch, and charged the boy with stealing it. Some ten or fourteen days since he had him put in the police jail of the first Municipality, and there, by his order, says the old man, was the inhuman punishment inflicted on him. The boy himself says that he received 25 lashes a day from the day that he was imprisoned till Thursday last. The old man, by direction of his master, was taking him home; but two citizens, seeing that he must die by the way, informed Recorder Baldwin of his condition, who promptly had him brought to the police office, where he was examined by Dr. Picton. As the doctor examined the wounds, they were necessarily exposed to the by-standers, who, by an involuntary exclamation expressed their indignation against his torturer. The doctor pronounced the boy in a precarious condition, but said by proper treatment he might recover, and advised that he should be sent to the Charity Hospital. The Recorder ordered that he be at once taken there,—and thither was he carried by the police on a litter, his back upwards.

What follows, will show the reader what the law says.

From the N. O. Tropic, June 10.

The Attorney General has given it as his opinion that there is no law by which the owner of the slave Auguste, or the jailer under whose charge the brutal punishment was inflicted upon him, can be reached.

This is the case of the little mulatto boy who was sent to the police jail of the First Municipality, and there chastised, day after day, until his back was one mass of raw, trembling, and part-putrid flesh.

The Good Little Girl.

A small colored girl, who loved Jesus, and had read her Bible a good deal, one day gave proof that she considered it her duty to obey what the Saviour had said. She ran to her mother one morning, much pleased, showing some plums that a friend had given her. The mother said "she was very kind, and has given you a great many." "Yes," said the child, "very kind indeed; she gave me more than these, but I have given some away." The mother asked to whom she had given them? when the little girl replied, "I gave them to a white girl who pushes me off the sidewalk, and make faces at me." Upon being asked why she gave them to her, she answered, "Because I thought that would make her know that I wished to be kind to her, and she will not perhaps be unkind and rude to me any more."—Juvenile Wesleyan.

THE WORLD'S ONLY HOPE.

By R. W. CUSHMAN,
Pastor of Bowdoin Square Church, Boston.

Such is the title of a duodecimo of one hundred and fifteen pages, the aim of which is, "to show that the Reformation has needed reforming." Our brethren of the Baptist denomination profess an ardent attachment to the Holy Scriptures as the only rule of faith and practice; and they evince their sincerity in this sentiment, by constantly teaching that all religion, to be acceptable to God or binding upon man, must be sustained by a "thus saith the Lord." "To the law and the testimony; if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them." This passage, Isaiah 8: 20, has furnished every earnest Baptist with household words, with which to rally his friends, and annoy his opponents. By their writings and other labors, the Baptists have done much to diffuse these sentiments through the United States and the British Empire. And we greatly appreciate their labor in this respect; for it is the most potent antagonistic principle, which at this day is warring against the hierarchial pretensions of other portions of christendom. We do not therefore look upon it as mere denominational self-importance, that led Bro. C. to prefix so high-sounding a title to his book, as "THE WORLD'S ONLY HOPE." Doubtless it was a desire to set this potent principle on high, and attract the attention of his fellow Christians more intently to it, at a time when the hierarchies of the earth are compassing sea and land to turn back those impulses of feeling and sentiment which, demanding a scriptural faith, have been gaining upon the Anglo-Saxon race two centuries past, and more than fifty years lifting their banners to the world. In this Bro. C. deserves commendation.

On the subjects of baptism and church membership, as connected with the fundamental doctrines of the Bible, Baptists have been very generally scriptural, and therefore powerful. When the Lutheran Reformation had dispelled the night of papal darkness, the watchword of the reformers was, "The Bible, the Bible only, is the religion of Protestants." With this on the great doctrines of justification by faith in one crucified and risen Saviour, with holiness of life and heart, they were mighty through God to pull down strong holds. But it was soon seen that these reformers were not disposed to carry out their own professed principles. The pomp and show of human ceremonies had too strong a hold upon the leaders in the church, to be renounced at once for the simplicity of gospel order; these, and the emoluments of the unscriptural alliance of church and state, they could not part with. Their aim was, in leaving Rome, to depart as little as possible from the popular usages of the upper classes of society. Hence dissenters from all the established churches in Europe soon showed themselves, resting their cause upon scriptural truth. As they were chiefly among the plain operative classes of society, it was thought they might soon be put down by fines and imprisonments, with occasionally a more exemplary disposal of the boldest of their leaders. But truth is mighty and will prevail over fines and prisons and illegal executions; and its power to do so has never been more strikingly exemplified than in the history of dissent from the reformed churches of Europe and America. Opposed by all the power of monopolized learning, the emoluments of state establishments, and arbitrary and unjust civil distinctions, they nevertheless multiplied and progressed in moral power, until they now have a stronger hold upon national feelings than the establishments which at first so bitterly opposed them. What gave them this advantage? What, but certain TRUTHS which they kept prominently before the public mind? At first the greater part of these dissenters from the national establishments were Pedobaptists; and so interwoven was this system with all the social influences of religion, that for a time its partisans in the establishments and out them, succeeded in representing those who rejected it, as semi-infidels and infatuated misanthropes, and covering their names and sentiments with so much contumely, that they effectually excluded them from all the high places of society. It was on this account, that for near two centuries after the reformation, the progress of Baptist sentiments was slow and painful. But as they acquaired an educated ministry, and took measures to maintain a number of competent men in important stations, and others in itinerant labors, who were able to give an intelligent account of their sentiments, they acquired an importance, and obtained an influence, which have given them a very rapid increase. Doubtless it is to be accounted for on the same principle; they held up certain great Bible truths, which their opponents, cannot disprove, in a God fearing community.

To this fact Bro. Cushman refers when he says, (page 70,)—"They have ever maintained the sole authority and sufficient light of the Scriptures in matters of religion and morals. They have ever been the earnest advocates of a strictly scriptural Christianity, of a purely spiritual church; of intellectual freedom; of the right of private judgment; and of personal untransferrable accountability." Again, (page 106,)—"It is a fundamental principle of the Baptist faith, that Christianity must achieve her conquests by the might of naked truth. Our missionaries believe that every plant which the FATHER hath not planted, though it may linger out a sickly existence, must eventually be rooted up. They know that the day is coming in which every man's work shall be subjected to a severer ordeal than a gone-by superstition ever employed; and that they alone, whose work shall abide, shall receive the reward of fidelity or success."

In all this we heartily approve of their course; and we would be glad if Bro. C. might stand upon the summit of the Allegany mountains, and in a voice as loud as the archangel's proclaim in the hearing of all who dwell between the Atlantic and Pacific, "The word of God must be restored to its supremacy. The inspired Scriptures must be made the exclusive rule of faith and practice; and all tradition, and conjecture, and convenience, and partiality, and prejudice, and worldly interest must be made to defer to that divine authority. All else, in the guidance of religious duty, must be held as a dream or a fancy. Attempts to control mankind with bulls and decrees of councils, and legends of saints, and traditions received from the fathers, must be met with appeals to the Bible, 'to the law and the testimony;' and mankind must be made to understand, that if religious teachers, 'speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them.' The conviction must be wrought in the minds of people and ministry, that to wrest or disguise its meaning, is to incur the frowns of its Author. It must be made 'quick and powerful' to fear, as well as to inspire hope; and conscience must be educated by its commands." (p. 52.)

Who would suppose that a people holding such sentiments, would reject an institution of Jehovah—a law of the Decalogue—to observe an institution supported only by human authority; and would disobey the Lord because it incommodes them to keep a different day from that observed by the nation? From forty years association with them, we know that it has not entered into the hearts of some of them, that they do so. But let them ask themselves, why they keep the first day of the week rather than the seventh? If the readers of the "World's only Hope" were to ask the author the same question, what answer could he give, that, as far as Baptist practice is concerned, would not destroy the world's only hope? What law, precept, or passage of scripture authorizes the observance of the first day of the week in the place of the seventh? What but tradition, conjecture, convenience, prejudice, and worldly interest, induces our Baptist brethren to continue to call the first day of the week the Sabbath, when God says, "the seventh day is the Sabbath?" What scriptural authority do they pretend for this practice, which is less inferential and unsound than that by which their Pedo-baptist brethren plead for infant baptism and church membership.

Let us see which is most valid, the plea for infant baptism, or the plea for the first day:—

Infant Baptism—"Jesus said, Suffer little children to come unto me and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of God." Mark 10: 14.

Lord's Day—"Now upon the first day of the week, they came unto the sepulchre, bringing spices which they had prepared." Luke 24: 1

Infant Baptism—"Abraham circumcised his son Isaac, being eight days old, as God had commanded him." Gen. 21: 5.

Lord's Day—"Upon the first day of the week, when the disciples came together to break bread, Paul preached unto them." Acts 21: 7.

Infant Baptism—"She (i. e. Lydia) was baptized and her household."

Lord's Day—"I was in the spirit on the Lord's day, and heard behind me a great voice as of a trumpet." Rev. 1: 10.

See further how these parables are answered:

To the first, the Baptist says, Mark tells what Jesus did to these little children: "He put his hands upon them and blessed them"—not baptized them. The Sabbatarian says, Luke tells us what the women came to the sepulcher for; to "bring the spices which they had prepared"—not to sabbatize.

To the second, the Baptist says, "No view of this subject can have the most distant bearing on infant baptism." The Sabbatarian says, "No view we can take of this meeting at Troas can have any bearing on the Sabbath question, because meeting and preaching and breaking bread, were daily employments of the apostles and first Christians, and not unfrequently so among us."

To the third, the Baptist says, You cannot show that Lydia ever had any children. The Sabbatarian says, You cannot show what day of the week John meant.

That Christ did not appoint the first day of the week to be observed in honor of his resurrection, our author appears very well to know, for he says, (p. 61,)—"The primitive church united together for mutual edification—and the extension of the religion of their Saviour—and sought to accomplish these by perpetuating two monumental ordinances; the first of which was to attest to the world a fundamental fact, and the second a fundamental doctrine. The fundamental fact was, that Christ not only died, but rose again from the dead; the fundamental doctrine was, salvation by his death." In this first monumental ordinance, we understand our brother as referring to baptism. If then baptism is the monumental ordinance showing forth the death and resurrection of Christ, the observance of the first day of the week could not have been instituted for the same purpose. God has never instituted two monuments of the same thing.

It is evident, then, that if making "the inspired Scriptures the exclusive rule of faith and practice," is the worlds's only hope, our Baptist brethren must reform their faith and practice, or the world's only hope will never be identified with them; for, "they are NOT the only churches in this country which stand strictly on apostolic ground, unencumbered with the errors of the apostacy." (p. 4.) "They retain in their system the great error so fatal to the spirituality of all the churches of the old world," (p. 47,) that of inferential authority in matters of faith and practice, and thus make themselves chargable with a departure from the New Testament model. "Of this departure, the Roman Catholic Church affect no concealment, but claims the power to make these changes." (p. 28.) This departure Baptists cannot conceal so long as the law says, "the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God," and they keep the first day, without law, precept, or passage of Scripture, to authorize them; "as though that were an act of obedience to Christ to do one thing when he has commanded another."

Well does Bro. C. caution the churches,—(p. 75,) when he says, "But let us be on our guard against the mistake of supposing that because, in our form of church organization, and our faith, and our administration of the word and ordinances, we stand above all other denominations, on apostolic ground; we must therefore be free from error, and a salt that cannot lose its savor." Now if we mistake not, we see an error, fatal to spirituality, penetrating and infusing itself into their very vitals. We have been surprised to find many of their ministers and other members fallen into the no-Sabbath, no-law system. It may not be very generally or plainly preached; but if you approach them on the Sabbath question, they avow it, to get rid of that troublesome sense of inconsistency, which a conscious departure from the world's hope produces.

A cancerous humor will sometimes lie dormant in a human body, that otherwise enjoys ordinary health, until some extraneous cause calls it into morbid activity. We fear much that this will be the case with our Baptist brethren, and the doctrine of inferential authority, when the Sabbath question comes to be fully discussed among them, as a number of their leading men have taken a hostile attitude toward that subject. The mariner may as well think to stop or disregard the under currents in the ocean, while he shapes his course by the compass alone, as for our Baptist brethren to think of stopping or disregarding the discussions of the Sabbath question. The time has come for that question to be freely and fairly met. There is a concurrence of causes that no man nor any one denomination can control, demanding attention to that matter. It is discussed 1st. The Papal banner floats on the high places of our land, and it says of the first day, that it is not the Sabbath, but a festival of the church, and produces this fact as a triumphant proof that Protestants admit something besides Bible authority.

2d. The high churchman says, The first day is not the Sabbath, but a festival of the church; and repeats it every time he hears the authority of the church called in question.

3d. The no-church, no-ministry, no-ordinance party, are strongly entrenched behind this Sabbath question. They show it up triumphantly that "Sunday is no Bible Sabbath."

4th. There is a widely spread and every where spreading religious libertinism, which exults in being able to show that "Sunday is no Sabbath," because it releases them from a disagreeable responsibility.

5th. The infidel points to the absurdity of a Sunday Sabbath as proof that Christianity is not consistent with itself.

6th. The publications, sermons, and conversation, of the Seventh-day Baptists, are being felt in more than half the States of the Union, and we are not aware that any serious attempt is being made to despoil them of the argument. Indeed, to do so would necessarily lead the assailant where Rome or high-churchism would immediately encircle him within her arms; or subject him to be exhibited as teaching the greatest inconsistencies, by all these other antagonistic parties.

7th. There is a time in human affairs when God mocks all the puny efforts of men to carry their own devices against his own revealed will.

On this subject, Bro. C. well says, (page 50)—"It could not be but that the means which have been resorted to for concealing truth, and for the suppression of its influence where it could not be hid, should have a fatal effect on the interests of vital Christianity. It ought not to be wondered at if, when an appeal is made to authority, and even to pride, against the dictates of conscience in our duty to God, conscience should come at length to have little to do; and pride and convenience should supply her place."

We heartily accord to the ministry among our Baptist brethren in this country great purity and devotedness. "Still the system is essentially anti-Christian," which amalgamates Sabbath and Sunday, as is that which says no law, no Sabbath; "and the evil it has wrought in other lands must be expected from it here. Every thing evil, in this country, as well as every thing good, is yet in its beginning. The tiger we caress may seem a kitten because it is young; but we ought not to forget that although it may be harmless now, it is the offspring of a beast that has covered Europe with blood." (pages 53, 54.)

The usages of Protestant communions, which rest on human authority alone, constitute a cord by which they are drawn towards Rome; and unless that cord is severed, just as sure as human nature shall be consistent with its own history, Protestantism will be swallowed up by Popery. As the doctrine of the authority of tradition in matters of religion does of right belong to Rome, consistency requires that they who submit to it should acknowledge its source. And it will come to be so. "From such an issue, nothing can save us but an utter rejection of all authority but that of the New Testament;" and we would say, the holy Scriptures. If our Baptist brethren indulge in a foolish fondness for one human institution, which displaces an institution of Heaven, because so many good men observe it and so much good is done upon it and early church history favors it, and they can draw some inferences from certain isolated passages of sacred writ, "the day will come when posterity will charge them with admitting the authority of tradition in matters of religion." Consistency is a jewel they can ill afford to part with; its appearance has been to them in the baptismal controversy like the towers and bulwarks of Jerusalem. But let it appear that that they admit the authority of Sunday-keeping on the same ground that Pedo baptists defend infant baptism, and they will be shorn of their strength.

"The position of the churches of this denomination is one of awful responsibility and surpassing glory. Would to Heaven that they better understood their position and their mission! God has raised them up to be living witnesses for his truth, and to furnish a standing protest against the perversions and corruptions of the religion of Christ. Through them He has already given inestimable blessings to the church catholic and to the world." (page 77.) But if, when the truth which maketh light, shall manifest to the world that they also have symbolized with that abomination spoken of by Daniel the prophet, and received its change of times and laws, they then refuse to take hold of God's holy Sabbath to keep it, to love the Lord their God and serve him; then must they fall from this eminence to which an adherence to other truths has exalted them. But should they speedily "reject" all tradition, and conjecture, and convenience, and partiality, and predjudice, and worldly interest, and defer all their Sabbath-keeping faith and practice to the divine authority of the inspired scriptures; it would bring a crisis in the history of the world more glorious and potent than any that has occurred since the first promulgation of Christianity.

Our notes on this book are more extended than we at first intended, but we must now bring them to a close by adopting as the language of our own hearts, a part of Bro. C.'s excellent preface:—

"It is not a pleasant thing to animanadvert on long-established, religiously-cherished errors. And it could be to no one more unpleasant than to the writer. He can say, sincerely, that he loves the features of the Christian wherever he sees them, and that he recognizes them, to greater or less extent, under every badge of religious profession. His connections, moreover, being almost entirely among the supporters of the sentiments of which he has spoken, every social and worldly consideration pleads with him for silence, where even speaking the truth in love may give pain to dear friends and excellent Christians. But the time, show that the day has come when the corruptions of Christianity must be dealt with faithfully, and Christianity itself must be vindicated from the superstitious institutes and usages which have claimed its authority and assumed its name.

"May God grant to all who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity, the knowledge of his truth; strength to obey his commands; and a willingness to part with a right hand for a pure conscience."

ABUSES OF CHURCH INDEPENDENCE.

The following weighty suggestions on a subject of vital importance to the prosperity of Baptist churches, forms a portion of the Circular Letter read at the late session of the Hudson River Association, prepared by Rev. John Dowling, of New York:—

One of the most serious abuses of church independency, and one of the most disastrous in its consequences, is the facility with which some churches introduce persons to the Christian ministry.

There is no prerogative of a church of Christ, that is more solemn than that of granting a license to preach the gospel, and none which should be exercised with greater deliberation, caution, and prayer for divine direction and counsel. It is not at all uncommon for young men as soon as they are converted, in the fervor and warmth of their early religious feelings, to conclude, whether possessing the requisite talents or not, that it is their duty to preach; probably an attentive examination would show that a majority of young men, converted in early life, have these impressions in a greater or less degree.

Now what is the duty of the church in these cases? Evidently to foster and encourage such as give evidence of having been called of God to the work of preaching the gospel; but not to conclude, in every case, that because a young man, in the fervor of his zeal, thinks that he is called to preach, or simply because he shows some aptness at picking up a few words of Latin or Greek, that it is, therefore, his duty to enter upon the sacred work of the Christian ministry. No one acquainted with the ministry in our denomination, and in some others, can doubt that there are many, bearing the name of ministers, who might have been more happy, and have done far better service to the cause of Christ, had they pursued some calling to which their talents and capacities were better adapted. It has often been remarked, that many a good deacon has been spoiled to make a poor preacher; and if some, who are compelled to spend nearly or quite half their time traveling in search of a location, had been advised by their brethren to pursue an honorable career in mechanical, agricultural, or mercantile life, instead of being licensed to preach, they might have been an honor, an ornament, and a blessing to the churches, instead of being, as they now too frequently are, a burden to themselves, to their families, and to their brethren.

Sometimes it happens, that where an application for a license is refused, by a church who have had the opportunity for years to judge of the talents and qualifications of the applicant, he will solicit a letter to some small church at a distance, and after the acquaintance of but a few weeks, they will grant him that which had been refused by those who had enjoyed the longest and the best opportunity of forming an accurate judgment. In cases like this, there is an evident abuse of church independency; and without dictating or pretending in the least to interfere with their independence, it is respectfully submitted to the consideration of small and feeble churches, especially where a majority of those members are young and inexperienced, whether it would not be wise, before exercising the responsible prerogative of licensing one of their members as a minister of the everlasting gospel; in every case to seek the advice and counsel, either of some judicious ministers of the gospel, or of some wise and experienced private brethren in the neighboring churches.

DEATH.

BY DR. NOTT.

There is at least one great occasion in the life of every man; there is one decisive act that tries the spirit, and puts the destinies of the soul at issue. Neither the skeptic's wavering confidence, nor the duellist's blind temerity, befits this dread solemnity. The wretch that thrusts himself into his Maker's presence, and the wretch who, being called for, dares, without preparation and without concern, to enter it, deserves alike our reprobation. The one resembles the maniac who leaps the precipice; the other, the sot who staggers off it regardless of its height, and unmindful of the shock that awaits his fall. From such spectacles of self-destruction, the mind turns away with mingled emotions of pity, disgust and horror. How unlike the good man's death. Here there is real majesty. Nothing below exceeds, nothing equals it. To see a human being crowded to the verge of life, and standing on that line that connects and divides eternity and time, excites a solemn interest. But oh! what words can express the grandeur of the death-scene, when the individual about to make the dread experiment, sensible of his condition, and with heaven and hell, judgement and eternity full in view, is calm, collected, confident; and, relying on the merits of his Saviour and the faithfulness of his God, is eager to depart? Perhaps the sainted Stephen here occurs to mind; Stephen, with heaven beaming from his countenance, as, sinking under the pressures of his enemies, he raises his dying eyes to glory, and says, 'Lord Jesus, receive my spirit.' Perhaps the Israelitish prophet, as, dropping his consecrated mantle on his pupil, he mounts the whirlwind from the banks of Jordan; or perhaps fires of martyrdom,—'I am ready to be offered up; I have fought the good fight; I have kept the faith; and there is henceforth laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the righteous Lord will deliver unto me; and not to me only, but to all those that love his appearing.'

'How our hearts burn within us at the scene!
Whence this brave bound o'er limits set to man!
His God supports him in his final hour,
His final hour brings glory to his God.
We gaze, we weep mix'd tears of grief and joy;
Amazement strikes; devotion burns to flame;
Christians admire, and infidels believe."

DEATH-BEDS OF INFIDELS.

Maupertius, a member of the Academy of Sciences, and a learned astronomer, had in his works favored the senseless belief of materialists. But seeing death advance to gather him to the grave, he began to reflect upon his pride and folly, confessed his sins, and died at Basle, in 1759, in the arms of two Capuchin friars, whose presence he had solicited.

Fontenelle, one of the founders of the philosophic school, died at Paris on the 11th of January, 1757. On the first of that month, finding the symptoms of his disease very threatening, he had sent for a priest, and solicited the sacrament of religion, which he received in his perfect senses.

Boulanger, author of a most dangerous and impious work, entitled "Antiquity Unveiled," (Antiquite devoilee) on his death-bed gave evidence of the most lively remorse. He was visited by Mr. Lambert, canon of St. Honore, with whom he had several conferences on the subject of religion, giving many evidences of sorrow and repentance. He died on the 16th of September, 1759.

Buffon, whose systems have caused him to be ranked among the Philosophers, in his last hours gave evidence of the most religious sentiments. He made his confession to Ignatius Eougault, Capuchin, and having received the sacrament, died in 1788.

"I CANNOT STAND THAT."—And what could not the sailor "stand?" He had stood the beating of many a storm. Often had he mounted up to heaven and gone down again into the depths.—Many a time had his soul been melted because of trouble. Yet he has rode out the storm; trod the billowy deep boldly, and given his troubles to the winds. But now he meets something which he "cannot stand." What is it? He can stand the perils of a shore. He can bear being a night and a day in the deep. He can buffet the hardest gale that ever blew off the "Horn." He can do and endure more severe labor and hardship than any other man; but now he knocks under. It is the picture, on the cover of a tract, of a woman teaching a child. "O," said he, "I cannot stand that; it reminds me of my poor dear mother; it is just the way she used to teach me; but she is gone; and he burst into tears.

Mother! there is no human teachings like your own. Call your boy to your side, and give him instructions warm from a mother's heart. And should that boy break away from his home, and become a rover on the deep, some little incident may recall the scenes of his early years. He, too, may be reminded of his "poor dear mother," who used to call him to her side, and tell him about Jesus Christ and the way to eternal life.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, July 10, 1845.

☞ We cheerfully make room for the following report of the proceedings of the Western Association, though we do so at the expense of omitting most of our own editorials. The report is ably written, and we trust will be generally read.

Western Association.

[From our Correspondent, Thomas B. Brown.]

The Western Association of Seventh-day Baptist Churches assembled with the 2d Church in Alfred, Allegany Co., N. Y., on the 25th of June. After an appropriate sermon from Elder Griswold of Independence, from 1 Tim. 1: 11, "According to the glorious gospel of the blessed God," Bro. N. V. HULL was chosen Moderator, and brethren C. D. LANGWORTHY and N. WARDNER, Secretaries.

State of the Churches.

The letters from the churches being read, showed that they had, for the most part, partaken of the apathy which so generally obtains at the present time among all orders of Christians. Only two or three of them had been favored with additions while some had rather diminished, and others remained about the same as last year. There were some things, however, of a pleasing nature, among which was the accession of a new church raised up in Potter Co., Pa., within the year, all of whose members were a short time since in the observance of the first day of the week. This is encouraging, as it adds another to the already numerous proofs that the work of reform is still onward, notwithstanding the mighty and systematic effort to keep the Sabbath of man's device in countenance. Another pleasing circumstance, verbally stated by Bro. Hull, was that our brother Leman Andrus, who labors with the little church in Pendleton, and who was himself not long since a worthy minister of the First-day Baptist connection, is carrying on a war of aggression with great vigor in the region where he lives, having gone to Lockport, and stirred up a great excitement in reference to the Sabbath. Our compliments to the brother who gave us such a scoring in the April No. of the Biblical Repository, hoping that if he cannot be easy under all these evidences that Seventh-day Baptists are "spreading their sentiments with a zeal hitherto unparalleled in any age or country," he will at least be as easy as he can.

Written Articles of Faith.

Upon the Report of the Committee on Petitions, concerning the reception of the Church in Ulysses into the fellowship of the Association, it was ascertained that although that church was founded upon a compact which recognized several of the fundamental principles of the gospel, yet it had no written articles of faith. Upon this some discussion arose, respondent did not hear all of the remarks made on this subject, as he was called out in the commencement. One of the delegates from Ulysses remarked, that so far as the church understood the views of the denomination, it accorded with them, otherwise it would not have applied for admission. Bro. GRISWOLD remarked, that he thought that articles of faith should not extend beyond the discipline of the church. He made a reference to our own denominational Expose, which recognized the imposition of hands upon newly-baptized members as an apostolic practice; nevertheless we tolerated many members, and even whole churches, in the disregard of it.

Bro. HULL remarked that he knew of no reason in his own mind why this church, as it now stands, should not be received; but in days to come the church might undergo a great change, and then it would be all-important to have something to appeal to.

Bro. BROWN remarked, that however important written articles might be, yet their benefit rather had respect to the church itself. He would advise the Church, for its own benefit, to have a definite and written expression of its creed. But so far as its connection with this Association was concerned, he saw no necessity for it. We as an Association recognize the Expose of Doctrine given by the General Conference, and if that church is received, it comes in upon that platform, and upon no other. If at any future time it should be found that the Church had rejected this Expose, we could withdraw fellowship from it, so that it should have no farther participation in the privileges of this body. As for any other discipline, it was not in our power to resort to it, the Church being an independent body. It were as rational for a church to require each of its own members to have a written creed as a condition of membership, as for an Association to require of each of its churches written articles. It is enough that the Association itself has such articles.

After some other remarks, the Church was unanimously received, and the right hand of fellowship given to their representative.

Missionary Operations.

Among the reports of committees, that on Missionary Operations was particularly interesting. It recommended that the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association be invited to conduct its operations within the territorial limits of this Association upon the following principles:—

1. That all funds raised by this Association shall be scrupulously applied to the object or objects for which they shall be designated.
2. That an Executive Committee shall be appointed, through whom shall pass all funds to the Missionary Association, and who shall have power to apprize the value of clothing, produce, or any other articles that may be contributed for missionary purposes.
3. This Executive Committee to report its doings accurately to this Association.

Upon the foregoing conditions this Association becomes Auxiliary to the Missionary Association. By way of carrying the scheme fully into effect, each church is recommended to raise its missionary funds in such a way as it shall deem best, and to transmit them to the Executive Committee from time to time, whenever practicable. According to this plan, there is in the Western Association a Committee, of which Elder J. H. COCHRAN is Chairman, with whom the Missionary Board can correspond and take advice as to the most suitable fields of labor to be occupied, and upon whose Treasurer orders can be drawn for the payment of Missionaries. Indeed, this Committee can perform whatever business may be entrusted to it, so that all the operations of the Missionary Board in this region can be prompt and efficient.

Legislation in favor of Sabbath-keepers.

We pass over many items of business not particularly interesting to the general reader, in order to notice a few of the resolutions reported by the Business Committee. One of them was substantially the same as that acted upon by the Central Association at its late session, in relation to the case of MAXSON ads. ANNAS. It recommended a memorial to the Legislature for an amenmendment of the laws, so that Seventh-day Baptists might [illegible] with others. BRO. JAMES BAILEY was present as messenger from that Association, and advocated the measure in an able speech. He said that from 1671 there had existed Seventh-day Baptist churches, but until recently no action had been taken to secure to them the same protection of their civil rights and religious privileges, as that enjoyed by other citizens. The consequence was, that many of them had been harrassed in various ways. They were often summoned to attend upon juries, or to perform some town business, or to do military duty, notwithstanding their known religious sentiments. At length it was thought that we had suffered such grievances long enough, and it was high time to move for a remedy. In 1839 the Legislature was memorialized on the subject, and the petition referred to a committee which reported adverse to the prayer of the petitioners. The report, however, was again referred to a committee with instructions to bring in a bill in our favor. The law was accordingly passed, and it was supposed to be all that we wanted. But a case has recently occurred in DeRuyter, which shows that the law is not sufficient for our protection. It is therefore necessary that we ask for an amendment. This resolution looks to that object. We, as good citizens, ought to ask nothing less than what other good citizens enjoy. He thought there were great numbers of first day people, who had such a just sense of what was due to human rights, that they would unite with us in this movement. At all events, it was high time to act, and he hoped our people would feel bound to exert themselves to the utmost. He then adverted to the probable course this business that it might lead to such investigation on the part of the committee to whom it might be referred, and to such a complete report concerning our history as a people and our sentiments, as would bring out an important Sabbath document, and send it to every family in the State—a document worthy of being placed beside Dr. Edwards' Permanent Sab. Documents. We have contributed our share, said Bro. B., to the support of the State and its laws, and are as much entitled to protection as others. We have been doing a little Sabbath business as a denomination, and there never was such an excitement on the subject as at present. It is getting to be in every man's mouth. We can go no where but we hear people talk on the subject. First day people are becoming uneasy, and doing all they can to secure legal enactments in their favor; let us not then sleep over the present crisis.

The resolution was seconded by Bro. HULL, who said he was satisfied not only of the importance of the resolution, but that it was high time for us to act. We must take hold vigorously in the fear of God. He adverted to the defect in the law, upon which he had taken eminent counsel. He said there was as much religious tyranny in America, in proportion to the circumstances which give it advantage to develop itself, as in any other country. To prove this, he referred to a minister who in preaching last Sunday upon the subject of the Sabbath, appeared to be exceedingly vexed at the liberties we enjoy; and after he had got through, called upon one of his brethren to pray. The brother did so, and said, "O Lord God, we thank thee for the liberties we enjoy, but, O Lord, may we be kept within proper bounds!"—to which more than half-a-dozen voices immediately responded AMEN. He hoped the resolution would pass, and that we would carry it out to the letter.

The resolution did pass unanimously.

Foreign Missions.

Bro. T. B. BROWN presented a resolution approbatory of the course of the Missionary Association in determining to establish a Foreign Mission, and commending it to the liberalities and prayers of the churches. He sustained the resolution with a somewhat lengthy address, which for want of room is omitted here.

Bro. COCHRAN followed, remarking that he felt inadequate to do justice to the subject. It is a subject which, when carried out in vigorous action, has uniformly been productive of greater blessings than any other to which the attention of Christians has been called. He felt the necessity of lifting up fervent prayer to God that he may give us grace to carry this measure into effect. Some years ago action was taken in this very Association in reference to Foreign Missions, and he had never seen more feeling manifested on any subject. But we had suffered that feeling to die away, notwithstanding all the convictions of duty upon which it was founded, and we now stand more guilty before God than before. He feared it was because we had not prayed for God's blessing. He had no expectation of good from this new effort, unless prayer accompanied it. He then alluded to objections that were frequently made to this work. Some said we had heathen enough at home. He believed this objection was put into their hearts by the father of lies. Where would we and all the rest of the Gentile world have been, if Jesus Christ and his apostles had said, 'plenty of heathen at home.' And if Martin Luther and his coadjutors had said so, what would have been the condition of those nations that now enjoy the blessings of the Protestant religion? What would Great Britain have been, if this spirit had governed those who had it in charge to preach truth to the nations? Nothing at all would have been done. If we really feel that there are plenty of heathen at home, how much are we doing for them? Persons who make this objection, are generally the last to labor for the spiritual benefit of their near neighbors. Another objection urged, is that the heathen are as well off without the gospel, as if it were given to them. Some persons really seem to wish that they were heathen, that they may get rid of those responsibilities which grow out of that knowledge of their duty, which revelation has given them. But if the heathen are really as well off without the gospel as with it, why then did Christ command it to be preached? And why such a fearful penalty annexed in case of disobedience to it? Others again said, 'Let us cleanse ourselves before we go to the heathen.' But the apostles might have urged the same objection, when they saw that the great mass of their countrymen were yet under sin. We have been carrying on this cleansing operation, said Bro. C., and what is the result? We are as polluted as ever. The only way to cleanse ourselves is to engage in that work which Christ requires of us. He made many other interesting remarks, and the resolution passed unanimously.

American Sabbath Tract Society.

Presented by Bro. HULL, and seconded by ROWSE BABCOCK—

Resolved, That the American Sabbath Tract Society is viewed by this Association as an institution of great importance, and that it ought to be sustained by our churches in its efforts to diffuse a knowledge of those principles which distinguish us as a denomination.

Bro. HULL said that this resolution was one of a kindred nature with the preceding, inasmuch as it contemplated the spread of divine truth. It is necessary, however, that it should receive special attention, as the Tract Society proposed to disseminate Sabbath doctrine. It is important to disseminate this doctrine, for our views, our motives, and our feelings, are not understood by other Christians. They are known only through the instrumentality of our opposers, and hence appear to the greatest possible disadvantage. We ought to disabuse the public mind. In its efforts to accomplish this object, the Society has thus far been very successful. Many h[illegible] changed, so that they see we are governed by sincere motives, and that the intelligence with which our cause is advocated entitles us to respect. Many have embraced our views. What has already been done affords the promise of an abundant harvest.

Bro. H. adverted to his visit last fall to the Baltimore Convention. During the intermission, on the second day of that Convention, the house was well supplied with our Tracts, Vindicators, and Address to the Baptists. Every seat in the house, both below and in the gallery, was furnished, and many were laid in the windows. On the return of the delegates these tracts we re eagerly seized, and so earnestly engaged were all in reading them, that it was next to impossible to gain their attention to the business of the Convention; nor would they give heed, until the smaller tracts were read, while every now and then one would be calling the attention of his neighbor to something which particularly arrested his mind.

Bro. H. also spoke of a visit which he had made to Chautauque County. During that visit he called on a man, who was a member of the Baptist Convention held at Syracuse a year ago last fall. To that Convention a copy of the Address to the Baptists was forwarded, which was referred to a committee that reported that no notice ought to be taken of it, inasmuch as it did not come within their province. Bro. H. asked the gentleman, if he did not suppose that provided a communication had been sent to the Convention from any Pedobaptist denomination on the subject of Baptism, they would have found it within their province to notice. The answer was, "Most undoubtedly." And why then could they not find a way to notice this subject? "The truth is," said the gentleman, "it is a difficult business."

During the same visit, Bro. H. preached on the subject of the Sabbath to a very large audience. During the delivery of his sermon, a very gifted and intelligent first day brother, was heard to say a number of times in a low tone of voice, "Truth, Lord," and great numbers acknowledged the correctness of the doctrine. Tracts were eagerly sought.

Let us come up to the help of the Tract Society, said Bro. H. God forbid that the spirit of sectarianism should preside over this matter, yet it has its importance, which must not be overlooked. There are brethren who are pouring out their money like dust in this cause, and we must not leave them to do it alone.

Bro. BABCOCK followed with some spirited remarks, and among other things related an account of one of the old Seventh-day Baptist Almanacs, printed in Homer many years ago, falling into the hands of a Deacon of a first-day Baptist church, by reason of which he was excited to some thoughts on the subject. These thoughts at last assumed such an importance in his mind, that he was anxious to read more on the subject. For some time, however, he met with no opportunity to gratify this anxiety. At last, dropping into a store one day, he saw lying on the counter a number of the Sabbath Vindicator. He asked for the loan of it. The merchant told him he was welcome to it, as it was of no use to him. He took it home and read it with avidity, and after some time became firmly convinced of his duty to keep the Sabbath of the Bible. He therefore commenced doing his duty, leaving family, friends, church, and every other hindrance, for the sake of honoring his Lord. Soon the subject began to be agitated in the community. It was talked about, and preached upon, and finally a church of 16 members was raised, that has now been received into this body.

The resolution passed unanimously.

The Sabbath Recorder.

A resolution, the same in substance as that adopted by the Eastern Association, approving the Sabbath Recorder, and recommending it to public patronage, was presented by Eld. Z. CAMPBELL, who sustained it with interesting remarks. He regretted his own past inefficiency as an agent for the paper; he had felt delicate about urging many persons to subscribe for it, fearing their circumstances would not afford it; yet he had afterwards found that those very persons had expended vastly more for extravagances. He hoped the paper would be vigorously sustained. As this is the organ through which the denomination speaks to the world, let us keep its lungs in a healthy, speaking condition.

Bro. RANDOLPH followed in support of the resolution, and spoke of the benefit of the paper to a family. He adverted to his own family. His children would leave their meals for the sake of the paper, and a fresh number coming to hand would always call them from their play. They remembered its contents, and would talk about them. He sometimes thought, that instead of taking one, he would have to take three or four.

Education for the Ministry.

Bro. KENYON submitted the following:—

Resolved, That this Association ought to make some provision for the education of pious, talented, but indigent young men, who desire to consecrate themselves exclusively to the gospel ministry.

Br. K. sustained this resolution by an appropriate speech, which we would give in detail, did not our limits forbid. He said that God, for wise reasons, usually chose men who were poor in this world's goods for the great work of the ministry. Hence the church must educate them, as they cannot do it themselves. Those who study medicine, or law, even if they run in debt for it, can in a few years pay their debt, their profession being lucrative. Not so with ministers; they are always kept poor, and especially if one goes to a heathen land, there is not the slightest probability that he will ever be able to pay for his education. BRO. K. said he was in earnest in this matter, and he meant to give proof of it. It will cost something to educate these young men, and it must come from our pockets. I say not from your, but from our pockets. Our means are such that the tuition of a young man will cost but $15 a year. His board will cost but $45. Now, said he, I hereby pledge myself for the tuition of 10 young men for 10 successive years, provided our brethren will pledge themselves for their board. That is, I will give tuition to the amount of $150 a year for 10 years, provided our brethren will secure board to the amount of $450 a year for the same period.

Brn. Brown, Hull, and others, seconded the resolution with remarks, and it was adopted unanimously. To carry the resolution into effect, a committee was appointed to frame a Constitution for an Education Society. The Committee reported a Constitution, which was adopted, and other measures were taken to promote the object. This Association has therefore an Education Society. May all other Associations imitate their example.

Legislation in Favor of Sunday.

A resolution was then presented, which contemplated the circulation of petitions to our State and National Legislatures, in case any measures should be resorted to by our first day brethren to procure legal enactments in their favor, either by closing the canals, stopping the mails, or any other method. Bro. Griswold sustained the resolutions somewhat at length, and was followed by Bro. Jas. Bailey in a spirited manner. Bro. B. did not know but some might think that work enough had been laid out, without adding this, and that it was therefore best to stop. But this is only the beginning—the mere title page. We have abundance of work to do, and the time has come when we must work, or die. He did not know but the language of Mordecai to Esther was in point. "If thou altogether holdest thy peace at this time, then shall deliverance arise from another quarter; but thou and thy father's house shall be destroyed: and who knows whether thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this?" Heretofore we have been guilty, as a denomination, in keeping the truth committed to us laid up as it were in a napkin; and he sometimes thought God was preparing a scourge for us. Mighty efforts were in progress to bring about such a state of things, as would bear with unjust severity upon all who refuse to honor the Sunday. He was on some accounts glad of it, and would say, "Lay on, Macduff." In the time of the Revolution, when the British were scouring the Carolinas, burning and pillaging the houses, and committing every manner of depredation, Gen. Marion said he rejoiced in it, because it had a tendency to wake up the people from their lethargy. Bro. B. hoped that these efforts of first day people would be taken as a solemn admonition to labor more earnestly for the truth.

Other brethren followed with pertinent remarks, and the resolution was adopted with entire unanimity.

Many other resolutions of a character somewhat interesting were adopted, and the entire business of the Association was conducted with perfect harmony. The Association meets next year with the church in Clarence, Erie Co., N. Y. It will also be represented in the next Anniversaries of the Missionary Association and Tract Societies, brethren Hull and Cochran having been appointed delegates for that purpose.

Conclusion.

In closing this article, your correspondent cannot forbear remarking, that besides our Anniversaries in Plainfield, he has now attended three Associations in succession, and in every one of them indications of good have been seen. Our brethren all through the denomination seem to be impressed that it is high time for us to awake out of sleep. Those little jealousies, which have formerly disturbed our harmony, seem to be pretty much gone. It is the goodness of God surely, which has brought us into this state; and if we are but faithful to take advantage of it, and immediately betake ourselves to the work which the Lord assigns to us, it cannot be doubted that we shall soon see such changes as will gladden our hearts, and astonish our eyes. Let every man remember what a fearful responsibility he lies under with reference to preserving this state of harmony. Let him fear lest by some misguided movement, or ill advised expression, he should stir up a strife, and throw every thing into disorder. Brethren, if you love the cause of Christ, act vigorously, and be sure to pray before you act.

HOW IT WORKS.

We have often spoken of the palpable inconsistency of quoting those passages of Scripture in which the word Sabbath occurs to support the claims of the first day of the week. We have also shown, that as soon as the different "schools" of first-day keepers get into a dispute with each other on the subject, they refer to this inconsistency as being sufficient to destroy the testimony of those who are guilty of it. Another form in which a similar inconsistency appears, and a similar charge is made, has just fallen under our eye. It occurs in a discussion between Adin Ballou, editor of the Practical Christian, and one of the editors of the Perfectionist. The editor of the Perfectionist asks the question, "where Christ has declared weekly Sabbath-keeping to be appropriate to the Christian dispensation?" Mr. Ballou, in answer, refers to Christ's custom of going into the synagogue on the Sabbath, and then quotes what he says about the law and the prophets—"Think not that I am come to destroy the law or the prophets; I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil; for verily I say unto you, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law till all be fulfilled." Now hear what the editor of the Perfectionist says in reply to this quotation, and learn from it how completely a charge of inconsistency will paralize the force of an argument. Here it is:—

"Mr. B. himself will not say that this passage makes the letter of the Sabbath statute obligatory; for we presume he does not observe the day of the week which that statute designates. In keeping the first instead of the seventh day, he sacrifices at least 'a jot or tittle' of the verbal command. If then he allows himself to pass from the letter to the spirit of the law so far as to hold that the observance of one day in seven is all that is enjoined, he opens a door through which he must allow us to go a little farther, by asserting, first, that the observance of the seventh part of every day is as truly a fulfillment of the law as the observance of one day in seven, if that day is not the one named in the statute; and, secondly, that he who gives his body, from time to time, as much rest as his health and spiritual interests require, without any reference to prescribed times and seasons, more faithfully obeys the spirit of the fourth commandment than they who regulate their work and rest by the calendar."

SABBATH MOVEMENTS.—Rev. Mr. Powell, Agent of the Philadelphia Sabbath Association, has published an account of two Conventions recently held at Williamsport and Northumberland, Pa., at which the usual subjects were discussed, by the men who usually discuss them, before a "respectable number of delegates." Mr. Powell thinks the cause is progressing in Pennsylvania. He regrets, however, to learn, that the locks on the Tide Water Canal are again opened on the Sabbath. His opinion is, that it arises from "the conduct of the lock-tenders and boatmen during the Sabbath, and that the difficulty might be obviated by increasing the amount of missionary labor." Strange that the boatmen and lock-tenders who have been represented as being so anxious to have the Sabbath given to them, should so abuse it as to make it necessary to take it from them!

CHURCH-BUILDING IN SCOTLAND.—During the past year, five hundred and thirty church edifices were erected for the use of the Free Church of Scotland. Seventy more are now in progress. The cost of the whole will be about $1,400,000. The Free Church has also raised $390,000 for the support of pastors, and $400,000 for other benevolent purposes. That speaks well for the influence of division in Scotland, and suggests that division might possibly be useful in other places.

THE KIND OF MINISTERS NEEDED.—The Rev. Dr. Beecher, describing in a public address the character of ministers needed at the West, said, When the strong, doctrinal, pungent and discriminating preaching of Baxter and Edwards gives place to moonshine and nocturnal rainbows and mysticism which no human mind can comprehend, delivered by men with rings on their lilly fingers, holding cambric handkerchiefs to eyes that never weep for sin, then farewell to the fire of the altar, farewell to true revivals of religion, farewell to the salvation of the souls of men.

General Intelligence.

IMPORTANT FROM TEXAS.—The U. S. Steamer Princeton arrived at Annapolis, Md., on the 3d inst., bringing Texas dates to the 23d of June. The Texan Congress assembled on the 16th of June, when the President sent in a Message, transmitting to Congress, for such action as they might deem suitable, the proposition of the United States for the annexation of Texas, and its incorporation as a State into the Union. Resolutions assenting to Annexation were immediately introduced in both Houses, which were almost unanimously adopted, after a little discussion. A resolution was passed by the Senate of Texas, offering "a nation's gratitude to General Andrew Jackson." A bill was passed setting apart a portion of the public land, lying between the Arkansas and Red rivers, for the payment of the national debt. The propositions of Mexico for a treaty of peace have been rejected. A resolution has been passed inviting the U. S. troops to occupy the Texan posts. A resolution had also been introduced into both Houses of Congress, requiring the Executive to surrender all ports, navy-yards, barracks, &c. to the authorities of the United States.

ANOTHER GREAT FIRE IN QUEBEC.—On Saturday evening, June 28th, just one month after the great fire of May 28, another fire commenced in Quebec near where the former one stopped. The wind was high, and the weather had been very dry. Of course the fire made rapid progress; and it was not checked until it had destroyed about thirteen hundred buildings, leaving houseless at least six thousand persons, in addition to the numbers deprived of a home by the previous conflagration. By this catastrophe about thirty streets have been laid in ruins, and nearly another third of Quebec destroyed. The total of the fires which have happened in that place during the last seventy years do not equal either one of those which have occurred within a month.

FIFTEEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The steamship Acadia reached Boston on the 3d inst., bringing foreign news to June 19.

Trade is flourishing in all its departments. The cotton market has reached its lowest state of depression, and buyers are wary.

The Maynooth bill has passed into a law.

The repeal agitation in Ireland is as great as ever, and the leaders are equally sanguine of success and determined to obtain it.

FRANCE.—M. Guizot has announced that France will not oppose the annexation of Texas if the people of that country desire it, but he admitted he had rather not see it take place.

The project of a line of steamers between France and the United States has been revived.

The carpenters of Paris have struck work for an increase of one franc per day in their wages. Their present pay averages four francs a day and has been the same for nearly twenty years.

RUSSIA.—Preparations for the summer campaign in the Caucasus, this year, are said to be immense: 150,000 men are to be employed. Two ukases for recruiting the army have been published.

In letters from St. Petersburgh it is stated that the Emperor intended to advance near to, if not to the actual scene of the war in Caucasus. The disasters that have befallen the Russian armies in that country have been so terrible, that even if victory should crown their present efforts (which is doubtful) they will not have much to boast of.

The population of Russia consists of upwards of 53,000,000 persons, of whom more than 43,000,000 are serfs. On the estates of the Crown there are about 15,000,000 serfs,—the rest are the property of the nobles.

POLAND.—The object of the visit of the Emperor Nicholas to this city, says a private letter from Warsaw, is believed to have been to arrange the necessary measures for the introduction of the Russian code of laws, and of Russian judges, in place of Polish laws and Polish judges.

The poor people, already cruelly oppressed, view the abolition of the laws under which they have heretofore lived, with dismay; but they can do nothing but submit thereto. The Emperor is also bent upon doing away with the Catholic religion, substituting that of the Greek church; another measure most repugnant to the people.

In some provinces a dreadful famine is raging, and the misery of the people is appalling.

GERMANY.—From Germany alone, during the year 1844, not less than forty-five thousand emigrated to the United States, and this year the number is still greater in proportion. But notwithstanding so extensive a deportation, Vaterland is still sufficiently peopled—too thickly peopled perhaps—to afford a comfortable subsistence to all its children.

In every State in Germany railways have been formed; but of the great number of these eisenbahuen there are only two that do not pay an excellent interest, whilst in many the shares cannot be purchased at double their original cost.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.

Five Major Generals of the British Army have died within a few weeks.

The English fashions are now all the rage in Paris—even to the shaving of beards, although the moustaches and a liberal allowance of whisker are still retained.

The life of the Rev. Sydney Smith is to be written by Thomas Moore.

The heat in France has lately been intense. The Parisians attribute it to the comet.

An electric gun has been exhibited in London which fired one thousand balls a minute. The mode of operation is a secret, but it is supposed to be by an explosion of gases.

According to the last report of the committee on public petitions, it appears that 10,075 petitions, signed by 1,232,201 persons, had been presented to the House of Commons against the Maynooth Bill; 88 petitions, signed by 17,408 persons, had been presented in favor of the bill.

The Coroner's inquest held upon Mr. Seton, killed in a duel, returned a verdict of wilful murder against both principal and seconds.

Mr. John Rusley of Glossop, aged seventy, was recently married to a bride of sixty, was taken suddenly ill the same night, and died in a few hours.

A young man named Henry Warburton was apprehended picking pockets during the execution of Connor the murderer. So much for the gallows instruction and example.

A magnificent Comet visible to the naked eye has been discovered in Europe, nearly due north, in the constellation Auriga, about two degrees eastward of the bright star Capella, and apparently from five to eight degrees above the horizon.

WAR IN SYRIA.

A war of a very sanguinary character, growing out of religious animosities, is now in progress in the mountains of Syria. The following account of it is taken from a private letter dated May 17:—

"A civil war, and one of extermination, reigns at this moment in the mountains, between the Druses and the Christians, and during the last fifteen days the horrors we have seen perpetrated around us are dreadful. On every side the sounds of battle are heard, and nothing is seen but fire and flame—houses, villages, churches and convents being reciprocally a prey to the flames. At the moment I write (May 17) we have before us the appalling spectacle of no less than eleven villages and a number of Maronite churches and convents in flames; and what is worse, when the Christians are victorious, they enter the Druse villages, putting to the sword men, women and children;—the Druses following their example when they are victorious. All the silk-worms of both parties, the sole support of the Syrian populations, have been burned. The convents of the Maronites and Catholics have been burned, and the bodies of their priests, after death, have been burned by the Druses. Every horror is practised on their enemies—for example, to kill by famine, massacre, and a thousand other acts of barbarism are momentarily committed. The Christians at the commencement were victorious over their enemies; but our Pasha, who is out with his regular troops, as soon as he preceives the Christians victorious, points his artillery against them, loaded with grape, and compels this unfortunate sect to take to flight. The Druses immediately enter their villages, sacking them, burning their houses, goods, &c.

"At this moment, with the help of our glasses, we see unfortunate fugitive Christians—women and children, to the number of 6000 or 7000 on the coast. Two ships of war, one French and one Austrian, and 5 or 6 small vessels, chartered by the mercantile body, have sailed, to collect and save them from the dreadful death which awaits them from famine.

VERY HORRIBLE.—A correspondent of the Cincinnati Herald relates the following occurrence. It is said to have occurred near Oakland Cottage, Mississippi: a slaveholder, a short time previous to his death, made provision for the liberation of his slaves. Those who were intrusted with the execution of his designs failing or refusing, to carry out his last will and testament concerning the slaves, the latter became restive, and impatient to enjoy their long looked-for boon. At length, disappointed, expecting to be sold, and incensed at their oppressors, they set fire to the overseer's dwelling and burnt it to the ground. A little child, which they were unable to rescue, was consumed in the flames. The slaves, eight or nine in number, were taken, and two of them hung up on the spot. The others were taken into an old log house, and chained to the floor. The house was then set on fire, and these poor victims, by a slow fire, burned to death in this most shocking manner, while the air was rent with their unavailing shrieks and screams."

NEW LONDON WHALE-FISHERY.—We were somewhat surprised, during our visit to New London, Ct., on learning the extent of its business in the whale fishery. No less than seventy vessels were employed in this business; most, or all of the ships ranging from three hundred to six hundred tons burthen, and some, we believe, measuring more than this. A ship is to sail in the course of the summer, which is capable of containing six or seven thousand barrels, and is said to be the largest whaleman that ever sailed out of the United States. About two millions of dollars are employed in the business, which is rapidly increasing. New London has one of the finest harbors in the world, and with the facilities which she enjoys for supplying herself with the necessary material for 'fitting out,' together with an abundance of wealth for prosecuting the business, there is, probably, no other place in this, or any other country that can rival her.

There is another fact connected with this business which we are happy to learn. The ships are mostly fitted out on the temperance principle; and what is still better, many of the captains, and large numbers of the crews, are pious men. They carry their Bibles with them, and in the midst of dangers that surrounded them, instead of drowning their fears in rum, as the fashion once was, they now have the consolations of religion to cheer and sustain them through their long and dangerous voyages. [Ch. Sec.

CINCINNATI.—The second child born in Cincinnati still lives, and has not seen the middle age of life, while Cincinnati contains 80,000 inhabitants! The Old Pioneer, says the same authority, who first settled where Cincinnati now stands, when Ohio was a wilderness, "walks among us hearty and strong, amid a throng of two millions of souls!" Adds the writer:

"And the first child born of American parents west of the Alleghany mountains, who knew Washington as a surveyor on the banks of the Kanawha, when the whole North-west, with immaterial exceptions, was in possession of the savage, is yet alive, and scarce numbers more than four score years and ten; yet in her day she witnessed the growth of an Empire—the peopling of the mighty valley between the base of the Blue Ridge and the Rocky Mountains!"

INCONGRUITIES OF WAR.—A gentleman who visited the British ship Medway says he was struck with the strange mixture of good and evil presented before him. Bibles and Prayer Books, Pilgrim's Progress, Baxter's Saint's Rest, and other religious works, were located amongst balls and bombshells, muskets, tomahawks and boarding-pikes. Warlike mottoes, such as 'Britons strike home!' confronted 'Always feel for the distresses of others,' painted on the beams. This putting the gospel into the heart through a bullet-hole by the force of powder is an odd proceeding.

A reward of one thousand dollars is offered for the recovery of the $5000 in gold stolen from on board the steamboat New Champion.

AN IMPORTANT LAW-SUIT.

Mr. Webster and Mr. Choate are engaged in an important law suit, about to be tried in Boston, which involves the question whether a transfer of property made by a Millerite during his hallucination, can be deemed legal. The case is as follows, and is very interesting, because there are similarly conditioned. A gentleman in one of the towns in Massachusetts, a manufacturer, engaged in a large and profitable business, became impressed with the conviction that the world was about to come to an end, according to the prediction of Miller. For a time he conducted his business as before, but soon began to see the folly and wickedness of bestowing his time and attention upon worldly affairs, when the end of all things was so near at hand. He wished to divest himself of his property, retaining only enough for his support till the coming of the great day. His family and friends prevented him from throwing away his estate, and at last out of deference, as he said, to their feelings, he disposed of it, much as he would have done by will, in case of his death. To his oldest son he conveyed all his property, binding him to pay to his other children their proportionate shares, and taking for himself one thousand dollars, to defray his expenses for the short time the world had then to endure. The gentleman commenced preaching until the doctrine of Miller exploded, and his zeal then abated and he found out his delusion. He tried in vain to get into business. Not being able to obtain money in this way, he has commenced a suit against his son for the recovery of the whole property. His plea is that at the time he made the sale, he was laboring under a delusion, and was therefore not in a sound state of mind. The case will excite a good deal of interest. Able counsel are employed on both sides.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE AND NARROW ESCAPES.—The Essex Co. Republican states that a very destructive fire occurred at West Moriah, near Lake Champlain, a few days since. It commenced in a bit of tuft, on the farm of Col. Barnes, and while the men were at dinner, spread through the grass to the woods, and swept over an immense tract with great rapidity. On the road from East to West Moriah it burned down two double saw-mills, a dwelling house, a barn, 17,000 pieces of lumber, and 3,000 logs belonging to Messrs. Barnes & Travis, whose loss is about $10,000; and in a few hours after had traveled eight miles and swept away the saw-mill, dwelling and barn, with 6,000 pieces of lumber and 200 logs of Hon. N. S. Storis, whose loss is $2,000. Thence it extended to the two Mills, dwelling and barn of John Ensign, whose loss is $2,000, and swept away five other mills in West Moriah and Scroon, of which the value is not ascertained. The entire loss is estimated at over $300,000. The swiftness with which the flames swept along [illegible] try, gave rise to some exciting scenes. The Republican says;—

"Ten or twelve men were intensely engaged at what is called 'Ensign's Upper Mill,' and in a few moments the fire had passed them, surrounding them on all sides, so that they could not leave, but being hemmed in, 'they fought like brave men long and well,' and though at times ready to sink from fatigue, the mill and lumber were finally saved. During the hottest of the fire, young Storrs and William Foster left for what is called 'Ensign's Lower Mill,' to cross the hills to the other mills belonging to Judge Storrs. They passed in safety, and with three other men, by dint of hard labor, saved the mills, being so providentially favored by a change of wind."

Leaves carried by the smoke and wind fell at Middlebury, Vt., about twenty miles distant. Near the fire the wind blew a hurricane, and the roaring of the fire is said to have been heard at a distance of several miles. The peculiar situation of the locality where the fire occurred, and the very fortunate change of the wind, saved many other valuable buildings from destruction.

Signs from the South.—A Cincinnati friend writes to us that a man has lately arrived in Cincinnati, bringing four slaves from Mississippi, whom he intends to set free, educate, and settle on a farm. He states that there is a strong and growing sentiment against slavery, in the portion of Mississippi where he resided, and he has no doubt that many of his neighbors will follow his example, by emancipating and educating their slaves. Our friend also mentions the recent arrival of thirty emancipated slaves from South Carolina.

Series of Casualities.—Mr. Samuel H. Rand, of Rye, is now 70 years of age, and somewhat corpulent. Two years since, he fell and broke one of his thighs, from which, after much pain and distress, he recovered. In February last, he fell again on the ice, and broke the other thigh. He had so far passed again through this severe visitation, as to permit him to venture abroad on crutches, when last week he fell again and broke his arm! Job's afflictions were of a different kind, but certainly could not have been more painful to the body.

The Burnt District.—The Pittsburg Chronicle states that about fifteen hundred buildings are in the course of erection in the "burnt district." The number already completed is supposed to be something over one hundred. By next autumn the greater portion of the "burnt district" will be rebuilt, and in most cases with good and substantial brick buildings.

Marshall Burnham, of Williamstown, Vt., has just been arrested, and is now in jail at Chelsea, under suspicion of being the murderer of Mr. Parker, who was murdered a short time since at Manchester, N. H. There are strong circumstantial evidences against Mr. B. We have not yet ascertained the particulars. [G. M. Freeman.

SUMMARY.

Gov. Hammond, of the independent nation of South Carolina, has recently written two long letters to Mr. Clarkson of England, defending American slavery. He endorses the sentiment expressed by Mr. McDuffie, (who preferred the prosperity of Manchester, England, to Boston.) He says—"I endorse, without reserve, the much abused sentiment of Gov. McDuffie, that slavery is the corner stone of our republican edifice; and I repudiate, as ridiculously absurd, the much-lauded but nowhere accredited dogma of Mr. Jefferson, that 'all' men are born free and equal."

James Slaight, an old citizen of Dayton, O., visited Harrison county, Ky. last May, to attend the trial of his son arraigned for man-slaughter. While there, he was indicted for tampering with one or two slaves, and informing them how to escape from bondage; and thrown into prison. The lawyers employed by him for himself and his son, taking advantage of his condition, exacted from him, by way of fees, notes to the amount of fifteen or seventeen hundred dollars! He is now lying in jail, awaiting his trial, and will probably be sentenced to the penitentiary. Whether he is guilty of the offence charged upon him, or whether the whole thing was a trick to deprive his son of the advantage of his testimony, is not known.

At Berne, N. Y. a few days since, a little girl twelve years old, daughter of John Banner, was hung to death by a school-house window falling on her neck. She had forgotten and left a new book in the school-house, and fearing that some of the children would get hold of and tear it, she returned, lifted a window, entered, got the book, and was making her egress by the same means, when the window fell upon her neck, and she perished. All school-house windows, to prevent the recurrence of such disasters, should move up and down with weights.

On Saturday evening, at Woonsocket Falls, R. I., in firing cannon, in commemoration of the release of Thomas W. Dorr, by mismanagement in loading, a discharge took place before the ramrod was withdrawn, by which two men were seriously injured—one of them, a young man by the name of Briggs, died on Sunday morning.

The deaths week before last in New York were 202, which for midsummer, is not considered very fatal. Of small pox there were 19 deaths; consumption, 26; dropsy, 11; convulsions, 11; but the largest number consisted of children under two years of age, of whom 93 had died during the week.

We notice that in Nantucket they make known the publishments through the newspapers. A very good idea. It saves the ladies much time formerly spent in gossiping the news about. Now, every body knows "who's going to be married." Newspapers are the proper vehicles of information.

EXTRACT FROM COWPER.

The admirers of Cowper will probably feel, on reading the following lines, that Anti-slavery was not a new invention.

My God! what wish can prosper, or what prayer,
For those who deal in cargoes of despair,
Who drive a loathsome traffic, gauge and span,
And buy the muscles and the bones of man?

The tender ties of husband, father, friend,
All bonds of nature in that moment end;
And each endures, while yet he draws his breath,
A stroke as fatal as the scythe of death.

The sable warrior, frantic with regret
Of her he loved and never can forget,
Loses in sight the far receding shore,
But not the thought that they shall meet no more.

He, to dull sadness sullenly resigned,
Now feels his body's bondage in the mind.
Puts off his generous nature to suit
His manners with his fate, puts on the brute.

They found them slaves—but who that title gave?
THE GOD OF NATURE NEVER FORMED A SLAVE!
Though fraud and force acquire a master's name,
Nature and justice must remain the same.

Nature imprints upon whate'er we see,
That has a heart and life in it, BE FREE!
The beasts are chartered, neither age nor force
Can quell the love of freedom in a horse.

Canst thou, then, honored with a Christian name,
Buy what is WOMAN-BORN, and feel no shame?
Wade in the blood of innocence, and plead
EXPEDIENCY as a warrant for the deed?

So may the wolf, that famine has made bold
To quit the forest and invade the fold:
So may the ruffian, who, with ghostly glide,
Dagger in hand, steals close to the bedside.

Not he, but his emergence forced the door,
He found it inconvenient to be poor.
Has God then given its sweetness to the cane,
Unless his laws be trampled on—in vain?

FORMATION OF CHARACTER.

To the acquisition of extensive knowledge, incessant application and industry are necessary. Nothing great or good has been achieved without them. Be willing then to labor—be not satisfied with superficial attainments, but accustom yourselves to habits of accurate and thorough investigation. Explore the foundations and first principles of every science. It is observed by Locke, that "there are fundamental truths that lie at the bottom—the basis upon which a great many others rest—and in which they have their consistency; there are teeming truths rich in stores, with which they furnish the mind; and like the lights of heaven, are not only beautiful and interesting in themselves, but give light and evidence to other things, that, without them, could not be seen or known." These are the truths with which we should endeavor to enrich our minds with the writings of the great master spirits of the world, who will enrich your minds with profound, enlarged and exalted views; and who, while they form you to habits of just and noble thinking, will also teach you to cherish pure and generous feelings. If you would make these thorough acquisitions, you must guard against the immoderate indulgence of your passions, and the seductions of evil companions. A life of dissipation and pleasure is death to superior excellence. A body invigorated by habits of temperance and self-denial, and a mind undisturbed by unholy passions, serene and cheerful in conscious rectitude, are most powerful auxiliaries in the pursuit of science.

It is equally important for you to guard against self-sufficiency and vanity. This temper is an effectual barrier to high intellectual improvements. Frequently reflect upon the small extent and imperfection of your attainments—on the vast regions of science that are yet unexplored by you—on the hidden stores of learning which are contained in the ten thousand books that you have never read or seen, or of which, perhaps, you have not even heard. Remember, too, the lofty attainments that have been made by some profound scholars both of ancient and modern days. I would recommend you to read, in early life, a few well selected biographies of men who were distinguished for their general knowledge. Read the lives of Demosthenes, of Erasmus, of Newton, of Locke, of Hale, of Haller, of Doddridge, of Johnson, and of such accomplished and illustrious scholars. Observe the ardent attachment and intense industry with which they cultivated science, and the astonishing acquirements which they made,—their high valuation of time and careful improvement of it—compare your attainments and habits with theirs—not to repose in sluggish despondency, but to rouse yourself from apathy and sloth to a noble emulation of rising to an eqality with them.

It was by no secret magic that these mighty scholars attained to distinction and fame—it was by patient, persevering, untiring industry. If the eloquence of Demosthenes shook, with its thunder, the throne of a Philip, and ruled the fierce democracy of Athens, and if the vehement denunciations and powerful appeals of Cicero drove Cataline from the senate house, and made Cæsar tremble, it was by the private studies and profound meditations of the closet, their minds having been invigorated and expanded, and enriched, and ennobled with diversified knowledge, lofty sentiment and generous feeling. If Newton, with a flight adventurous as the eagle's, soaring to the very boundaries of creation—if he explained the laws that govern the universe, and let in a new flood of light upon the world—it was ardent attachment to science; it was, intense, patient, untiring industry, that gave to the pinions of his mind that vigor which elevated and sustained him at so lofty a height. If Locke and Reed have dispelled the darkness that has for ages settled on the human intellect, and have freed the sciences of the mind from the intricacies and subtleties of the schools, it was not merely by the force of their own genius, but by deep, patient and repeated meditation and study. If Burke charmed listening senates by the masculine strength and brilliancy of his thoughts; if Mansfield and our own Hamilton illumined the age by the splendor of their learning and eloquence; if Hall and Chalmers proclaimed from the pulpit immortal strains, it was not only because they ranked among the first scholars, but also among the most laborious men of their age. Contemplate the character of these illustrious men, imitate their industry, their eager love of learning, and the zeal with which they pursued it, and you may equal them.

THE RESURRECTION.

The following beautiful and striking thoughts are from the pen of the late Dr. Mason:—

Whatever have been the disputes about other doctrines of Christianity, no man can deny that it teaches the resurrection of the body. The very gates of hell, in the shape of that unhallowed philosophy, which fritters away its most precious truths into Eastern metaphors and Jewish allegories, have not ventured to tamper with the faith of the resurrection. This stands confessed a Christian peculiarity.

This clay which we commit to the grave, under that universal sentence, Dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return, will be quickened again, and resume, even after the slumber of ages, the organization, the lineaments, the expression of that self-same being with whom we were conversant upon earth; otherwise it were a new creation, and not a resurrection; and will be reanimated by that self-same spirit which forsook it at death; otherwise it were a different being altogether, and not the one with whom, under the form, we held sweet communion in this life, and walked to the house of God in company.

The body will be raised under circumstances and with properties suited to the new state of being and action on which the saints shall enter. God shall bring them with the Lord Christ. They shall be found in Christ's train. They shall be adorned with Christ's likeness. "Beloved, it does not yet appear what we shall be, but we know that when He shall appear we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is." The change requisite for this exaltation shall pass upon their body without destroying its sameness; as flesh and blood, it cannot inherit the kingdom of God. "It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption; it is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory, it is sown in weakness, it is raised in power: it is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body;" fit for the occupations and enjoyments of the heavenly world.

But how are these transformations to be effected? How? By that same power which calleth things that be not, as though they were. God shall bring his risen ones with Jesus Christ. This is our answer to all objections of unbelief. We are upon too high ground to stoop to the cavalier who marshals his ignorance and imbecility against the knowledge and might of God. Let him puzzle himself with his theories about personal identity; let him talk about one part of the body interred in Asia, another in Africa, and a third in Europe, let him ask as many questions as he can devise about limbs devoured by ravenous animals, and become by nutrition, part of their bodies; which bodies again have passed, by the same process, into the flesh of other animals; and these, in their turn, consumed by man, and incorporated with the substance of a new human body; let him ask such questions, and ten thousand like them. Has he done? "Dost thou not therefore err, not knowing the scriptures, nor the power of God?" It will be time enough to plead thy difficulties when God shall commit to thee the raising of the dead. For as it is, it is sufficient that he who rears up the living blade from the rotten grain will be at no loss to rear up an incorruptible from a corrupted body, through what forms and varieties soever it may have passed.

The main question, however, is not what Omnipotence can, but what it will perform. That God should raise the dead, if it so please him, will not appear incredible to any sober man. But what proof have we that our faith on this head is not fancy, and that our hope shall not perish? The best of all possible proof. We have, in the first place, the divine promise. God has engaged to raise his people up by Jesus, and to present them together with him. Jesus himself has said, "I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth on me, tho' he were dead, yet shall he live: and he that liveth and believeth on me, shall never die." A thousand scientific demonstrations are not equivalent, as the ground of our confidence, to one word of him who cannot lie. And so shall we find it in our last extremity.

FEMALE PIETY.

The gem of all others which enriches the coronet of a ladies' character is unaffected piety. Nature may lavish much on her person—the enchantment of her countenance—the grace of her mein, or the strength of her intellect, yet her loveliness is uncrowned, till piety throws around the whole, the sweetness and power of her charms. She then becomes unearthly in desires and associations. The spell which bound her affections to the things below is broken, and she mounts on the silent wings of her fancy and hope to the habitation of God, where it is her delight to hold communication with the spirits that have been ransomed from the thraldom of earth and wreathed with a garland of glory.

Her beauty may throw a magical charm over many; princes and conquerors may bow with admiration at the shrine of her love, the sons of science and poetry may embalm her memory in history and song—yet her piety must be her ornament; her pearl. Her name must be written in the "book of life," that when the mountains fade away, and every memento of earthly greatness is lost in the general wreck of nature, it may remain and swell the list of that mighty throng, which have been clothed with the mantle of righteousness, and their voice attuned to the melody of heaven.

With such a treasure every lofty gratification on earth may be purchased; friendship will be doubly sweet, pain and sorrow shall lose their sting, and the character will possess a price far "above riches," life will be but a pleasant visit to earth, and death the entrance upon a joyful and perpetual home. And when the notes of the last trumpet shall be heard, and sleeping millions awake to judgment, its possessor shall be presented "faultless before the throne of God, with exceeding joy, and a crown of glory that shall never wear away."

Such is piety. Like a tender flower, planted in the fertile soil of woman's heart, it grows, expanding its foliage and imparting its fragrance to all around, till transplanted it is set to bloom in perpetual vigor and unfading beauty in the paradise of God.

Follow this star, it will light you through every labyrinth in the wilderness of life—gild the gloom which will gather around you in a dying hour, and bring you safely over the tempestuous Jordan of death, into the heaven of promised and settled rest.

Selected.

NIGHT.

BY H. C. HENRY.

Let the Gheber kneel, in the deep idolatry of his heart, and pour out his prayers to the sun; aye, let him term it his God—his life—his all—while kindles his eye with rapture as it drinks in its glorious beams,—but for myself, I must confess, that night, calm, silent night, with its radiant sabbaoth glowing burningly above me, has a charm, a silent, yet holy eloquence, which we find not, we feel not, in the bustle and glare of the day. I love the golden sun-light; it thrills my very soul with joy, and I have gazed upon the splendors it creates, hour after hour, forgetful of myself, almost lost in admiration.

I have seen this king, this god of day, when he came forth from the portals of the east, flinging abroad his golden rays, first on the over-arching sky, then on the earth; and the hill-tops caught his glance, and smiled, and almost seemed to glow with life as well as beauty; and soon the glad rays came down upon the valley, and the streamlets ran, and leaped, and sparkled, as if rejoicing in his gorgeous beams; and the mists began to rise from the margin of river, brook, and sheeted lake, and climb up to mantle the brow of hill and mount, or float away, in purple glory, to the unseen gates of paradise; and as I watched them steadily, intently, until the curtain of distance hid them from my view, I have felt something within me, as it were, struggling like them to flee away from the shadows and storms of earth, to a brighter and happier home.

I have seen the beauties of a summer's sunset, and have felt that they were ravishing. My eye would never weary of drinking in the glories which such a scene presents. To see clouds, deep, massy, gorgeous, piled upon each other in beautiful magnificence, seeming the "pillared props of heaven," the thousand colors of the sunbeam painted upon their fleecy folds; to see them rolling away, slowly and heavily, as if the shoulder of some unseen giant were applied to the whole mass, and, as they roll, continually changing their appearance—now white as the plume of the plover, just wetted in the salt sea foam, now dark and threatening, as if pregnant with wrath to man, and again glowing in all the colors of the radiant bow, limned on the retreating cloud—and thus to see them pass, till all have gone, except, perchance, a lingerer here and there, that seems loth to go from the cheering ray of the sun, while yet a single ray is left to gild and beautify earth, ocean, or sky—to gaze upon such a scene, I say, is indeed delightful, and will and must draw forth the admiration, if not the adoration, of every intelligent existence.—Here is an exhaustless field for admiration, something that will never tire—always beautiful, always new.

"Parting day
Dies like the dolphin, whom each pang imbues
With a new color, till it graps away,
The last still loveliest."

But I digress. After all my admiration of the thousand scenes of beauty that day presents, still can I turn with the sincerity of early love, and in the fullness of my heart exclaim, with one of our own sweet poets,

"Most beautiful, ecstatic, holy night!
How I do love thee!"

A veil seems drawn over the cares and sorrows of earth for a brief period, and, as the last dim light of day is fading from our view, and the shadows of night are deepening around us, we are reminded that even thus is passing the brief day of life—thus, soon will the shadows of the tomb shut from our vision the blessed light of the rejoicing sun.

Whispers, as of unseen spirits, are ever floating around us, at this calm and holy hour—and is it not soothing to think, that, perchance, the spirits of departed friends—those dear ones to whom our hearts so fondly clung—are hovering around us, like guardian angels, to shield us from danger, to whisper to us of their radiant home, and raise our aspirations to the God of all! We seem enveloped by an atmosphere of holiness—the very air is redolent with music, falling upon the spirit like a spell, and we seem, as it were, raised nearer heaven, and more lost to earth, than we can feel in the hurry and bustle of the day. We look up to the illimitable sky, studded with innumerable stars, and we feel our spirits yearning, aye, panting within us, to hold communion with those worlds of light. In every gentle spirit lives a tone that echoes back the sweet and simple language of the poet:

"If those bright orbs that gem the night
Be each a blissful dwelling sphere,
Where kindred spirits reunite,
Whom fate hath torn asunder here—
How sweet it were at once to die,
And leave this dreary world afar,
Meet soul and soul, and cleave the sky,
And soar away from star to star."

Let us not, who enjoy the clear light of revelation, judge those with too much severity, who, in olden time, bowed down in worship to the stars of heaven. Theirs was an idolatry that degraded not. And did not the quiet heaven, with its myriad eyes, look down approvingly on worship and on worshipers? O, heard they not a voice in every star, that spoke to them of Deity? Theirs was a worship that chastened, and purified, and exalted the soul; and though they erred, who shall say that they erred fatally? Not we, who kneel on velvet cushions in the magnificent temples which our pride, and not our love to God, has piled; uttering the prayer which our hearts feel not, pouring forth burning words with our lips, while our spirits are lifeless within us. Their temple was the earth, curtained by sky and cloud; their altars were the flinty rock, cushioned alone by moss; their songs were echoed by mountain and hill, and the voice of many waters gave the solemn response. They worshiped in spirit and in truth, ignorantly, it is true, but not the less fervently. And who, I had almost asked, who can refrain from worshiping this burning record of the Universal Mind, this "Beautiful image of the unseen God!"

Can a being, fashioned by an almighty hand, endowed with deathless energies, go forth alone at the still, calm, holy hour of midnight, and gaze on the mysterious beauty, the silent magnificence, of the starry worlds, nor feel a thrill, a struggle within him, as if his soul had caught a glance of the high land of its birth, and was panting to go home to the bosom of its Father and its God. Who can feel, as his eye is lifted, and the starlight rests on the uncovered brow, that he is to sink, in a little while, into a sleep that shall never know of waking? Surely, something must whisper to the soul of an immortality—an immortality the very consciousness of which lifts the proud spirit above its clog of clay, and places man upon a glorious height, an elevation which is, in truth, but a little lower than the angels.

Those blessed stars, those radiant characters of light, have been beautifully termed, by a popular author, "the poetry of heaven." Yes, they are indeed poetry, written by the finger of Jehovah upon the eternal sky, and he who cons it well may learn full many a high and holy lesson. He will feel the rust that hath gathered around his spirit from the chilling mists of earth, wearing away, and his soul resuming more and more of its original brightness, and thus preparing to join, ere long, the chorus of those 'eternal harmonies above,' those never-fading stars, which are

"For ever singing, as they shine,
The hand that made us is divine."

KINDNESS TO AGED WOMEN.

Reader, ask thyself if thou hast not sinned against the aged. If the aged one is not your mother, another one perhaps is. As you would have your mother treated, treat the aged around you. Pride may make temptations for you, but to obey the dictates of kindness toward the aged, especially to your own parents, will satisfy your conscience, and entitle you to respect.

If she is a mother, one of those fond mothers who expect that mere indulgence is to win the lasting regard of their children, what sad thoughts must crowd upon her at every fresh instance of unkindness, and every additional proof that she has fallen away from what she was, both in her own and other's estimation.

Over the brow that frowns upon her, she has, perhaps, watched with unutterable tenderness through the long night, when every eye but hers was sleeping. The lips that now speak to her coldly, or answer her with silence when she speaks, she has bathed with the welcome draught when they were parched and burning with contagious fever. The scorn with which her humble pretensions are looked down upon, rises in the hearts of those for whose higher intellectual attainments she has made every sacrifice and exerted every faculty. And what if she be unlearned in the literature of modern times, she understands deeply and feelingly the springs of affection, and tenderness and sorrow. She knows from what source flow the bitterest tears—a thankless child.

She sees the young creatures of another generation sporting around her, and her thoughts go back to the playmates of her childhood, some reduced to the lowest state of helplessness or suffering, some dead, and some forgotten. She hears the reluctant answer when she asks a kindness of one of the merry group, and she thinks of the time when kindness was more freely granted her though far less needed than now. She starts at the loud laugh, but cannot understand the jest, and no one explains it to her listening ear. She loses the thread of earnest conversation, and no one restores the clue. She sits within the social circle, but forms no link in the chain of social union. Her thoughts and feelings cannot harmonize with those of her juvenile companions, and she feels, in all its bitterness, that least tolerable portion of human experience, what it is to be desolate in the midst of society—surrounded by kindred and friends, and yet alone.

Let the aged woman no longer be an object of contempt. She is helpless as a child, and as a child she may be learning the last awful lesson of her heavenly Father. Her feeble step is trembling on the brink of the grave, but her hope may be planted on the better shore which lies beyond. Her eye is dim with suffering and tears, but her spiritual vision may be contemplating the gradual unfolding of the gates of eternal rest. Beauty has faded from her form, but angels in the world of light may be weaving a wreath of glory for her brow. Her lip is silent, but it may be waiting only to pour forth celestial strains of gratitude and praise. Lowly, and fallen, and sad, she sits among the living, but exalted, purified, and happy, she may arise from the dead.

Then turn, if thou wilt, from the aged woman in her loneliness, but remember she is not forsaken of her God.

KINDNESS.

Kindness will always do good. It makes others happy—and that is doing good. It prompts us to seek to benefit others—and that is doing good. It makes others gentle, and benignant—and that is doing good.

Let it be remembered, also, that it is by the temper, and by the spirit that we manifest, that the world forms its opinion of the nature of religion. It is not by great deeds in trying circumstances that men will judge of the nature of the gospel. The world at large cares little how Ignatius and Polycarp felt, or how they died. Perhaps the mass of those around you never heard their names. They are little impressed by the virtues which Latimer, and Ridley, and Crammer evinced when at the stake. But that unbelieving husband cares much for the gentle and kind spirit of his wife—for all his happiness depends on it; that brother is interested much in the conversation and the spirit of his sister—for he daily observes her temper, and is forming his views of religion from what he sees in her; that child is constantly marking the temper of his father and the mother, and is forming views of religion not so much from what he hears in the pulpit, or in the Sabbath school, as from the temper which you evince from one day to another. In these fields—humble though they may seem, and little as they appear to furnish a theatre for the display of eminent virtues—your usefulness lies. There, with the "gentleness" that was in Christ, you cannot but be useful; and exhibiting such a spirit you will not live in vain.

THE BIRDS.

The New Haven Courier relates the following interesting incident, which occurred a few years since in one of the villages of Connecticut:—

A young lady, confined to the house by protracted indisposition, was in the habit of feeding a sparrow, which had a nest on a tree near the door, with crumbs of bread. The little creature had a warm heart under her homely dress, and soon learned to love her patron, became exceedingly tame, and would hop about the table while the family were at their meals. This was repeated whenever the door was open, till, at last, her mate was induced to accompany her, and both would pick up the scraps which their fair entertainer, as she lay upon a sofa, scattered near her upon the carpet. In the fall, one of them flew against the window, and tried to get in, but the lady was too feeble to expose herself to the air, and so could not admit her visitor to a farewell interview. Next spring, they both came again, as docile as ever. In the course of a few weeks, as the lady lay upon the sofa, on a Sunday morning, being too unwell to go to Church, the house perfectly still, and the door open, she heard a great twittering and chirping on the steps, Looking about for the cause, she espied her tame sparrow entering the apartment, followed by several of her progeny, and the partner of her toils bringing up the rear. They all remained with her for half an hour, perfectly fearless and at home, till having satisfied their appetites with the morsels which were strewn for them, and expressed their obligations with sweet, wild music, they retired to the shrubbery."

ESCAPE FROM SLAVERY.—A few months ago, while there was an abolition meeting at Worcester, a fugitive slave arrived in that town. It was soon ascertained that the slave's master was in town, and had engaged officers to arrest him. He was then taken privately to the house of a friend, placed in a hogshead in the cellar, and covered with charcoal. The officers came to search the house, which they did thoroughly, beating the charcoal hogshead among other things, but made no discovery. The slave was then taken out almost suffocated—dressed in female apparel, with a thick veil, and taking the arm of his friend, was walking toward the railroad depot, when they were by one of the officers, who made many inquiries, but no discovery. One of the railroad conductors being an abolitionist, was informed who the lady was that wanted a passage to Pittsfield. He found a secure and comfortable place in a baggage car, in which the slave safely arrived in Pittsfield was committed to the care of another "friend of the slave," about the dusk of the evening. Another friend then joined them, and they set off in an open wagon for Williamstown, in a dark and rainy night. Arriving there about two o'clock on Monday morning, they knocked at the door of a gentleman, and when he appeared, they inquired: "Are you an abolitionist?" "Yes, I profess to be." "Here is a poor slave, whom his master is in hot pursuit of—will you let us warm ourselves, and give us something to eat?" "Come in, and welcome," was the answer. A good breakfast was quickly provided—and after their clothes were dried and their hunger satisfied, they started again, and were in Vermont on their way to Canada, before daylight.—Bost. Recorder.

Another Great Haul of Fish.—At New Haven, yesterday morning, from 1,000,000 to 1,500,000 white fish, as nearly as could be estimated, were hauled ashore by Mr. Davidson & Russell's seine, on the West side of the harbor. These fish weigh about three quarters of a pound each, and are used for manure by the farmers of the adjacent towns, who pay from 50 to 75 cents a thousand. The haul of yesterday morning was worth from $500 to $750. The weight of the fish was from 375 to 500 tons: sufficient to freight a large ship. Of course they could not be drawn out en masse, but being hauled in at high tide, and the net made fast to a windlass, the receding tide left them high and dry. Seen at a distance, thus exposed on the shore, they looked like a snow bank, or an extensive deposit of salt.

LINES,

Addressed to Mrs. Emma A. Langworthy, of Genesee.

Suggested on viewing a Daguereotype Portrait of her deceased husband, ASA A. LANGWORTHY, taken after death by Rev. J. L. Scott, in which truly the deceased appears as though he had lain down to "pleasent dreams." The drapery that the artist has thrown around him is of a beautiful silvery hue. We confidently believe, that he is now wearing in his Heavenly Father's palace, immortal robes of unchanging beauty.

He is gone, he is gone, to the joyous land
Of hallowed harp and song;
Look up, look up, and see him stand
Among life's glittering throng.

His brow supports a glorious crown,
Inset with gems that far outshine
Th' most gorgeous one that e'er was found
In India's radiant mine.

His robes, his robes, how white they are,
Hung o'er with wreaths of living light;
More brilliant far than any star
That dazzles on the robe of night.

Lo he tunes an angel's lyre,
Of most exquisite mould,
Wrought by the hand of his heavenly Sire,
From brightly-burnished gold.

Look up, look up, let sorrow's pearls
No more thy cheek bedew;
Though happy in that beauteous world,
He still has thoughts of you;

And oft those radiant groups he leaves—
The thought hath soothing power—
And round thee the air of heaven breathes
At twilight's holy hour.

Then upward look—let sorrow's mists
From off thy mind be driven;
He is hymning now the peans of bliss
In his shining home in heaven.

'Twas a beautiful seraph that came down
And sever'd his bands by right,
And placed on his brow that glorious crown,
And round him threw those robes of light:

More beautiful far than the doubting say,
For he came on a blessed mission,
And bore him up to the courts of day,
Where the Lord of life is risen;

Where immortal lyrists touch their strings,
And lift life's sweetest lays;
Where angels clap their silvery wings,
And hymn their anthems of praise.

Then, Emma, check the silent tear,
Bid faith its pinions wide unfurl,
That beautiful seraph may soon appear
To bear thee too to the angel world.

Let every sorrowing thought be still'd,
Let peace, instead of grief, have place;
It was thy Heavenly Father's will
That Albert celestial joys should taste.

And when thou too hast passed time's sands,
And from earth's scenes hast gone,
May you with him clasp joyous hands,
In that fair land of love and song.

Bolivar, N. Y., 1845. SYMPATHY.

MISSIONARY REPORT.

The following report was sent us by one of the Secretaries of the Central Association, with a notice that its publication was requested by a vote of the Association. The Report shows well to what expedients men will resort to sustain error.

To the Executive Board of the Central Association:

DEAR BRETHREN:—In compliance with my appointment, I left home for Richland, January 23. When I arrived there, I learned that Rev. Mr. Hapgood, of the Methodist Church, and Principal of Mexicoville Academy, was about to make his second reply to the lectures delivered there on the subject of the Sabbath. Accompanied by several brethren I attended his lecture. When it was ascertained that I was present, there was an effort made to induce Mr. Hapgood to defer his lecture. When this effort failed, he was informed that the house would be open for a reply. But to prevent a reply, an appointment was made for Methodist preaching in the evening; but was not announced to the congregation until I was requested to occupy the evening in reply. Mr. H. spoke about two hours and a half. The principal drift of his discourse was, in the first place, to establish the fact that in all ages of the church the first day had been observed. For this purpose numerous quotations were made from Moshiem, Eusebius, Justin Martyr, Pliny, Irenæus, and others, the purport of which was, that meetings were held on the first day to celebrate the resurrection, and that the first day was observed as a festival. His second labor was, by Greek and Hebrew criticisms, to sustain the present translation of μια των σαββατων. In these criticisms, he stated that there was no Greek word that meant first, and then read from a Hebrew grammar to prove it. In this and other criticisms he seemed not to care so much for truth as for his argument. He also quoted the proof texts usually brought to sustain Sunday-keeping. He closed his remarks with saying, that he knew that the first day was the true Sabbath.

At the close of his lecture I was requested to speak on the same subject in reply. In three quarters of an hour I commenced a review of Mr. M.'s lecture, and showed from the histories quoted by him, that the first day was observed, not as a Sabbath, but as a festival; and from other histories, that the Sabbath had been observed nearly all the time since the commencement of the Christian era. After I had spoken three quarters of an hour, Mr. H. came in, and commenced interrupting. I requested and urged, as far as decency would permit, that he should wait until I closed, and then he might reply. Several of the congregation united in the request that he would desist. But he continued about one hour and occupied one third of it in interruptions. He then requested leave to speak ten minutes. I declined, but offered to meet him in Mexicoville or any other place and discuss the question as long as he pleased. He did not accept the offer, and left for home. I continued about an hour longer to expose the fallacy of his arguments, and dismissed the congregation.

Mr. Hapgood had before been notified by Eld. E. S. B., that if he replied he would be present if he could be informed. To prevent his attendance and a response, the notice of his lecture was not given out until about four or five days beforehand. There was also a manifest effort to prevent attendance to my reply. I however had a good congregation that seemed interested. All the efforts that have been made to quell the excitement have been unavailing, and there are those that are investigating the question.

I received a line from a Mr. Wade, in which he stated that God had promised to change the ten commandments, and desired to know when they were changed, or, if they had not been, when they would be; to which I made reply, that I was not aware that God had made such a promise, and that the ten commandments had not been and never would be changed.

A very worthy member of the Baptist congregation at Mexicoville requested me to lecture on the subject of the Sabbath there. Being anxious to meet Mr. Hapgood in his own village, I consented if he would provide a house. He made application to the Baptist Church for the use of their house and was denied by a decision of the Church. It was supposed the Methodist house could not be obtained, and it was finally determined to wait until summer and occupy a grove if a house could not be obtained.

To aid in quelling the excitement, Eld, Morgan of Adams, was obtained to lecture at Holmesville. It was understood that he would take the ordinary Sabbath ground. The day of his appointment was so stormy that the lecture was deferred for one week. Before that time I returned home, feeling confident that Eld. Burdick was fully qualified to meet and answer him. Twenty adults in all, had embraced the Sabbath in that neighborhood from the beginning of the discussion up to the time I left.

Respectfully yours, JAMES BAILEY.

THE TOMB OF WHITEFIELD.

[The following is from an account of the editor of the Congregational Journal, who recently visited Newburyport:—

Following the leading of the obliging sexton, we left by a door opening into the entry of a chapel joined to the rear of the church, in which the weekly meetings of the society are held. In this entry a little trap door is constructed just in the rear of the pulpit, which flew up to the touch of the sexton. It was past sunset: and even at midday a light would be needed in visiting the tomb below. The sexton touching his lamp with a lucifer, descended on a frail and tottering ladder, and bid us follow. The space between the ground and the floor is so narrow, that one is obliged to stoop or crawl to make his way. A contracted door was opened through what seemed to be the foundation stones of the church into the adjoining tomb; the sexton again went before; he lifted up the coffin lid, and by the light of his feeble lamp we saw before us all that remains of George Whitefield. Three tenants only occupy this dark and narrow dwelling; Prince, the blind man, Whitefield, whose coffin rests on that of Prince, and Parsons, the pastor of the church, at whose house and in whose arms Whitefield expired. The coffin of each had been once renewed, but the remains had been preserved with sacred care. The flesh of Whitefield had turned to a black mould, and fallen to the bottom of the coffin; but the bones remained entire and in the natural position. There are the ribs, beneath which beat so big and generous a heart, filled with the love of God and man; the arms so often raised and swung in the vehemence of argument and persuasion; the skull once containing so noble an intellect, as perfect as though death had been but yesterday; the jaws, the teeth, the frame of the nose, all were there and entire; but the eye that flashed the fire, was quenched; the lips on which hung congregations of twenty or thirty thousands, were silent; and the soul which had animated and directed this form in deeds of glorious accomplishment, had returned to God who gave it.

THE FACE AND THE HEART.—Smiles may play on the countenance, while Hope and Joy lie mouldering in the heart beneath, like the moonbeams shining over a grave. When the mind is in a certain stage of progression, it turns for enjoyment, in a great degree, to the past, as presenting what is most fixed, or exempt from fluctuation. In its ultimate or mature state, however, it builds its chief pleasures on what is to come. Its ordinary aspirations, or those relating to selfish inferior objects, are dispelled; but nobler anticipations replenish the vacancy. Yet in the interval that passes before this re-occupation of the fancy with brighter images and prospects, the intellectual resources sometimes threaten to fail, and melancholy spreads her wings over the soul.

STRIKING HISTORICAL FACT.

The destruction of the French armament under the Duke D'Anville, in the year 1746, should be remembered with gratitude and admiration by every inhabitant of America. This fleet, consisting of forty ships of war, was destined for the destruction of New England. It sailed from Chebucto, in Nova Scotia, for this purpose. In the mean time, the pious people appraised of their danger, had appointed a season of fasting and prayer, to be observed in all their churches. While Mr. Prince was officiating in Old South Church, Boston, on this fast day, and praying most fervently that the dreaded calamity might be averted, a sudden gust of wind arose (the day till then had been perfectly clear and calm) so violent as to cause a loud clattering of the windows. The minister paused in his prayer, and looking around upon the congregation with a countenance of hope, he again commenced, and with great devotional ardor, supplicated the Almighty to cause that wind to frustrate the object of their enemies. A tempest ensued, in which the greater part of the French fleet was wrecked. The Duke D'Anville, the principal General, and the second in command, both committed suicide. Many died with disease, and thousands were consigned to a watery grave. The small number who remained alive returned to France without health and without spirits; and the enterprise was abandoned and never again resumed.

With reference to this and other instances, the late President Dwight remarks, in a discourse on answers to prayer: "I am bound, as an inhabitant of New England, to declare that, were there no other instances to be found in any other country, the blessings communicated to this world would furnish ample satisfaction concerning this subject to every sober, much more to every pious man."

CONFESSIONS OF A NOVEL READER.

——"Productive was the world
In many things, but most in books, like swarms
Of locusts, which God sent to vex the world
Rebellious long, admonished long in vain."

POLLOK.

A trite subject this; so I am afraid some will say when they notice the caption, and see that it relates to novel reading. But no truth, however trite, is too threadbare to be illustrated and enforced, which is not universally perceived, or if perceived, is not reduced to practice. Our novels really seem to grow worse and worse. One is sometimes almost tempted to employ the reasoning in respect to these moral plagues, which the wounded fox in one of Æsop's fables makes use of to the swallow, when she offered to drive away a swarm of flies that were surfeiting themselves with his blood.

So that, if novel reading is in the present. The better age, it is certain it is in the present. The better part of professing Christians, and many virtuous people who make no such professions, look with increasing alarm upon the rising popularity among all ranks and conditions, of works of fiction calculated to injure the mind not only, but to corrupt and poison the heart. If this fondness for an impure light literature were confined to unprincipled men of the world, we might be silent comparatively, how much soever we should deplore the taste and fear the consequences. But it is not thus confined. Hundreds and thousands of men and women, upon whose reputation for virtue there lies not a stain, and many who wear the badge of Jesus of Nazareth, seek for these vicious publications, read them with greediness, and allow their families to do the same.

The prevalence of this taste, in high places as well as in low places, is notorious. And the least that the child of God can do, who has the interests of religion and virtue at heart, is deeply to deplore it, and fervently to pray that a purer literature may take its place.

But, dear reader, I am not about to inflict upon you, as you doubtless have feared, a dry, abstract, philosophical dissertation upon the evil influence of novel reading. I intend in this article to take a very different course. I have theories enough on the subject; but I shall not trouble you with them, except as they are connected with, generally deductions from, authentic facts. Theories are good things in their place; but I know they are weak and inefficient without facts. Indeed they are not worth a straw if they are not built upon facts. So that when a man begins to theorise with me, I usually cut him short by telling him if he will let me hear his facts, I will form my own theories.

My design in occupying a few moments of the reader's time is not to dogmatise or theorise. It is not so much to tell what the fashionable, popular novels of the day are adapted to do, as what they have done and are doing.

I beg leave to state to you my own case. "And so you have been a novel-reader, too?" Ay, that I have; a most devoted, constant, obstinate novel reader. "But is it consistent for you, then, to attempt to remove literary motes from the eyes of your erring brethren?" I see not why, provided I have taken out the beam from my own eye. "But can the correctness of such a person's views upon this point be credited? Will there not be more or less probability of the influence of prejudice about them?" Possibly there may; I do not claim to be destitute entirely of prejudice. But why should a man who thinks he has experimental evidence of the vicious effects of this species of literature, and consequently is opposed to the whole slaterhood—why should such a man be suspected of a prejudice unfriendly to truth, while another man, who happens to be favorably disposed, and who has no such experience, is allowed, in this particular, to be immaculate?

If a soldier has been in actual service, if he has heard the whistling of the balls about his ears, if he has had an arm shot off, or a leg, must he be set down as a prejudiced witness in a case respecting the effects of gunpowder? If a lady has been bitten by a venomous serpent, and as she writhes with the pain, attempts to give her opinion about the fraternity of snakes, do you stop her, on the ground that she is laboring under a strong prejudice, which must essentially warp her judgment? And must the poor wretch who has taken arsenic or nux vomica, say nothing about the effect of such agents on the system, because of a necessary bias unfriendly to truth? Away with such nonsense!

I regard the habitual novel reader as a person who has taken poison. More or less of it may have been incorporated with the moral constitution, according to the virulence of the poison, and his power of resisting its influence. But he is a poisoned man; and if his veracity and judgment are to be impeached in the case, I would like to know whose are to be received. The poor drunkard also has spent the best portion of his life as a slave to a habit which ruins the body and the soul,—he is, the best witness we can have in the matter of the evils of intemperance. And I hope my readers will give a man equal credit for candor, when he proposes to show the effects of a habit often more fatal, upon his own mind and heart.

I proceed, then, if the coast is clear, something after the manner of the Washingtonians, to "tell my experience:"

I think I could not have been more than twelve years of age, when I was removed from the kindly influence of a mother now in heaven, and placed under the care of an aunt, who cared nothing for religion, and whose guide in the selection of works of taste for her family, was mainly the popular voice. In her library were a large number of the then fashionable novels. No restriction was placed upon my reading, and I soon formed a taste for the novels in this library, which increased with every new volume I read, until it became at length almost unconquerable, and I read all the novels I could obtain, far and near. By the way, there were not as many in those days in circulation as there are at present; so that one then went much sooner through the catalogue. Their name now is legion. They are as abundant as the frogs were in Egypt on a memorable occasion, and are much more mischievous.

Now then, as to the influence of this heterogenous compound upon my intellectual and moral character and habits. This is a tender point, as my readers can easily perceive; but if the public want facts, (and many say they do,) they shall have them, though at the sacrifice of some personal feelings of delicacy.

I could not have read above half a dozen volumes, before my relish for other and more solid reading began to decline. Presently almost every thing in the shape of literature which bore not the seal of high-wrought fiction, became stale and uninteresting. The appetite for romance had been formed and strengthened, precisely in the same way that the appetite is created for alcoholic stimulants, until the relish for a plain, simple, natural, wholesome beverage, was lost. Thus I remained for several years. Who will say that novels did me no harm?

Another obvious effect of novel-reading upon me, was, for the time, to weaken the powers of the mind. I am not certain that I know the reason for this; nor does it much matter if I can show no good reason for it. My business, as I said before, is with facts rather than theories. But this I know, that the mental effort necessary in reading and digesting a novel, is very trifling; it is not so with history, biography, and books in the department of natural science. The former seem to contract the mind, so to speak; while the latter expand it. Still, I leave the philosophy of the thing to others. I am confident that the reading of these works had this influence upon my mind; for I can conceive of no other agent which should at this interesting period of life produce an effect apparent to all—and I suppose the fact at present will suffice.

This species of reading had another effect. It induced extravagant, unnatural and unreal ideas of human life, and especially as connected with the social affections. I frankly confess that, though I have, as far as in my power, escaped from the evils of the hydra, I feel the unhappy effects of these insidious, powerful sentiments, so early engrafted upon the tender scions of the soul, to this day. At the time I was more entirely under their influence, they imparted a tone to all my plans and purposes. They lent a coloring to the moral sentiments, and injured what they could not utterly blight and destroy.

Novel reading did more in my case. It had the effect of blunting the moral sensibility. Let me be understood. It rendered me less sensible to any rational moral impression. The advocates of this class of reading seem to me to have embraced a radical error on this point. They plead for the introduction of an occasional novel in the education of youth, on the ground that it tends to make them more susceptible to good emotions and affections. Not so. At least it was not so in my case. The more I read, the more callous became my heart to any thing good. I could feel, I could weep, weep profusely over the woes of the heroine of a romance; but I had little feeling, few tears, for real suffering. I could sigh over the disappointment of a devoted lover in story; but I had little sympathy for the poor blind beggar at my aunt's door. I could scarcely find it in my heart to pity at all the sorrows of living, breathing, jacting humanity, around me. How could I? The best emotions of my heart—those which God designed should tend to alleviate the suffering and allay the pain of my fellow men, were all expended upon other and imaginary objects. Thus thus few

This influence goes deeper into the heart than many suppose. It actually takes fast hold of the affections, and guides them away from virtue, and holiness, and heaven. Where is virtue; where are the secret springs of all that is noble, and pure, and godlike; where is religion, living, vital, fruit-bearing religion, but in the affections? If you poison the affections, then, if you school them to pour out their streams of refreshing for imaginary and unreal rather than genuine objects of sympathy, you crowd the soul downward towards the pit. The youth that is much given to the reading of romances—I make the assertion not without much observation and reflection—is seldom affected under the preaching of the gospel. Even the sufferings of the Son of God, in the garden and on the cross, can be portrayed without producing any emotion in such a mind. So was it with me; so is it with thousands who hear the gospel.

But I must bring this narrative to a close, at least for the present. My young readers, may I not venture, in view of these facts, to urge you to shun the novel, as you would a viper? If you do not, beware lest it sting your soul to death. I tremble when I think of my past history. Nothing, I am sure, but the Spirit of God saved me from the cruel embraces of the destroyer. THEOPHILUS.

A SHIPWRECK SCENE ON BOARD THE SHEFFIELD.

Many of our readers are acquainted with the Rev. Dr. Cutler, of Brooklyn, New York, who with Mrs. Cutler, spent several months in England last summer and autumn, on a visit for his health. They were on their voyage homeward exposed to severe tempests; but at length, after many sufferings, the vessel, the Sheffield, of Liverpool, arrived within sight of land, and the passengers expected speedily to reach their homes, when it struck, with one hundred and thirty persons on board, upon a shoal amidst furious breakers, and during eleven hours death seemed impending without any hope of escape. The water was rising; the ship was filling, and was gradually settling in the sea and sand: and the passengers and crew were crowded together, driven at first from the ladies' cabin: then from the aft cabin; and at length retreating to the round house and deck; and seeing the sea every moment gaining on them. The boats would not hold half the persons on board; nor were they launched, as the captain whisperingly told Dr. Cutler, the rush of the mass of the steerage passengers would create dreadful confusion, and probably cause all of them to be swamped. A steamboat was in search of them, but could not see them; night came on; the vessel was beating fearfully; the blue lights and signal rockets were expended all but one; and that was seen by the people in the steamer; who, at great risk to themselves, dashed forward and brought deliverance; so that not one perished.

It does not fall within our ordinary province to notice the events of this nature; which, alas! are numerous, and oftentimes most awful; but the circumstances which occurred in this case, during the solemn suspense between life and death, are so remarkable, that we think our readers will feel much interested in the following account of them, as related in a letter by our reverend friend before mentioned. The captain (C. W. Popham) appears to have been a devoutly religious man, as well as an able officer. He had public worship twice on Sunday, and daily morning and evening in the ladies' cabin. The following is Dr. Cutler's account of the occurrence after the ship struck.

[London Christ. Obs.

I was on deck when the ship struck. I immediately went down to my wife to afford her consolation. In a few moments all the cabin passengers came in a body to the ladies' cabin, and one of them called for prayer to Almighty God. The ship was then striking with great violence, and threatened almost instant destruction. Kneeling round the table, we poured out our hearts to God. When this prayer was offered, another was put up, and another. By this time the minds of all seemed more calm. We sat down, and some endeavored to encourage others with the hope of being rescued from the wreck. But most of the passengers were silent—revolving over the event which in the short space of an hour had taken place. Prayer was soon again called for, by some of the passengers, and it was offered with a fervency and with responses from many present which it would be well to continue at all times. An hour had now elapsed. It was proposed by our commander that we should take some refreshments; this at first was declined—many exclaiming that they had no appetite for food. Some joints of meat were placed upon the table—but none, I think, partook of them, the agitation of the ship requiring all our attention in order to keep our seats. We then arranged ourselves, the ladies on the sofas, and the gentlemen on the floor—and remained like persons awaiting the summons to ascend the scaffold. It should be remarked, that after the first mental shock was passed, a great degree of calmness was acquired by all in the cabin—and soon by all in the ship. Great pains had been taken from the commencement of the voyage to furnish every person who was destitute, with a Bible, and every copy of a grant from the British and Foreign Bible Society in London, brought on board by the writer, was given away. Many tracts were also given, and distributed throughout the ship. Divine service had been performed regularly in the cabin and in the steerage, the captain himself being the priest in his own house.

Again, there was among the passengers every form of religious profession; there were Churchmen, Presbyterians, Papists, Baptists, and Methodists. But from the first to last, not a note of controversy had been heard. And I verily believe that this absence of contentions, this unity, peace and concord had great weight with the careless men in inducing a belief in the truth of that religion which, under some form or other, all of us maintained. What a delightful prayer was that of our Saviour! 'That they may all be prayers were offered. It will not appear strange that after this, even cheerfulness was in some measure acquired. It was now near midnight; previous to this, however, while the moments were slowly departing with a leaden step, one of the clergymen present selected from the Bible a text, and delivered a short but appropriate discourse, mingling the most pointed and personal application to his hearers, especially to all who had not yet publicly decided to be on the Lord's side. The text was, 'As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, (surely we were in a waste howling wilderness, then,) even so must the Son of man be lifted up, that whosoever believeth in Him, should not perish, but have everlasting life.' John iii.

It was now drawing towards midnight, and we had all been driven from below to the upper deck. We sat in a dense mass looking at each other and at death, which was staring us in the face. Our captain was standing half way down the companion ladder, that he might converse with one and another, whose sorrows found vent in words.

It was about this time that the captain invited the writer to go out with him and see the beauty of the night; and such a scene of sublimity and desolation I never beheld. The ship, stripped of its masts, lay weltering in the sea and the sand, and appeared like the top of a long black tomb.

On our right (the night had cleared, and the moon was bright) appeared the shore of Long Island, about eight miles distant; in front, those of Staten Island; and here we were in solitary possession of an immense shoal covered with waves, in which a boat could not live, and with no appearance of help. The moon was, indeed bright; but it seemed only a torch to light us to the grave. Light-houses were sparkling at different points; the heavens were glittering over our heads; but its cold wind compelled us to retire to the round house for shelter, and for fellowship in affliction. It was now that the writer gave up all hope for life; and taking his seat beside one from whom he did not expect to be separated for a moment, even in death, (O, what a bond is Christian affection between man and wife!) he endeavored to reconcile himself and others to the will of God.

The first hour on the wreck was one of excitement, agitation, lamentation, and visible and audible suffering. The last hour was one of silent and heart-rending, but smothered one, that the world may believe that thou hast sent me.' To these two causes I am inclined to attribute the comparative tranquility which for ten hours out of twelve was visible.

But oh! who can reveal what was working under this visible composure? Resolved in order to accommodate the soul to existing circumstances! Much was perceptible in the expression of the countenance, and in the tones of the voice; and the results of spiritual habits long formed were not illegible. From what sprang that ability to seize upon the consolations of religion, and to impart them to others, even while the very flesh was trembling on their bones? Whence sprang that female fortitude, which seemed hardly to desire the sympathy which was uttered or evinced? The previous life, the avowed principles and plain practice of every person now brought forth its proper harvest. How true is it that 'whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap.' But whatever were their thoughts, I shall retain a high respect for all my fellow passengers, on account of their self-possession throughout the whole of this awful night. I saw a gentleman return to the ladies' cabin, after all were driven out of it by the water, to recover some article of clothing for the servant of another passenger who in the hurry had nothing on her head. And at the last moment of agony, when the captain came to take in his arms a lady to carry her on the deck, I saw her insist upon his taking another lady, who, although unattended by any relative, was entitled to every respect. Indeed, it required sufferings like these to touch the deepest strings in the bosom of refined, cultivated minds.

During the night our excellent commander urged us to take refreshment. Bread and wine and water were handed round twice or three times at intervals; and oh! how solemn, and to some of us, how sacramental the refreshment.

But previous to our removal to the upper deck, in order to prepare us all, especially the ladies, for the exposure, the captain came down, and recommended that tea and bread should be prepared for us;—'and then,' said he, turning to me, 'and then, sir, let us have prayers.'

After partaking of this 'last supper,' as we supposed, the 46th Psalm, the 130th and the 107th Psalm, and the 27th chapter of the Acts, were read; a hymn was sung, and agony. All had made up their minds; all had acquired fortitude; perhaps from different sources; all were subdued, affectionate and respectful to each other. Social prayer, which had been resorted to again and again below deck, seemed now to be a dispensation which had passed away, and given place to that individual application to the Saviour of souls which immediately precedes death. Every soul seemed wrapped in its own meditations.

Our watches now told us that midnight was past, and the tide, which the captain had said would go down and leave the ship dry in the cabin, continued to rise within, while by the almanac it had been falling for two hours or more on the outside of the ship. Alas! some of us knew that it was a tide, which so far as we were concerned, would never go down. One gentleman observing his watch to have run down, took his key to wind it up, but suddenly stopped, and said, 'I shall have no further use for time,' and replaced it in his pocket in its silent and death-like sleep.

It was about this time that a steerage passenger on the deck gave notice that an object in the distance appeared to be approaching. There was a rush to that side of the ship, but nothing could be seen. The officers of the ship looked but gave no encouragement. Shortly, this person again made the same remark; all eyes were again employed, but in vain. A third exclamation was then uttered; and now the captain placed himself where the best sight could be obtained, and after looking through his glass, expressed hope, and then confidence. A few sparks were emitted from the dark mass, and a shout pealed from the deck, 'A steamer has arrived!' Who can tell what was felt at this moment? God grant that none of the readers of this may ever know the transition which was then experienced.

Parents and children embraced; husbands and wives, nay, strangers were seen clasping each other, and expressing and uttering their awful joy. A young man burst into the centre of the crowd, and said to the writer, 'Now let us praise God.' He rose and repeated the doxology, 'Praise God from whom all blessings flow;' and then arose a hymn of praise from one hundred voices on that dark deck, accompanied by the deep bass of the surrounding billows,—which bore upwards the gushing emotions of our hearts, and rendered to Him to whom it was due the whole praise of our deliverance. In six hours afterwards, we were at home.

No blame attached to the captain, who had taken a pilot on board, and acted throughout the trying scene, in the most firm, judicious and exemplary manner. In acknowledging the gift of a Family Bible presented by several of the passengers, after their landing, in testimony of their gratitude, he says:—'This holy book, as it is the most appropriate testimony which you, gentlemen, could have given of your approbation of my conduct, so, I assure you, it is the most acceptable which I could have received. From early infancy I have been taught to love, esteem and reverence it as the polar star of my course through life, and the sheet anchor of my hopes hereafter.'

PROTESTANTISM AGAINST ROMANISM.

We have been much interested in the perusal of an old book by EDWARD BRERWOOD, Professor of Astronomy in Gresham College, London, entitled, "Enquiries concerning the diversity of Languages and Religions through the chief parts of the World; printed in 1614." The writer was a man of great learning, and undertook this work by advice of the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, for the express purpose of refuting the claim of the Roman Church, that its members extend over the whole world. This he does by stating distinctly the doctrines of the Roman Church, and then trying the creeds of all the various religious sects by that standard, and setting down the points of difference. In carrying out his plan, he has made some statements respecting the comparative estimation in which the Sabbath and the Lord's Day were held among the Eastern Nations two hundred and fifty years ago, which deserve a notice, because they exactly correspond with the positions which we have taken, and abundantly prove that the observance of the first day of the week, and the neglect of the Sabbath, are strictly Romish practices.

Mr. Brerewood treats the religious world of his time under four leading divisions—Christianity, Mahommedanism, Idolatry, Judaism. Christians he supposes to possess about one sixth part of the inhabited earth; Mahommedans about one fifth; and Idolaters nearly two thirds. Mahommedans, as every body knows, have never kept the first day of the week, or Lord's day. They always have, and do now, observe the sixth day, or Friday, on account of an important event which they suppose to have happened to their leader on that day. Among idolaters there has been a great diversity—some keeping the third day, others no day at all, and others Dies Solis, the day of the Sun, or Sunday. Of course, then, the Romish Church at that time could not argue in favor of her universal prevalence from the regard which idolaters and Mahommedans paid to her principal holiday. She must look to nominally Christian countries for facts upon which to base this argument. Let us see how much assistance she has found there.

It is well known, that at a very early period considerable difficulty arose between the Eastern Church around Constantinople, and the Western Church around Rome, concerning the time of observing Easter and certain other holidays. This difficulty extended to the time and manner of keeping the Sabbath, as well as the first day of the week, or Lord's Day. At Rome the Sabbath was made a fast day, while the Lord's day was regarded as a most joyful festival. But in the East it was not so. The Sabbath was honored as much as ever, and no duties were required upon it calculated to bring it into disrepute. This is abundantly proved by the facts of history.

The Christians of the GREEK communion, who at that time acknowledged obedience to the patriarch of Constantinople, were more numerous than those who acknowledged the authority of Rome. Now concerning their practice, Mr. Brerewood, in enumerating the points in which they differed from Rome, says:—"They solemnize Saturday (the old Sabbath) festivally, and eat therein flesh, forbidding as unlawful to fast any Saturday in the year, except Easter eve." This shows clearly enough, that the great body of Christians of the Greek communion two hundred and fifty years ago did not acknowledge at all the right of Rome either to forbid the keeping of the Sabbath, or to command that it should be made a fast day.

Now turn to the SYRIANS, and hear what Mr. Brerewood has to say about them. These are his words:—"The Syrians are the same that in some histories are termed Melchites, being esteemed for their great numbers the greatest sect of Christians in the Orient. . . . . They agree nearly with the Grecians. . . . . They celebrate divine service as solemnly on the Sabbath as on the Lord's day. . . . . They keep that day festival, eating therein flesh; and fast no Saturday in the year but Easter eve."

Again, in speaking of the Cophti, who are no other than the Christians of Egypt, he says:—"They observe not the Lord's days, nor other feasts, except in the cities."

His testimony concerning the Habassines, or Midland Æthiopians, is equally decided, and tends to the same conclusion:—"They reverence the Sabbath (Saturday,) keeping it solemn equal with the Lord's day. . . . . They eat flesh every Friday (as on other days) betwixt Easter and Whitsunday; as on every Satuday also through the whole year, except in Lent."

The above quotations are important, because they prove two things which have often been denied. In the first place, they prove that for a long period, if not indeed up to the present time, the Sabbath has been strictly observed in the best portion of the Eastern Churches. In the second place, they prove that the observance of the first day of the week, to the neglect of the Sabbath, has been encouraged mainly by the Romish Church, and that it has prevailed extensively only in those regions where Romish authority has been fully acknowledged. With these facts before us, what Protestant can any longer give his support to Popery by practicing one of its ordinances? We hear much in these days about the great battle which is taking place in the world—a battle of the word of God against the word of man—a battle between forms and life—between error and truth—between Romanism and Protestantism. But, if we mistake not, the worst antagonist which Protestantism will have to meet in that battle is created by the inconsistency of denying the authority of Rome, and at the same time holding on to her practices. If Protestants would but cut themselves clear from this inconsistency, their attacks would be irresistible, and the battle would soon be decided in their favor.

CHURCH DEBTS.

A notion prevails in many places, that it is a good thing for a church to be somewhat in debt, because debts serve as a bond of union, and produce a spirit of activity. But it needs only an eye half open upon the practical workings of this system, to see the exceeding folly of such a notion. When a church is in debt, of course, some one holds a pecuniary claim upon it; and that person is not unfrequently the very one who cares least about the objects for which the church was established. Yet his feelings must be consulted, and his claims promptly met, or the church may be thrown at any time into confusion and turmoil. Now see to what practical effects this leads. In the first place, a preacher must be sought who gives promise of building up the church and enabling it to meet these pecuniary obligations by his talents and address, whatever may be his religious character or influence. In many cases a preacher chosen for this object becomes as much a caterer for the public taste as ever did an actor upon a theatrical stage. It is perfect folly to expect, that such a man will do any thing valuable and lasting towards advancing the true interests of the church. Again, the members of the church, who are already under the burden, are set upon seeking the companionship of those who will be able to help them to bear their burdens. The old doctrine, that a common man is more precious than fine gold, and a great man than the gold of Ophir, is at once exploded. A man is esteemed valuable according to the gold he can command. Hence, not unfrequently, a man with much gold and no religion, is prized above a man with much religion and no gold. The consequences need not be named. The church becomes formal and useless, the demand for filthy lucre becomes greater than the demand for broken and contrite hearts, and the vital element of religion withers and dies. The truth of these assertions has been too often illustrated to be denied; and the facts ought to be a warning to every community against unnecessarily incurring church debts.

INDIGENT STUDENTS FOR THE MINISTRY.

We are glad to learn, as we do from the proceedings of the Western Association which we published last week, that attention is again directed to the necessity and policy of rendering pecuniary aid to such indigent young men as give promise of usefulness in the ministry. There can be but little doubt, we think, that at the present time we are in the greatest need of well-qualified and resolute young men to fill important and responsible stations which Divine Providence is opening among us. The only sure way to secure them, is by marking who are the persons apparently called of God to the work, and then extending to them the helping hand as far as they may need it. It is through the instrumentality of the poor of this world, that God's plans of mercy have generally been promoted. The apostles were most of them poor men so far as this world's goods were concerned. Among those who were called in their days were not many of the noble and wealthy; but God saw fit to choose quite different men to confound his adversaries. Thus it has always been, and thus we have reason to expect it always will be. Hence the necessity of assisting the indigent to prepare for their responsible and arduous work, if we wish to see them enter upon it with a good prospect of success.

Many are the influences of poverty favorable to the preparation of men to labor in the ministry. It qualifies them, in the first place, to sympathize with those who most need the minister's sympathy. A very large portion of the human family first look out upon life from squalid hovels, where they are compelled to become familiar with difficulty and want. It is the business of the preacher of the gospel to labor to enlighten the minds of these men, to smooth their path through this life, and awaken within them the consciousness of a higher life. For this work he can never be qualified by mere speculations about the condition and wants of the poor. He must himself know something of the depths of their wretchedness, before the fountains of sympathy for them will be stirred within him, and he prepared to labor and die on their behalf.

Again, the influence of poverty in fitting men to meet the flatteries or the frowns of a deceiving world, is invaluable. It is not uncommon, when a religious teacher shows signs of a disposition to reform old abuses or enforce new duties, for the adversary of all good to endeavor to turn him from his purpose by threats or promises. And if he can succeed in intimidating him, or filling his mind with a love of ease and emolument, his object is accomplished, and the good man is undone. He is a rare man indeed who has not his price. Yet such there are. And no man is more likely to be of the number than he whose experience has made him familiar with the difficulties attendant upon poverty.

Indeed, in whatever light we think of this matter, we dare not despise a man for his poverty, or neglect to aid such an one in his preparation for any post of usefulness to which he gives evidence of having been called. We remember that the Gospel itself was founded upon poverty, crucifixion, and every species of worldly distress. We remember also that its Pauls and Luthers, who have risen from time to time to bless the world, have been poor, though educated men. We cannot therefore fail to look to that class for aid in the future, and to cherish the liveliest interest in whatever is designed to assist them.

PROTESTANT UNION.—The late movement of the English Government in endowing Maynooth College, has excited not a little anti-Catholic feeling. Among its results we notice that a committee has been appointed in England to make inquiries, and to open a correspondence with the three kingdoms, the Continent, and America, on the subject of a great Protestant Union for the recognition and promotion of the common principles and intesests of Protestantism, irrespective of the views which the various religious bodies may take of ecclesiastical polity. Such a union is undoubtedly very desirable, but we think there would be difficulty in drawing the line between Catholics and Protestants with sufficient distinctness to enable all to decide on which side they ought to stand. There is the spirit of popery among Protestants as well as Catholics. The Bible must be made, in fact as well as in name, the only rule of faith, before there can be a permanent union.

FOREIGN MISSIONS.

To the Members and Patrons of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association:

DEAR BRETHREN,—Within a few days past I have received a letter from our friend WARDER CRESSON, formerly of Byberry, Bucks Co., Pa., and now United States Consul at Jerusalem. The letter is postmarked May 4th, 1845, and is in answer to one addressed by me to him, soliciting information on some matters connected with a foreign mission, which Bro. Cresson assures me he shall be happy to serve. The letter, although not exactly adapted for publication as a whole, contains some interesting intelligence.

He informs me that Christians from Abyssinia yet annually come up to Jerusalem to worship; that about forty, with one of their priests, were at that time in Jerusalem, from Abyssynia and the neighborhood of the Kingdom of Shoa; that in a conversation with their priest, he learned that it is the seventh-day Sabbath that is observed in their country, which owns no subjection to Rome.—They believe that their forefathers received their religious faith from the Apostle Philip, who preached it first to the Ethiopian Eunuch, treasurer to Queen Candace. These Christians appeared pacific and friendly, and assured him that traveling was so safe in their country, that persons may travel with a wedge of gold upon their heads without danger, if provided with a passport from their king. They likewise said, that the king of Shoa is a Christian.

From the same source it appears that considerable efforts are being made to promote political and commercial objects among the Abyssinians, by the English, Prussians, and French; but that the French are obtaining the most influence.

Bro. Cresson has likewise communicated much important information respecting the cost of living, and traveling, and hiring interpreters, in the country adjacent to the Red Sea, which is quite favorable to the prosecution of the missionary enterprise on which we resolved at the last Anniversary.

He also informs me of a Baptist brother, formerly from England, who has resided for some years in Jerusalem, and is in the strict observance of the seventh day, the Sabbath of the Lord; and also of a Jewish Rabbi, a convert to Christianity, who holds fast his attachment to God's holy Sabbath. He gives it as his opinion, that we ought to have a mission supported in Jerusalem itself.

Bro. Cresson has been holding a written argument upon the truth or falsity of the seventh-day Sabbath, with the Rev. Mr. VEITCH, Chaplain to the Bishop of Jerusalem, (Episcopalian,) which they have just closed, and which Mr. Cresson informed Mr. Veitch he should publish, but against which Mr. V. objected.

On the whole, this information affords increasing encouragement to prosecute the work on which we have entered, and to call upon the name of the Lord that he would "prosper the work of our hands, and let his work appear unto his servants, and his glory unto their children." Let all remember this work in their prayers.

Yours affectionately,

SAMUEL DAVISON, Cor. Sec.

P. S. Mr. Cresson wishes to express his love to the brethren of our denomination with whom he formed an acquaintance. S. D.

A DARK PICTURE.—Rev. Henry Hughes, who officiates in the parish of St. Pancras, London, has lately published a statement of the religious condition of that parish, which shows it to be in a deplorable state of ignorance and spiritual destitution. He says the population of the parish is estimated at 140,000, for whose accommodation there are only fourteen churches and chapels, being sufficient room for about 17,000 people. The number of attendants upon day schools of the establishment he sets down at 4000, making the number of boys and girls receiving instruction to be about one thirty-fifth part of the population. The consequence of this state of things, according to Mr. Hughes, is most lamentable. There is no bond of union between the clergy and the people. The great mass of the laboring population have altogether abandoned attendance upon public worship. Parents feel little or no interest in the moral and religious improvement of their children. In short, every thing which ought to characterize a Christian community is almost wholly obliterated. If things are permitted to exist in such a state in the metropolis itself, and under the eye of the dignitaries of the established church, how can we expect that church to continue long to maintain a hold upon the hearts of the people?

JUDICIAL DECISION.—A curious law case was recently decided by Judge Keith of Ohio. It seems that a difficulty arose in a colored Baptist church in Chilicothe, and that one party filed a bill in Chancery against the other party, charging them with having deserted the principles and doctrines of the Baptist denomination by furthering the cause of missions and other benevolent institutions. The Judge decided against the applicants, thus settling the question, that the advocacy of the cause of missions is no abandonment of the cardinal principles of the Baptist church. We should recommend filing a bill against the anti-mission party, charging them with having abandoned the cardinal duty [of Christianity, by refusing to "go into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature."

JEWISH INTELLIGENCE.

As an illustration of the charitable feelings of the Jews, the fact is worthy of notice, that at Gibraltar, on Purim day, no less than $4000 was collected for distribution among poor families resident in the garrison, besides large gifts to more than a hundred poor persons who were present from various parts of Barbary, and whose passage to their homes was paid by the congregation. Such a charity, among any people, is munificent and praiseworthy.

Another Ukase has appeared requiring the Russo-Polish Jews to exchange their peculiar costume for that worn by all other classes of the people. They may continue to wear their peculiar costume up to 1850 on the payment of a certain fine; but after that period there is no alternative. Probably most of the Jews will at once comply with the Ukase.

The Occident and Jewish Advocate informs us that efforts are now making among the Jews, to establish schools for religious instruction in Baltimore, New Orleans, and Montreal. It is an encouraging circumstance, which we are glad to learn.

SABBATH TRACTS.—The American Sabbath Tract Society has recently added two new Tracts to its series. One is entitled, "Sabbath Controversy—the True Issue," and is designed to show exactly what is and what is not relevant matter in discussing the Sabbath question. The other is entitled, "The Fourth Commandment—False Exposition and its Consequences," showing what absurdities result from representing that the Fourth Commandment requires only the observance of a Sabbath and a Seventh Day, instead of the the Sabbath and the Seventh Day. The Society has also issued a cheap edition of the Address to the Baptists, with an introduction and a new title page, making a pamphlet of twenty-four pages, well adapted to circulation through the Post Office. The series of Tracts is now very complete, and is got up in a style which deserves great credit.

"A TREATISE ON THE SABBATH, addressed to the Pious of Every Denomination. By a Friend of Truth. Chambersburg, Pa., 1842."

Such is the title of a pamphlet of eighty large octavo pages which has lately come in our way, advocating the claims of the original Sabbath. It is written with a good deal of spirit, and seems well adapted to do good. The author, we understand, is EDWIN KONIGMACKER, of Ephrata, Pa., whom we welcome to the field of controvesy in behalf of long-neglected truth.

THE UNION THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY of the city of New York held its Anniversary Exercises during the last week in June. The orations on the occasion were of a superior order. Twenty-six young men received their diplomas of having honorably completed a three years' course of theological study, and were commended to the fellowship and confidence of the churches.

THE GENERAL THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY (Episcopal,) likewise held its Anniversary in New York during the last week in June. The graduating class was small in consequence of its ranks having been thinned by the dismissal of four students on account of the Romish sentiments they were supposed to cherish, and also by the apostacy of another, a son of Chancellor Walworth, who has joined the Roman Catholic Church. At the election of Trustees which took place at the same time, the high-church party triumphed.

A SEMI-CENTENNIAL ANNIVERSARY of the founding of Union College is to be celebrated at Schenectady, on Tuesday, the 22d inst. The graduates are to assemble in the largest church in the place, where the roll of fifty classes will be called in order. An address is to be delivered by one of the graduates of the oldest class, and also by Dr. Alonzo Potter, the newly elected bishop of Pennsylvania, who graduated in 1818. After the exercises in the church the graduates are to dine on College Hill, under a pavilion which will accommodate one thousand persons. That will be a day of touching and stirring recollections to the many able men who have gone forth from Union College.

DOCTORS OF DIVINITY AND LAW.—The time for College Commencements has come again, and we begin to read as usual about the titles of D. D. and L. L. D. conferred upon this man and that. From the example set by the Colleges which have already held their Anniversaries, we judge that the crop for the present year will equal that of any preceding year. If so, it is quite possible that before long the highest honor of a truly deserving man will be that he has no title.

UNIVERSALIST MISSIONARY MOVEMENT.—We learn from the last number of the Christian Messenger, that the N. Y. Universalist Missionary Society is anxious to do something, and has employed a man to visit the villages in the vicinity of New York, to preach on the subject of Universalism, and collect together the believers in that doctrine who are scattered here and there. The missionary's report is published, and is spoken of by the editor of the Messenger as an evidence that the prospects are encouraging.

THE MAYNOOTH BILL.—By the last arrival from England, news was received of the passage of this much talked of bill, by which the English Government makes an appropriation to support a Catholic College in Ireland. This result is regarded, by a certain class of religionists, as a most happy triumph of the golden rule of doing to others as one would be done by. But by another and very large class it is regarded as a surrender to Rome, rather than conferring a boon on Ireland. Of course in such circumstances, the discussions upon the subject are numerous and warm. One article closes with the following paragraph, in which are thoughts deserving of consideration:—

"The present Government has struck a formidable blow at popular prejudice in this Maynooth measure, and the recoil has been terrible; but still no advance has been made towards the permanent pacification of the country for which the sacrifice was made. There never will be peace in Ireland—it is folly to expect it—while the Anglican church in that country exists in its present sumptuous indolence, in its enormous wealth—a living mockery and a libel on the misery of the people. The richest church existing amongst the poorest people in Christendom—and that church not their own—must always be an eye-sore, a cancer, a never ceasing cause of irritation. The knife sooner or later, must be applied to cut out his unsightly excrescence."

IN EARNEST.—The friends of temperance in Lynn, Mass., have adopted what must prove an effective mode of putting down groggeries. They hold a meeting each Sunday in front of some hotel or store where rum is sold, at some of which meetings as many as fifteen hundred persons have been present. Here is one of their notices, which must give an unenviable notoriety to the persons named:—

"The next meeting will be held on Sunday afternoon, the 6th of July, in front of Breed's slaughter-house, and in the pestilent vicinity of Caleb Wiley's and George Lummus'—and near by the grave yard which they have done so much to populate."

THE NEW POST OFFICE LAW.—A large number of Postmasters have sent in their resignations on account of the small compensation allowed them under the new law. By this means it was apprehended that the public service would be greatly injured unless some farther compensation could be given them. The Postmaster General has therefore consulted with the Attorney General as to whether he had any authority to apply a portion of the funds appropriated by Congress to meet the deficiencies of the department, to the payment of such Postmasters as are not adequately compensated under the new law. His opinion is in favor of exercising the authority alluded to, and the Postmaster General has therefore issued the following order:—

Ordered, That, from and after the 1st day of July, 1845, every deputy postmaster whose commission on the postages of letters at 30 per cent., and of newspapers at 50 per cent., under the act of 3d March, 1845, shall fall short of the sum of $6 25 for any one quarter, or of the proportional part of that sum for any fraction of a quarter, be authorized to credit himself, in a separate item in his account current, for extra commission on the postage of letters at 20 per cent., under the act of 3d March, 1845.

FIGHT WITH RUNAWAY NEGROES.—On Monday night, July 7, sixty or seventy runaway negroes passed through Washington City on their way to Pennsylvania. They had eloped according to a pre-concerted arrangement, from the counties of Prince George, Clarks, and St. Mary's, in Maryland, and were armed with scythes, bludgeons, and some guns. They were pursued by a large body of citizens from Washington and the adjacent towns, and overtaken at a place called Logtown, where a desperate fight ensued. The negroes defended themselves with clubs and stones until they were fired upon by the citizens. By this means eight were wounded, two severely; twenty-two were led to surrender; and the remainder were compelled to flee to the woods. The woods in the vicinity were immediately surrounded, and probably most of the negroes were taken. This shows how contented and happy the negroes are, and how much the patriotic inhabitants of the nation's "ten miles square" will do to extend the benefits of universal liberty.

THE FOURTH OF JULY.—In a late number of Cassius M. Clay's "True American" is an article on this subject, so full of wholesome truth that it ought to be extensively read:—

"Some of the Southern people seem to wonder that this once glorious day has begun to be neglected by our people—in many places 'not celebrated at all.' Why should it be otherwise? Are we not, in the face of all men, a living lie—shall we be so silly, as yearly to proclaim our own abandonment? We cannot lift up our hearts to God, in holy aspirations of gratitude and expectancy, because we have been partial in the appropriation of his mercies—we cannot come together and exchange joyous congratulations, because selfishness is solitary in its manifestations. The Fourth of July, 1776, saw us proclaiming liberty to all mankind—the Fourth of July, 1845, will look down upon the American people as the sole propagandists of slavery among men. Henceforth, till the rights of men be vindicated, let the fife be mute—the drum be muffled—the American Eagle wear mourning—let Christians pray that our holy religion be restored to its life-giving purity—our statesmen re-baptize themselves in the exalted spirit of the patriotism of Washington, Adams and Jefferson—let the people mourn their apostacy—let the Fourth of July be a day of fasting and prayer, that the Nation be lustrated of its great and self-destroying sin."

General Intelligence.

Capt. JONATHAN WALKER, of Harwich, Mass., the history of whose imprisonment at Pensacola, for aiding in the escape of slaves is well known to our readers, arrived in this city on the 11th inst. in the brig Lowder. He was liberated from prison on the 16th of June, after a confinement of 11 months. He was also punished by sitting in the pillory and being branded with the letters S. S. (slave stealer.) He was tried and found guilty on seven indictments, and fined $165. The whole amount of fine and costs which he has paid is about $700. He freely admits that he attempted to carry seven slaves, at their request, from Pensacola to Nassau. The voyage was undertaken in an open boat, and they had been fourteen days at sea when they were taken up near Cape Florida by a wrecker from Key West! Capt. Walker states that John M. Blunt, the lawyer sent to Pensacola to defend him, turned out a miserable swindler, pocketing about $700 without even appearing in his behalf, although he was within a few miles of the place while the trial was going on.

Capt. Walker sustains a high character for integrity and piety among those who know him in Massachusetts, and has a wife and eight children from whom he has been separated now nearly two years, during which time they have felt the deepest anxiety for his fate. The brand on his right hand he styles the coat of arms of the United States! If the slaves had been white, and Capt. Walker had endangered his life in taking them away from the Arabs, the brand would have been deemed a mark of honor in every part of the country, and Congress would have hastened to testify the respect and gratitude of the nation for his services. But the slaves were black and held in bondage under the authority of U. S. law, and we suppose there can be no doubt that he was a rogue! Hail Columbia! [Tribune.

FROM SANDWICH ISLANDS.—By the brig Delaware, at Fall River, we have later dates from the Sandwich Islands:

His Excellency Gov. John Adams Kukaini, died at Kailua, Hawaii, on the 9th ult. For many years he has been Governor of Hawaii, the largest Islands of the group. On Sunday afternoon, the 15th ult., Rev. Mr. Armstrong preached a funeral sermon at the same chapel, and read also a letter from David Malo, who was present at the Governor's decease.

A British vessel arrived early in December with the Rt. Rev. Mr. Blanchet, Bishop of Philadelphia, who has sailed for London. On board the same vessel, Dr. Babcock, lady and two children. Rev. Mr. Perkins, lady and three children. They have been connected with the Methodist Missions in Oregon, and are now returning to the United States.

October 16, arrived ship Stonington, Hamley, N. London, last from Lahaina.

FROM CHINA.—The ship Henry Pratt, Captain King, has arrived here with advices to April 4th. The British Government at Hong Kong has established houses for smoking opium, under certain regulations—the houses to be open from daylight until 10 o'clock at night, to be closed on Sunday; and the introduction into such houses of weapons, fire arms, or instruments of any kind by which death might be produced, is absolutely prohibited under severe penalties, as is the sale of opium by retail in other houses. The China market is overstocked with American beef, pork, hams, cheese, butter, tobacco, varnish, pitch, tar, paints, oil, sardines, anchovies, brandy, fruits, and spars.

SINGULAR AND MELANCHOLY RESULT OF A RACE.—The horse named by Mr. Conover, in the Hurdle Race on Monday, belonged to Mr. John Van Sicklen of Long Island; the first rider of the horse, Mr. Mason, was thrown and is not expected to live; the second rider of the same horse was also thrown and badly injured; the horse lost the race and was distanced; and Mr. Van Sicklen in going home from the race on Monday night was throw from his wagon in the streets of Brooklyn, the wagon wheels passed over his neck, and he died in great agony the next morning about 11 o'clock. The horse was called Snaky Hissey.

RURAL CEMETERY AT PROVIDENCE.—We learn from the Providence Journal that the good people of that city are contemplating the laying out of a lot of ground suited to the wealth of the place and the liberality of the citizens, as a rural resting-place for the departed. We understand that proposals have been issued for converting a lot of thirty-six acres, on the Moshassuc River, into a Cemetery, to be laid out in appropriate and elegant style. It is proposed to erect a substantial fence around it, with an appropriate entrance, to build a receiving tomb, and to put up a cottage for the undertaker who will have charge of the Cemetery. Also, to raise the sum of eleven thousand dollars by the sale of lots, and to expend the same in laying out and embellishing the Cemetery.

MARRIAGES IN FRANCE.—In France, marriages, for the most part, take place more from interest, or to use the French expression, convenance, than affection. M. So-and-so tells his friends, M. Such-a-one, that he wants to marry his son, and M. Such-a-one offers his daughter; the two old gentlemen then talk over the fortune they can give, and if they agree on that momentous point, the young people are presented to each other, and shortly after married. There are, of course, exceptions, but that is the general way of proceeding. A young French girl has no more idea of choosing her own husband than she has of flying—nay, there is not one in five hundred who ventures to hint that she would prefer another to the individual chosen by her parents for her hand. Much unhappiness and great immorality are the results of this system, but upon the whole, it works better than one would expect. Another objectionable thing in the French system of marrying, is that old men of sixty or seventy often wed young girls of sixteen and seventeen. Indeed, Frenchmen, for the most part, don't dream of marrying until they have attained the age of between thirty-five and forty. I have been led into these observations by an advertisement in a newspaper, in which a "young man, aged 22, six feet high and remarkably handsome," modestly expresses his desire to "espouse any lady of high rank, maid or widow, possessing a good fortune." Advertisements for wives are quite a matter of course here, and many marriages take place through them. Such, in fact, is the business-like manner in which marriages are arranged, that there are several agency-offices that occupy themselves with nothing else; and these offices, from time to time, advertise "rich widows" to marry, with as much off-hand coolness as you would announce a horse to sell.

BALTIMORE.—A correspondent of the Christian Reflector writes, June 9th:

The truth is—and I write it with a glow of hallowed gratitude to God—slavery is dying in Maryland. It may linger, like a serpent with a wounded head, but it must die. I had a conversation yesterday with a Connecticut farmer who has moved into this region, and is cultivating his lands by free labor. The effect of his single effort is already felt for miles around him. Other farmers, natives of the soil, are beginning to profit by his example. In this quiet way, with the eloquence of industry, his arguments being those of the plough and the harrow, he is pleading the cause of emancipation, and winning his countrymen to her peaceful standard. Heaven speed such toils!

NEW ENGLAND SCHOOLS.—A writer in a Southern paper thus describes the Free Schools of New England: "The poorest boy in the free schools feels as high and as proud as the son of the richest." "You do not mean," said Governor Barbour of Virginia, after visiting the superb free schools in Boston, which he admired very much, "that those schools are free?" "Indeed I do," said the committee-man. "You remember the boy that got the medal in the class we have just examined, and the boy that lost it? The first is the son of that wood-sawer there, (pointing to a man who was sawing wood in the street,) and the second is the son of John Quincy Adams, ex-President of the United States." The Virginian started in astonishment at a spectacle like this, and no longer wondered at the prosperity of New England.

KINDERHOOK WOOL DEPOT.—A depot has been established at Kinderhook to which wool is brought for sale from Columbia, Albany and Rensselaer counties, and from the neighboring county of Berkshire, in Massachusetts. The quantity received during the week ending June 25, was 24,500 lbs. The whole amount in store is 49,500 lbs. The wool as it arrives is sorted, that brought by each farmer being kept distinct, and the various grades arranged in separate parcels, which are all numbered, according to the quality, thus facilitating the operation of both buying and selling.

TRIAL OF GREEN FOR THE MURDER OF HIS WIFE.—This trial occupied the whole of the last, and runs into the present week. The Troy papers contain full reports, one of which, the Budget's, is published in pamphlet form.

As the jury are not allowed to see newspapers, until the trial is over, there can be no harm in saying that the testimony discloses one of the most deliberate, cold-blooded murders that we have ever read. Green had been married but a short time to a beautiful, affectionate and confiding girl of 18, he being 22. Without any provocation or cause (for when she was dying she appealed to him to say whether she had ever deceived him or in any way conducted improperly, and was answered in the negative) this monster dosed her, day and night, with arsenic, which he put into her coffee, her chicken broth and her medicine, standing by her bed-side unmoved while the poison was agonizing her with pain! And what is more strange than fiction, is the fact that this poison was repeatedly administered while persons around the sufferer were witnessing its deadly effects. The victim herself, though apparently conscious that her husband was murdering her, took whatever he offered. [Eve. Jour.

SUMMARY.

The weather for the last few days has been intensely hot—hotter than ever known in the memory of the "oldest inhabitant." In New York and vicinity it has been unusually destructive of life. In a paper of yesterday morning we counted notices of sixteen deaths, from the effects of heat and drinking cold water.

The Slave Trade in the Levant, it is said, is carried on to an enormous extent, and with perfect impunity. There have been several extensive shipments of Nubian slaves made in Alexandria on board of Greek and Turkish vessels bound for Smyrna and Constantinople, and from the latter port there are frequent arrivals of Circassian slaves, and no objection whatever to this traffic is made by European Consuls.

A letter from Frankfort, Germany, speaks in glowing terms of the musical promise of Richard S. H. Hill. During the operation, which lasted about six minutes, she was wholly insensible, and being awoke, stated that she knew nothing of what had been passing. On being asked if she had any consciousness whatever during the progress of the operation, she said she had not.

The Editor of the Cincinnati Herald, speaking of the action of the late Old School General Assembly, says:—A veteran Democratic leader, after listening attentively to the Report, and witnessing its disposition, turned to us with the irreverent remark—'Well, I can't stand that, any how. The Anti-Renters had a very orderly celebration of the 4th at New Scotland. Not the least impressive part of the scenes of the day was the appearance of a team, hailing from Reedsville, of eleven yoke of oxen attached to a carriage carrying about fifty persons, with a banner across, fastened on either side to a hickory and ash tree, showing the union of both parties in one great Anti-Rent Party.

The Lexington Observer states that Jacob F. Todhunter, born deaf and dumb, aged twenty-five years, has been taught to articulate by his instructor, Robert T. Anderson. The Christian Advocate and Journal says, the "divisive spirit" among the Methodists South, "originated with and is chiefly sustained by the slaveholding aristocracy among the traveling preachers." These may lead or drive the great body of the people into a separation, but there will be a separation ere long; and the M. E. Church will gather again her children, and lead them into green pastures and by the still waters, under shepherds who are old-fashioned traveling Methodist preachers, and whose treasure is in heaven, not in negroes, or in cotton, or tobacco plantations.

Bishops Morris and Janes have given official notice in the Christian Advocate and Journal of last week, to the Southern Conferences of the Methodist Church, that they respectfully decline attending those Conferences, in view of resolutions adopted by the Bench of Bishops at their last meeting in this City, wherein the secession de facto of the Southern portion of the Church is distinctly recognized. We presume that, in accordance with this decision, Bishop Soule, who goes the whole figure with the South, will not be allowed to preside, if he shall attempt to do so, in any Northern Conference. The division of the Church would seem now to be pretty nearly complete, though we suppose there will be a desperate struggle on the part of the secéders for their share of the church property.

A fearful tragedy, the result of seduction and desertion, took place in New Orleans on the 24th ult. As Mr. J. P. Pettiway, a negro broker, was walking in the auction mart in Camp street, with a Mr. Kendig, a young lady of prepossessing appearance, plainly but neatly dressed, approached him, and drawing a pistol shot him, the ball entering his left side, passing through his body and coming out in front. Pettiway was conveyed to his residence. The young lady, whose name is Henrietta Blanchard, made no attempt to escape, but throwing the pistol on the floor, demanded to be taken at once before the Recorder. She was told that she had killed Pettiway. She replied that he had done worse to her. In reply to an inquiry why she had done as she had, she merely said, "He knows"—adding after a pause—"This is a fearful tragedy, but he deserved it." She was taken to the Second Municipality police jail. She appeared and continued throughout the day perfectly composed, betraying not the least excitement. There was nothing in her manner that indicated an abandoned character. The Bee says "the unfortunate young woman was seduced by Pettiway under promise of marriage—a child was the fruit of their intercourse, which is since dead. Pettiway refused to marry her, endeavored to blast her character, and offered her money to be released from his engagement, which she promptly refused, demanding as due to her honor, the fulfilment of his promise. Finding all her endeavors fruitless to obtain reparation, and goaded to desperation by his shameful conduct towards her, she formed the deliberate design to be revenged, and so far accomplished her purpose as we have stated."

The young woman, it is said, is the daughter of respectable parents in this city. [Tribune.

LINES ADDRESSED TO A LITTLE GIRL, ON SENDING HER A BIBLE.

This little book, I send to thee,
God's holy word and true;
May it be precious to thy heart,
And sacred to thy view.

Here may'st thou learn to shun the ills
Of Life's dark, devious way;—
Forget not, thou, God's holy word,
In childhood's sunny day.

Then, Oh! when Time, thy brow hath cross'd
With many a weary care,
Thy heart will turn to yonder page,
And find Hope written there.

And when at last, life's warfare's o'er,
Thy spirit would be free;—
Then turn thy thoughts to God's own word,
Strong, strong to comfort thee.

ONE WORD MORE TO CHRISTIANS ABOUT WAR.

Mr. Editor:—

May I again ask admission to some corner of your paper, whence I may address a few more words to those of your readers who profess to be disciples of Christ?

Christians, let me press the question home upon the reasoning conscience within you. Why have you no more power with God and man? At this age of intellectual development, when mere scientific, mercenary mind has made its power felt throughout the material world, annihilating time and space and taming the lightnings to its will, why have you not secured to the mind that was in Christ Jesus, the mind of the gospel, a sublime ascendency over all principalities and powers, and brought every knee to bow and every tongue to confess to the only name given under heaven by which men, societies and nations may be saved, and human government be made perfect, in its spirit and functions, as that of the great Law-giver of the world is perfect? Why has not the fullness of the Gentiles already come? why has not the fulness of science, come, and all the rulers and dominions of the earth come, to be tributaries and obedient subjects to that King and Kingdom to which they rightfully belong? Why is there to-day one solitary being made in God's image still bowing down to gods which his own hands have made? Why have you not deluged, as it were, the whole world with the light of the gospel, putting a Bible into the hands of every human being on the globe? Why has not the Christian religion that self-diffusing power which, under its primitive apostles, carried its principles almost upon the wings of the wind, self-preaching to the consciences of men, as the power and wisdom of God unto salvation? Are the pagans of to-day incorrigibly idolatrous, than those who bowed to the sceptre of Emanuel in Paul's day? Christians, the Prince of peace, to whom you have some allegiance, will hold you responsible for the present condition of mankind. You have given your power to the Beast, which has so long desolated this world with sin, suffering violence and misery. You have cut away from the religion of Jesus Christ its Sampson locks, its sublimest principles, and despoiled it of almost the only attributes that distinguish it from the religions of the heathen world. Every religion invented by man patronised the lusts, the instincts, the "natural laws," of human nature. The religion of Jesus Christ was given to extirpate those lusts, to subjugate those instincts, to displace those "natural laws" with new laws written by the spirit of God on the human heart. But in your love and leniency to human nature, you have pleaded and prevailed with religion to spare those instincts and lusts, and let them stand above all that is called God, above all the teachings of the Saviour, paramount to all divine revelation. These enthroned, defied lusts and instincts, usurping the place of the highest attitudes of the Christian religion, have reigned for nearly fifteen hundred years, and filled the earth with violence and blood. The Christian era would seem to distinguish a period when the battle breeding lusts of human nature have invented new forms of ferocity and new faculties of destruction, under the stimulus of a more vigorous religion than the old dull, sodden ethics of paganism.

Let us open our eyes to the light, however painful it may be, and confess to the world our folly in crowning our lusts and instincts, and natural laws with the diadem which should sit upon the brow of the Son of God. And, in the docility of honest penitence, let us review the process by which we have been cheated out of our moral strength; by which we have bled out of the religion we profess the great element of its moral power. Christian brother, is there any ambiguity about the mind that was in Christ Jesus? Is there anything that he said or did, from the manger to the cross, which will permit you to put sin against sin, evil against evil, reviling against reviling, and injury against injury, let their natural instincts and spontaneous laws of action dictate what they may? No; you cannot charge the Saviour of mankind with the omission of a single precept or example which was necessary to prohibit his followers from engaging in war of any kind. When he said at Pilate's bar, that his Kingdom was not of this world, he did not say that it was not in and over this world. He did not renounce his title to its sceptre, as king of nations and king of kings. But he said it was not of this world; that it was not founded on its policy, nor inspired with its spirits, nor sustained by its brute and brutalizing force; that his kingdom was his religion, and that it was not of this world, nor of the human heart, nor the creature, nor the subject of its natural instincts, lusts and laws; and therefore the subjects of his kingdom and the disciple of his religion could not fight.

Mr. Editor, I feel myself deeply indebted to your kindness and courtesy for the access you have given me to your columns. I should be very grateful, if you could make room for a few more articles, which I propose to send to you upon this important subject of International Peace, and the duties of Christian citizens with regard to it.

MOTIVES TO THE STUDY OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURES.

As the Bible is the most ancient, so it is the most authentic and instructive of all books. It is our duty, our wisdom and our interest, to be intimately acquainted with it. Among a multitude of reasons which may raise it in our estimation, the following deserve to be seriously considered:—

1. The sacred and inspired book is the most efficacious remedy to cure the evil which is in our own nature, and the most potent antidote to the evil which is in the world. A thousand testimonies on this subject could with facility be recited. Lactantius, one of the ancient fathers, says:—"Give me a man, passionate, slanderous, ungovernable: with a few words of God, I will render him placid as a lamb. Give me a man greedy, avaricious, penurious: I will give him back to you, liberal and lavishing his gold with a munificent hand. Give me a man who shrinks from pain and death: and he shall presently contemn the stake, the gibbet, and the wild beast. Give me one who is libidinous, an adulterer, a debauchee: and you shall see him sober, chaste, and temperate. Give me one cruel and blood-thirsty; and that fury of his shall be corrected into clemency itself. Give me one addicted to injustice, folly and crime; and he shall, without delay, become just, prudent, and harmless."

"Thy word," said David, "have I hid in my heart, that I might not sin against thee." This is a specific, to subdue levity and lust, to allay the fever of ambition, the ferments of anger, and the fretfulness of impatience and discontent. The Christian should ever carry this powerful antidote with him, into the infected regions of the world; for he cannot otherwise be prepared to resist temptation, and repel the contagions influence which a thousand odious customs and pernicious examples are spreading around him. The wholesome words of our Lord Jesus Christ, daily received and incorporated with the inner man, give the moral constitution a tone of vigor, indispensably requisite to all who would escape the corruption that is in the world through lust.

2. The sacred and inspired book is the safest directory and guide in all doubtful matters and difficult cases. There are points of doctrine, which may at times agitate the anxious inquirer, or even the conscientious Christian. And whither shall we look for assistance and direction? It is in vain to look to popes, and counsels, and colleges. We find men of equal ability and learning, piety and zeal, eagerly espousing and temperately maintaining opposite systems. But this is one consolation, we look not, trust not, to fallible leaders, because the Gospel of Christ is our unerring guide. This is the decisive standard to which we must refer, and in matters of doubt, it is far better than all creeds, and confessions, and elaborate books, that ever were written and published. There the perplexed but honest inquirer finds light breaking upon him.

But besides matter of doubt, as to articles of faith, there are cases of difficulty, both with reference to religious discipline and moral conduct. He who is solicitous to do what is right, often hesitates, lest he should take a false step, or trench upon the proper province or part of another man. The Scriptures contain directions and examples, which meet a vast variety of cases; and though many may be expected to arise, for which no explicit precept or precedent can be found, yet general rules are given which can easily be applied to particular circumstances. The Bible is a map, to show the road in which we should go, and settle the wavering mind amidst the intricacies and uncertainties of life. But however profitable the Scriptures may be for doctrine, for reproof, for conviction, and for instruction in righteousness, an intimate acquaintance with them is necessary to attain these ends. "The Bible," says an able divine, "is the source of light and wisdom. Thence we learn, not how to circumnavigate the globe, not how to number and name the stars, or measure their distances: but how to conduct the voyage of life, how to reach beyond the stars, and enter the gates of pearl and the golden streets heaven."

3. The sacred and inspired book furnishes the richest sources of consolation, under the manifold privations and sufferings to which we are subject. "Whatsoever things," saith Paul, "were written aforetime, were written for our learning, that we, through patience and comfort of the Scriptures, might have hope." Here we have exceeding great and precious promises, suited to every condition. Amidst losses, bereavements, vicissitudes, and sorrows, they yield us support and solace. Here we have a healing balm for every wound, and a reviving cordial for fainting nature.—Count Struensee, who had been a vile libertine and hardened infidel, when brought to own and sincerely embrace Christianity, said, "I feel the power of the Gospel in quieting my conscience and reforming my sentiments; and though slight emotions of the passions by which I once was ruled still sometimes disturb me, I find no delight in them, but endeavor immediately to suppress them. I derive all my comforts in my last moments from religion. My temporal prosperity never procured me that true tranquility of mind which I now enjoy in prison and in bonds." Andronicus, seeing the martyrs suffer such grievous things in the cause of God, asked one of them, what it was which enabled him to bear such sufferings. He received for answer, it was that text, "Eye hath not seen nor ear heard, nor hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him." This seasonable word laid hold of his heart, and issued in his conversion, and Andronicus had the honor and the courage to die a martyr to the faith.

The sacred and inspired book supplies the noblest motives to a course of uniform and active benevolence. It is the will of God that we should be employed in alleviating the misery and enlarging the happiness of our fellow-creatures. Selfishness is directly opposite both to the letter and spirit of Christianity. We are commanded, as far as we have opportunity, to do good to all, but especially to them who are of the household of faith. The testimonies and promises of the Gospel inspire the warmest and purest sentiments of benevolence.—They set before us the awful responsibility attached to every talent; they remind us of the brevity and value of time; they make us feel the weight of our obligations to redeeming love and sovereign grace. If we would be alive and active in the labors of charity, we must let the word of Christ dwell in us richly, work in us freely, command and concentrate our thoughts, give a liberal tone and tendency to all our feelings, desires and affections. Every Christian should practically prove himself a servant and follower of Him who went about doing good.

5. The sacred and inspired book imparts the sweetest anticipations of our future bliss. The Elysium painted by pagan poets, and the Paradise by Mahomet, were calculated to gratify a voluptuous and corrupt taste. Oh! how different the prospect of future felicity, presented to us in the last discourse of Christ, as recorded by John the Evangelist! What bright displays are there given of the celestial inheritance, of the mansions of peace and joy prepared for the saints!

And is it possible to read and contemplate the pages which contain these wonderful disclosures with indifference? What! shall men kindle into ardor by the perusal of ingenious fiction, and we remain unmoved, when the Scriptures unfold to us the glories of the heavenly kingdom? No; it is by an intimate and growing acquaintance with the word of God, that our views extend, our consolations increase, our hopes brighten, and our joys refine. Here we have the earnest and foretaste of a bliss, which will be pure as its source and permanent as our souls.

Church Music.

That music held an important place in the Jewish worship, whether in the synagogue or temple, all who have read their Bibles must concede. The Psalms of David were chanted in the temple, and not a few are dedicated to the "chief musician." It is thought by some that "selah," which often occurs, was intended as a direction to the singers.

David had 4000 Levites appointed, under the instruction of 488 masters, or leaders, as musicians and singers.

Then, as now, music possessed a tranquilizing power, as we see by the fact that when David played before Saul, his disturbed and phrenzied mind became calm and tranquil.

That it promoted devotion may be learned also from the case of Elisha, who wished a minstrel played in his presence, before entering upon the work of prophesying. 2 Kings 3: 15.

Nor has it been deemed a less important part of divine worship under the Christian, than the Jewish dispensation. The early Christians sung in all their assemblies for worship, and were directed to do so by the Apostles themselves, who united singing with prayer, even in the prison.

Paul directs Christians in these words—Ephes 5: 19—"Speaking to yourselves in psalms and hymns, and spiritual songs, singing and making melody in your hearts unto the Lord."

And again, "Is any merry? let him sing psalms."

In order that the effect of music be good the music must be good and appropriate. It is absurd to think that choirs, or congregations, who make unearthly jargon, violating all the rules of taste, speaking the words so indistinctly that the congregation cannot understand what they say, paying no attention to pauses, or the expression of the poetry, singing boisterously where they should sing softly, and faintly where they should be full, can edify or benefit a congregation. I have often sympathized with a certain minister, who told his choir they must try again, for he could not preach after such singing. We might as well think mere rants in the sacred desk would edify, as a mere mouthing of poetry for singing.

This the early Christians felt, and hence appointed a class of persons to lead in this part of worship, called "canonical singers." The matter to be sung was submitted to the Bishops, or Presbyters, but all that related to the performance, as an art, was left with the singers. These were appointed merely that abuses might be corrected, and singing conducted with propriety and effect, the whole church joining in this work of praise. (Colman's Christian Antiquities, p. 123.)

When shall we feel the importance of good Church music as we ought? I have heard certain finished singers when all eyes were wet, and a recent visitor to the Mammoth Cave tells us that the sounds of a violin, played by Ole Bull, drew tears from all who heard it. The Hutchinson Family would control the wildest tumult of a mob by the harmony of their united voices.

The same, nay, a more powerful effect, would attend our church singing if it was what it might be. In our social meetings we sing words without meaning, or sentiment, in tunes without melody—and then talk about singing in the spirit.

Signs from the South.—A Cincinnati friend writes to us that a man has lately arrived in Cincinnati, bringing four slaves from Mississippi, whom he intends to set free, educate, and settle on a farm. He states that there is a strong and growing sentiment against slavery, in the portion of Mississippi where he resided, and he has no doubt that many of his neighbors will follow his example, by emancipating and educating their slaves. Our friend also mentions the recent arrival of thirty emancipated slaves from South Carolina.

Mordecai's triumph over Haman.

There was once a great king whose name was Ahasuerus, and he reigned from India to Ethiopia, over a hundred and seven and twenty provinces. Throughout his country were scattered a few people called Jews, who had been taken from Jerusalem in their own country, and carried captive into that. In Shushan, where the king lived, one of these Jews also lived, whose name was Mordecai, and with him lived a very handsome young girl, whose name was Hadassah; she was Mordecai's uncle's daughter, and when her father and mother were both dead, Mordecai took her and brought her up for his own daughter. He was very good to do this, and so she was not only very handsome, but was very good also, and that is better than mere beauty.

It came to pass that in one of the king's fits of drinking wine, he got mad at his wife the queen, because she would not mind him, and he put her away, and afterwards took Hadassah for his wife and to be the royal queen. Mordecai used to set at the king's gate, and it came to pass that two of the king's servants who kept the door were angry at the king, and agreed to lay hands upon him and kill him as he should pass, but Mordecai heard what they said, and he wrote it and sent it to Hadassah his adopted daughter, who had got to be queen, and she sent the same to the king, stating that it was Mordecai who told her that the king's life was in danger. This the king caused to be written in a book, so that it might not be forgotten that Mordecai had done him good.

There was a very proud and wicked man whose name was Haman, and he was made very honorable by the king, and all the king's servants that were about the gate were required to bow down when he passed by. But Mordecai, who still sat at the king's gate, refused to bow before Haman. We think he must have been some like our old fashioned Quakers, who will not pull their hats off for any body. Haman was dreadfully vexed at the conduct of Mordecai, and determined to destroy him. But he thought himself too great a man to destroy one poor old Jew, and so he thought to destroy the whole race of the Jews in the kingdom. He went and misrepresented them to the king, and obtained his decree that all the Jews might be killed in one day. When this was known, Mordecai rent his clothes, and put on sackcloth and ashes, and came even unto the king's gate. He also sent word to the queen what was determined against them, and that she should go in before the king and supplicate for their lives. Now in those days the queen did not appear in the presence of the king, unless she was sent for, and there was a law that if any person appeared before the king in the inner court uncalled for, he should be put to death, unless the king should hold out the golden sceptre that they might touch it.

This Hadassah sent to Mordecai for an answer, and as her reason for not going before the king. But Mordecai urged her, by saying that they would be delivered in some other way if she would not speak to the king, and that she and her father's house, that is, all her relations, would be destroyed. He also intimated to her that it was the design of God in raising her to the throne, to be queen, that she should deliver them at that time. She then sent word to him to fast with all the Jews three days, and that she would fast, and then she would go in before the king and see if he would hold out the sceptre to her. On the third day she put on her royal dress and went in to the inner court before the king as he was seated upon his royal throne. It was an awful time, for she did not know whether he would hold out the golden sceptre to her, and if he did not she must be killed. But when the king lifted up his eyes and saw her, he was pleased, and held out the sceptre, and she approached and touched it. You can see this represented in the picture. The king is reaching out the sceptre to her, and she is in the act of touching it. Then the king said unto her, "What is thy request? and it shall be given thee, even to the half of my kingdom." The queen did not then tell him what she desired, but invited him and Haman to come to a feast she had made for them. At the feast the king made to Hadassah the same offer, but she did not tell him what she wanted, but requested him and Haman to come and feast with her again the next day, and then she would make her request.

When Haman went out from the feast he was grieved because Mordecai would not rise, or honor him as he passed the gate, and after consulting with his friends, it was agreed that a gallows should be prepared seventy-five feet high, and that Haman should speak to the king and have Mordecai hanged on it before the feast the next day.

That night the king could not sleep. We suppose God disturbed him, because he had a great deliverance to work through him to save Mordecai and the Jews. Because he could not sleep he caused the book to be read, and the place was read where it was written what Mordecai had done to save the king's life, and when he learned that nothing had been done for him, he was resolved to reward him. At this moment Haman entered the outward court, to speak to the king to have Mordecai hanged, while the king's heart was devising how he might honor him. "Who is in the court?" said the king. It was answered that Haman was standing in the court, and the king ordered him called in. Then said the king to him, "What shall be done unto the man whom the king delighteth to honor?" Haman thought the king would honor him before any other man, and he answered, that the man whom the king delighteth to honor shall be clothed in the king's apparel and have the royal crown put on his head, and be seated on the king's horse, and be taken through the streets of the city by one of the king's most royal princes, who should cry, thus shall it be done unto the man whom the king delighteth to honor. Then the king ordered Haman to do this to Mordecai, whom he wished to hang. This was a dreadful disappointment, but he had to do it.

When they came again to the second banquet which the queen made, the king said again, "What is thy petition? and it shall be granted thee." Then the queen said, "let my life be given me at my petition, and my people at my request, for we are sold, I and my people to be slain and to be destroyed." Then the king said, "who is he and where is he that durst presume to do so?" And the queen answered, "it is this wicked Haman." And one said unto the king, behold also the gallows fifty cubits high which Haman hath prepared for Mordecai, who hath done good unto the king. Then the king commanded that Haman should be hanged on that gallows.

Tobacco—Spit it out.

'Johnny, Johnny,' cried a little fellow, about a foot and a half high, as he ran down the street to his companions, 'Johnny, see, I've got a piece of tobacco.'

'Why, my little man,' said I, 'do you chew tobacco?'

'Yes,' said he, brustling up with much importance.

'And why? to make yourself sick?'

'O no, it don't make me sick.'

'Well, do you chew it to make your teeth white?'

'No.' (His teeth were dirty and yellow.)

'To make your breath sweet?'

'No.'

'To make a man of yourself?'

'No.'

'Then why do you chew it?'

The little fellow seemed quite at a loss for an answer. At last he managed to mutter out,

'I chew it for fun.'

Boys, if you should offer tobacco to a dog or a pig, they would refuse it—it is too nasty for them. A dirty baboon, I believe, is about the only animal that will take it into the mouth, and I am not certain but it makes even a baboon sick.

Now where is the boy that will put a poisonous weed into his mouth, and grind it over and over, like the cud of an ox—a weed that is so vile, that a dog and a swine turn away from it with disgust. Spit it out, if you have commenced the hurtful habit. Never again make a tobacco still of your mouth, or a smoke pipe for nauseous fumes of your nose; neither cram it with irritating and sickening powder, until your voice is as thick and wheezy as an asthma. 'Touch not, taste not, handle not.'

A Call from India.

A missionary in India, now in this country for the recovery of his health and that of his wife, thus writes:

"Our hearts yearn to resume our labors in India. We are hoping to go out in the spring. I hope you may have missionaries in your Sabbath Schools. We want a thousand for India to-day! Yes, a thousand men and thousand women can enter into most hopeful fields, at the present time, in India. Where are they?" We would ask the 60,000 or 80,000 children and youth in the schools connected with the Mass. S. S. Society, Where are they? Will not many of our readers say, "Here are we, send us?" and begin to prepare themselves for this work, and devote their lives to it? [Well Spring.

GREAT REWARD.—Several years since, the Massachusetts Sunday School Society made a large donation of books to the Sunday School Association of Marietta College. These books were very gratefully acknowledged, and were the means of giving new impulse to the 20 or 25 schools under their care. We have recently seen one of the former members of this Association, who used to conduct one of these schools, which was twelve miles from the College. He says those schools will never lose the happy influence of that donation, and that nearly every one of them is now sharing in the glorious revival with which God is graciously visiting Marietta and the country around. What a blessed reward for the little effort it cost to furnish the means of giving interest and permanency to those schools! And who will not be encouraged, by this fact to engage with new zeal in contributing to this object? [Wellspring.

WHAT CONSTITUTES A CALL TO THE MINISTRY?

An Essay read before the East N. J. Ministerial Conference.

BY ELD. WALTER B. GILLETT.

In presenting before my brethren this essay, I am not entirely insensible, that you have made it a subject of thought and deep investigation; for no man can enter upon the work of the gospel ministry himself, without making the inquiries—Am I called of God?—and, What are my evidences? As gospel ministers, we have much to do with this subject; for we are not only to instruct our brethren in the great doctrines of the Bible, but we are to search out the gifts in the Church, and use our influence to place them right, that there be no disunion nor schism in the body. And as there are various gifts in the Church, and various stations to be occupied, it is needful that we possess much wisdom, that we may not misplace the various members of the body, and thus attempt to make a leg of an arm, or a head of a foot, but that due honor be bestowed upon all.

I suppose all will at once admit, that to be a successful gospel minister it is needful that one be called of God, "as was Aaron." But there may be differences of opinion in reference to this call. It is important that we properly, understand our duty in this respect. There can be no doubt that many young men of talents and piety, who might have been of great service to the Church if they had acted in the sphere for which they were qualified, have, by taking upon themselves the office of the ministry, almost entirely lost their influence, and become a reproach to the cause. On the other hand, there are doubtless some whose duty it was to sound the gospel of salvation to perishing sinners, who have been kept back from this holy employment by not properly understanding what constitutes a call to the gospel ministry. A mistake on either side is very injurious to the cause of religion. For those who have undertaken this employment uncalled have by their want of wisdom and prudence, proved stumbling-blocks to sinners; and instead of winning them to Christ, have fastened them more strongly to the world. And those who ought to have been engaged in this work, but have neglected it, are often regarded by the unconverted as backsliders, and therefore proved a barrier to their embracing the gospel of Christ.

It is not wise in us to look back to the days of the prophets, and expect calls similar to what they had in order to enter upon this work; for in their day the canon of Scripture was not complete, and God spoke by his heavenly messengers, and in the visions of the night. It is not enough for us to believe that an angel has spoken to us. Various are satan's efforts, and if he can disarrange the order of God's house, his object is half accomplished. "Satan may transform himself into an angel of light," and may address us as a heavenly messenger, and thus lead us astray. But in this favored day "we have a more sure word of Prophecy." "In these last days, God hath spoken unto us by his Son." I have not the least doubt that a person may persuade himself that God has sent an angel and thus satisfied him that he is called, when the very evidences in the case show that the man, though honest, is deceived. Is not the wisdom of God paramount to the wisdom of man? Would you act so unwisely as to assign duties to your children to which they were not adapted? Would you set your son to follow the plough, if he was unable to do it? Would you employ a man as a teacher of your children, who was a novice, and had no disposition to learn? No. Let us then adopt the wise rule that we will not lay careless hands on ignorant sculls, that cannot teach and will not learn.

Some have supposed that they were called to this work from the singular dreams with which their heads have been troubled. If a man must engage in that business about which he dreams, this world would be thrown into a strange dilemma. To dream of preaching may be an evidence that the subject has occupied a place in our minds during our wakeful moments; but it is not an evidence that God has called us to this work, any more than for a man to dream of being a statesman would entitle him to the office. "He that hath a dream, let him tell a dream; but he that hath my word, let him speak my word faithfully." If God had not committed the various gifts to the disposal of the Church, we might look for some such miraculous events to lead men in the path of duty, that they may be useful in the Church. But we must believe, that our duty is measured by our capacity, and that our heavenly father will not lay upon us burthens, which we are unable to bear.

Providential misfortunes are supposed by some to be an evidence that they are called to this work. To this we must object. We are disposed to look at such misfortunes differently from those who suppose that it is in order to teach a man his duty to preach, that God has killed his cattle, blasted the fruits of his field, brought upon him bankruptcy, or sent disease and death upon his children and family. If this is the way that we are to come into the work, we must suppose that there has been a change since the apostles' days; for we have no reason to doubt that they were prospered in their business until they left it for the more noble employment of winning souls to Christ. Therefore, instead of being an evidence of a call to the ministry, such occurrences rather prove the inability of the person to engage in such a work. For, if they prove incompetent to manage their own affairs, we should conclude that the concerns of the Church ought not to be entrusted to them.

A love for souls, and the Bible, and the frequent impression of passages of Scripture upon the mind, are to some men evidences that they are called to this work. But here we would again refer you to the devices of satan. No person has ever possessed more love to souls than satan has pretended to; and although a man may possess love that will lead him to sacrifice his all, yet of itself it is not an evidence that he is called to this great work. Says the apostle, "Though I give all my goods to feed the poor, and have not charity, I am but sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal." It is our opinion, that every member of the church should possess the same love for souls as the minister of the Cross—(which would be but loving our neighbor as ourselves)—and that he should exert his faculties, and influence to save souls from death, as much as though he were a minister of God. And certainly the Bible must be loved by all, and its truths obeyed. As this alone is the religion of Protestants, without note or comment, if we reject its teachings, we show an unfitness to fill any station, high or low. If we are not ready to adhere to the entire teachings of the Holy Ghost, we are yet doing away God's commandments by our own traditions Hence a man may love the Bible better than his life, and not be called to officiate in the ministry.

Some have taken it as an evidence that they must preach, because passages of Scripture frequently occur to their minds such as the following:—"Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" "Go and preach the preaching that I bid thee." "Go into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature." Such passages as these must frequently occur to the mind of every Bible reader, for it was not only consistent for Saul of Tarsus to inquire of the Lord, but it is the duty of every Christian, that he may know his will, and be able to say, "In doing the will of the Lord there is great reward." Satan himself is not a stranger to Bible language. If it suits his purpose he can quote Scripture. In the days of the apostles, the Church was thus distracted; and he still exerts the same influence. We do not wish to oppose the propriety of the frequent occurrence of Scripture passages to the mind. God forbid. Would that it were more frequent; yea, that it occupied our entire thoughts. But we contend that this should not be received as an invariable evidence that we must preach the gospel.

If satan fails to make the Christian neglect his duty, he will then not unfrequently persuade him to go beyond his duty, and attempt to fill a station that he can only disgrace. A Christian desires to do all that he can to promote the cause of religion, and he may forget that there are many stations in the Church that may be occupied to advantage. He may look forward to the ministry as the only place in which he can glorify God. Under this impression, he may enter upon the ministry, and soon he loses his influence, then his confidence, and through this means the cause may be brought into reproach. Not unfrequently these individuals go forth relying upon the promised protection of Christ, "Lo I am with you always;" and when they fail in their attempts, they charge it upon the wickedness of the Church, whereas the truth is, they have ventured upon unpromised protection, as much as it would have been for our Saviour to have listened to the voice of satan, and to have cast himself down from the pinnacle of the temple, because "it was written, he shall give his angels charge concerning thee, and in their hands they shall bear thee up, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone." Anxiety upon any subject has a tendency to suggest to the mind all our knowledge concerning it. Let a person be deeply engaged in revolving in his mind the duty of preaching, and what is more natural than to suppose that the above passages of Scripture, and others, would occur often to the mind. We do not mean to say, that those who are actually called to the work have no such thoughts, but simply that these suggestions have nothing to do in establishing that call.

But the question will naturally arise, Are there no evidences of a call to the ministry? As we believe there is no need of deception on this point, and that there are true evidences of a call to the gospel ministry, we hasten to state some of them.

1. In the first place, is the man who thinks he is called to preach, a pious man, and able to bring in subjection his whole body? That piety is necessary, all orthodox Protestants admit; and that self-government is necessary, we see from daily observation, and from the history of the past. Nothing has done more to clog the wheels of salvation, than the influence of those ministers who have sought retaliation, and have not learned how, if smitten on one cheek, to turn the other also. It is wrong to put men into the ministry, who cannot, or will not, bear reproach. If a man cannot bear all things, and endure all things, for the truth's sake, he ought to be exceedingly jealous of himself. That humble and devout Christian, who if he is reviled reviles not again, and possessing the other qualifications of a minister, enters upon his duties, proves himself to be worthy of the station; he cares for the flock, and not for the fleece; he is a blessing to the churches, and an ornament to society and the age in which he lives. Nothing strengthens the unbelief of the infidel more than to see a minister who is controlled by his passions and thus at times led captive by satan at his will.

2. Again, he must have a desire for the work, and a wish to be thus employed. It is needful that such a person should count well the cost; and if this is done, no one will presume to engage in the work from worldly motives. They must be constrained by the love of Christ and souls. Says D. D. Scott—"Three things induced me to enter upon the ministry. 1. That I might apply myself to reading, of which I was inordinately fond. 2. That I might with ease procure a livelihood. 3. That I might be more conspicious in the literary world. And I testified, (he says,) that I was internally moved upon by the Holy Ghost to take that office upon me, when I did not so much as believe that there was a Holy Ghost." A person may thus enter upon the ministry; he may receive the alms of the multitude; his talents may be applauded; but still, if he is not a meek and lowly Christian, he is a stranger to the peace that Paul and Silas felt when in the prison they prayed and sung praises to God. His heart must be moved with compassion for sinners, and his desire must be to persuade them to be reconciled to God. He must feel his soul so drawn out that he cannot conscientiously, whatever his circumstances may be, engage in any other business, to the neglect of his ministerial calling. He should be willing to part with all prospects of emolument, and forego all worldly advantages for the sake God's glory and the good of his fellow men. These are some of the feelings that we suppose will occupy the heart of a man who is really called to engage in the work of the ministry. Of these feelings he only knows; and as to these inward evidences, of course he only can judge. If a person has strong permanant feelings like these, they will evidence themselves to the church by the fruits brought forth.

3. A man thus entering upon the work of the ministry, must possess suitable gifts. We do not suppose, that under the present dispensation he should be fully qualified to preach at once. But that he possess good natural talents is indispensably necessary. To this must be added all the Christian graces. It is needful that he apply himself to study, that his mind may be stored with adequate knowledge, and that he may learn how to communicate with profit that knowledge to others. By suitable gifts, we mean the talent to communicate to others what he himself knows—a sound understanding—a capacity and an ardent desire to learn. He must be apt to teach, not by the use of high-flown, imprudent, unmeaning language, but by his wisdom, prudence, and simplicity—adapting his instructions to the capacity of his hearers, and laboring daily to cultivate his mind as much as circumstances will allow. Says one writer upon this subject—"Of these points the individuals themselves are not judges—their brethren must judge for them. The church has a duty to perform. She ought to watch the character and conduct of her young men. An individual whom God designs for the ministry, will show his talent and the bent of his disposition, by his zeal for the support of the institutions of the church, by his exhortations, and by his spirited and fervent prayers. If the ministerial spirit exists within him, it will find no difficulty from the want of an opportunity to display itself. And in most cases a church is satisfied with the call of a brother to this work sooner than he is himself."

These are a few of the principal things which, in our opinion, constitute a call to the gospel ministry. Of the competency of an individual to this office, the church alone is to judge. But the church is not at all times in a situation to judge properly of her own gifts, which we think is apparant from her present disarrangement. If not, why are not her gifts brought forth and improved? Where is the gift of exhortation, that is so peculiarly calculated to comfort the afflicted, to strengthen the feeble, and to alarm the careless. It is either presented in the character of the minister, or else buried in a napkin. At the present day, the gift of exhortation is seldom found. Was it so in the days of the apostles? Will it be thus when the church shall enter upon her millennial glory? No. The instruction of the Apostle will then be heeded—"Ye see your calling brethren."

Let the principle be taught and imbibed, that each station in the church is equally honorable; that it is as much an honor to be a door-keeper, as to be the steward of the house; and then we shall no longer be saying to the hand or the foot, I have no need of thee; but we shall know that each gift in the church is equally necessary for the perfecting of the body of Christ. Then the church will no longer be at a loss how to arrange and dispose of her gifts; but he that exhorteth will wait upon his exhortation; he that ministers will wait on his ministry. No longer then will the voice of contention about who shall be greatest be heard among the precious sons of Zion. Experience will then teach us, that to be great we must be good, and that only the man who is truly good is truly great.

In conclusion, we would say, that the man to whom God has committed a preaching talent is called to preach; and that the man who is destitute of this, is destitute of the call; for our heavenly Father does lay upon us burdens that we are unable to bear.

THE FORLORN.

BY JAMES RUSSEL LOWELL.

The night is dark, the stinging sleet,
Swept by the bitter gusts of air,
Drives whistling down the lonely street,
And stiffens on the pavement bare.

The street-lamps flare and struggle dim
Through the white sleet-clouds as they pass,
Or, governed by a boisterous whim,
Drop down and rattle on the glass.

One poor, heart-broken, out-cast girl
Faces the east-wind's searching flaws,
And, as about her heart they whirl,
Her tattered cloak more tightly draws.

The flat brick walls look cold and bleak,
Her bare feet to the side-walk freeze;
Yet dares she not a shelter seek,
Though faint with hunger and disease.

The sharp storm cuts her forehead bare,
And piercing through her garments thin,
Benes in sin and shame, finds there
Makes colder the cold heart within.

She lingers where a ruddy glow
Streams outward through an open shutter,
Giving more bitterness to woe,
More loneness to desertion utter.

One half the cold she had not felt,
Until she saw this gush of light
Spread warmly forth, and seem to melt
Its slow way through the deadening night.

She hears a woman's voice within,
Singing sweet words her childhood knew,
And years of misery and sin,
Furl off and leave her heaven blue.

Her freezing heart, like one who sinks,
Outwearied in the drifting snow,
Drowses to deadly sleep, and thinks
No longer of its hopeless woe:

Old fields, and clear blue summer days,
Old meadows, green with grass and trees,
That shimmer through the trembling haze
And whiten in the western breeze,—

Old faces,—all the friendly past
Rises within her heart again,
And sunshine from her childhood cast,
Makes summer of the icy rain.

Enhaloed by a mild, warm glow,
From all humanity apart,
She hears old footsteps wandering slow,
Through the lone chambers of her heart.

Outside the porch before the door,
Her cheek upon the cold, hard stone,
She lies, no longer foul and poor,
No longer dreary and alone.

Next morning, something heavily
Against the opening door did weigh,
And there, from earthly anguish free,
A woman on the threshold lay.

And looks of pity, not of scorn,
Beamed on her from a weeping band,

PETER WALDO.

MISSIONARY SPIRIT IN THE DARK AGES.

"On a certain occasion, whilst in company with a number of distinguished citizens, one of the company suddenly fell down dead. This solemn occurrence produced a great effect upon the mind of Peter, as did that of the loss of a friend by lightning upon the mind of Luther. But Peter, owing to the religious instruction which he had received in his native valleys, instead of retiring, as Luther did, to a monastery, or of founding one with his great wealth, acted in just such a manner as one might expect from his origin. He consecrated his wealth to the service of God in the propagation of the Gospel. He became remarkably charitable to the poor; he preached the Gospel himself; caused the Scriptures to be translated into the language of the people; and circulated many copies. These efforts were regarded with favor by the great Head of the Church. His spirit was poured out, and a great many souls were brought to the knowledge of the truth. This enabled Peter to organize a goodly number into a band of missionaries, whom he sent forth to carry the Gospel into all parts of France, into Flanders, Germany, Poland, Bohemia, Austria, and Hungary. In this way the truth gained in a few years a wonderful extension. Peter himself, as De Thou informs us, leaving his own country, went into Belgium; and in Picardy, as they now call the province, obtained many followers; and passing thence into Germany, he long sojourned among the Vandalic states, and finally settled in Bohemia; where those, who, at the present day, embrace his doctrine, are, on that account, called Picards.

"Here we see one of the most remarkable missionary movements that have every occurred.—These humble propagators of the Gospel went forth two by two, supported at the outset by the contributions of the brethren at Lyons, but relying mainly on what they might obtain from those who might be willing to receive the truth from their lips. On account of their poverty, they were every where called 'the poor men of Lyons.' * * *

"There was nothing more remarkable about the early Waldenses than their missionary spirit. This, we have just said, characterized the followers of Peter Waldo. But the same spirit pervaded all the people of the same faith, wherever they lived, in those dark ages, and by whatever name they were called, Vaudois, Paulicians, Patarins, Cathari, Leonist, Lollards, Albigenses, Poor Men of Lyons, etc. It was by sending out missionaries, two by two, on foot, to visit their brethren dispersed in France, the north of Spain, Flanders, England, Germany, Poland, Bohemia, Hungary, Croatia, Dalmatia, and Italy, that they kept alive the little piety which existed in the world at that day. These missionaries knew where to find their brethren; they went to their houses, held little meetings, administered the ordinances, ordained deacons, and sustained the faith and hopes of the tempted and persecuted ones. It is said that these missionaries could go, at one period, from Cologne to Florence, and stay every night at the houses of brethren. It is on account of the great number of missionaries which these little and poor churches in the valleys sustained, that we read of there being sometimes one hundred and forty or fifty ministers at the meetings of their synods. But few of these were needed at home; the most were engaged in the foreign work.

"It is also remarkable that almost all the men whom God raised up from time to time in France and other countries, for more than six hundred years before the Reformation, seem to have had more or less to do with the Waldenses; such as Peter Waldo, Peter Bruys, Henry of Lausanne, Lollard—who labored with so much zeal to diffuse the truth in England, and who was buried at Cologne.

"But not only did the preachers go out from the valleys to proclaim the glorious gospel, but humble pious pedlers, itinerating merchants, of whom there were many in the middle ages, scattered the truth by carrying some leaves of the Word of Life, or some manuscript tracts, beneath their merchandize, which they engaged those whom they found to be favorably disposed to receive and read." HOW TO PROFIT BY PREACHING.

(A paragraph from the excellent writings of Hugh White.)

If you desire to obtain profit to your soul from your attendance on the ministry of the word, and this be your object in going to the house of God, go in full confidence, that let who will deliver God's message, it is only the Holy Spirit that can bring it with power to your heart; that if Paul were to return to earth, or the angel Gabriel to descend from heaven, to proclaim to you the message of redeeming love, or enforce the holy precepts of the gospel of salvation, even their ministry would be profitable, only so far as it was made so by the accompanying blessing of the Spirit; and that that same Spirit could make the ministrations of the weakest servant of the Saviour as efficacious, in conveying spiritual strength, joy and consolation to your soul, as those of the chief of the apostles, or the loftiest of the seraphim around the throne of God.

If in penitential confession your heart has poured out its sorrow for sin; if in the supplications for spiritual mercies your soul has breathed its desires; if in the ascriptions of praise you have blessed the Lord, making melody in your heart unto him; then indeed you may listen to the word preached with an humble assurance of reaping a rich harvest of spiritual good, because you then depend on the promised blessing of the Spirit to accompany his word, and bring it home to your heart in all its invigorating, purifying and gladdening influences.

LUTHER'S OPINION OF PERFECTION.

Brother, it is not possible for thee to become so righteous in this life that thou shouldst feel no sin at all, that thy body should be clear like the sun, without spot or blemish, but thou hast as yet wrinkles and spots, and yet thou art holy notwithstanding. But thou wilt say, how can I be holy, when I have and feel sin in me? I answer, in that thou dost feel and acknowledge thy sin; it is a good token; give thanks unto God and despair not. It is one step of health, when the sick man doth acknowledge and confess his imfirmity. But how shall I be delivered from sin? Run to Christ, the physician which healeth them that are afflicted in heart, and saveth sinners. Follow not the judgement of reason, which telleth thee that he is angry with sinners. If thou believe, thou art righteous, because thou giveth glory unto God, that he is Almighty, merciful, true, &c. thou justifieth and praiseth God. To be brief, thou yieldest unto him his divinity, and whatsoever else belongeth unto him. And the sin that remaineth in thee is not laid to thy charge, but is pardoned for Christ's sake, in whom thou believest, who is perfectly just; whose righteousness is thy righteousness, and thy sin his sin.

SMALL MATTERS.—The nerve of a tooth, not as large as the finest cambric needle, will sometimes drive a strong man to distraction. A musquito can make an elephant absolutely mad. The coral rock, causing a navy to founder, is the work of worms. The warrior that withstood death in a thousand forms may be killed by an insect. The deepest wretchedness results from a perpetual continuance of petty trials. A chance look from those we love, often produces exquisite pain or unalloyed pleasure.

RECIPROCAL DUTIES OF A CHURCH AND MINISTER.

Among the evils under the sun, we have noticed one which is quite common and exceedingly hurtful, yet but seldom spoken of. It is the separation of a minister from his church for want of support, while at the same time his church is allowed to remain uninstructed in respect to the duty of giving him a support. Cases of this kind are frequently occurring, and they naturally suggest the question, What course ought a minister to pursue when the church for which he labors neglects to supply his wants?

Few persons can be found in this day, who deny altogether the duty of churches to make provision for those who minister to them in spiritual things. Most people can see easily enough, that the man who spends his time and strength to advance the religious interests of a community, has not that time and strength to provide for his temporal wants; and they can see with equal ease, that the church or community asking his labors, in whatever way that request is made, becomes obligated to a certain extent for his support. Hence the duty is generally acknowledged, whether it is promptly discharged or not. Indeed it is difficult to see how any one who bears the Christian name can think for a moment of denying the duty. Before he can do so, he must certainly forget the doctrine of his Saviour, that "the laborer is worthy of his hire," and the doctrine of the apostle, that it is no great thing for those who have sown unto their brethren spiritual things, to reap of their carnal things. He must forget also, that under the old economy, when God set apart a portion of the people to minister exclusively in sacred things, he commanded that they should be supported by those who had charge of the secular affairs. Under the new dispensation the very same relation exists between the pastor and the people, even as taught by Paul when he says, "Do ye not know that they which minister about holy things, live of the things of the temple? and they which wait at the altar, are partakers of the altar? Even so hath the Lord ordained, that they which preach the gospel should live of the gospel." Most Christians find it impossible to forget these things if they would; and hence they acknowledge that it is the duty of each church to support its minister.

Now after the church as a body has acknowledged this duty, the minister often finds himself perplexed to know what is his duty. He has perhaps settled down in some neighborhood by particular request, and commenced laboring as a minister; has continued his labors for months, or even years, and yet finds the people so negligent about supporting, him that he is in absolute want. What shall he do? Shall he abandon the field which he has begun to cultivate, and in which he sees some encouragement of a good harvest in future, for a field which promises to pay better? Or, shall he leave the work of the ministry and enter upon a business which will enable him to provide for his wants as other men? Or, shall he hold on in the midst of poverty and actual suffering, while his brethren around him have enough and to spare? Such questions as these are often exceedingly difficult to decide, and not unfrequently the decision of them exposes a minister to the most unpleasant charges from those who know little of his circumstances or motives. Undoubtedly the easiest way to dispose of the matter would be, either to change the field of his labor, or enter upon some other business. But would this be right in the sight of God, and healthful in its influence upon the church? We think circumstances alone will enable a man to decide in any particular case. If the failure to give him an adequate support results from an intelligent and deliberate determination, in the face of duty, not to do it, we see no other way than for him either to change his place or his employment.

But there are many influences at work calculated to prevent churches from understanding and feeling their obligation, which the minister ought to take into account before proceeding to the last step. If he has not taken these into account, and has not done what he could to counteract them, the fault may rest in part with him as well as with the church. Let us refer to some of these influences.

In the first place, many churches regard the sum they have stipulated to their pastor, or given him encouragement of receiving, as a sort of gratuity, and not as a debt which they owe him. When the time comes for payment, they feel at liberty to discuss again the question whether they ought to give so much. In not a few cases, they find it somewhat inconvenient to pay what they have subscribed, and either neglect it for a long time, or set it aside entirely. Of course no apology can be made for such a proceeding; yet it may sometimes be met with where there is no thought of defrauding or deceiving.

Again, many churches have a vague impression that there is something a little out of the way in paying a man for preaching the gospel. Perhaps some pious preacher whose ministry they enjoyed long ago, fearing the evils which have in certain cases resulted from paying large salaries, may have proclaimed against it until the people partly believe his doctrine. In such circumstances, they may have forgotten that the minister is a man of like passions with themselves, and half concluded that as he was engaged in a spiritual work, so he might live upon spiritual food and raiment.

Still again, ministers themselves have often been culpably negligent or diffident about giving instruction upon this subject. There are many who, from a view of its personal bearings, or from a fear lest they should be thought too careful about the loaves and fishes, have studiously avoided any allusion to the subject. They have not, it is true, allowed their hearers to remain in ignorance of the general duty, but they have failed to make a practical application of the matter in their own case. Very differen. from this was the course of Paul, who contended most earnestly for the principle that the laborer is worthy of his hire, and who, when he saw fit for good reasons to forego his privilege, still maintained his right to a recompense for his labor.

If from either of these influences the churches have been prevented from understanding and doing their duty, it is the minister's business to instruct and endeavor to reform them. In most cases we believe that success will crown faithful efforts for this object. But whether it should or should not, his duty will be done, and he will be prepared to decide upon the course which he ought to pursue. We believe it to be as much the duty of an organized church to provide for maintaining the institutions of the gospel in its midst, as it is the duty of a preacher to proclaim the gospel. And we think furthermore, that in cases where a church deliberately and intelligently refuses to do its duty in this respect, a minister may not only be at the liberty, but under obligation, to testify against them by withdrawing from them. The church and the ministry have each their appropriate duties, and a failure of either is inconsistent with the health of the body.

REV. DR. EDWARDS ON THE SABBATH.

"The Rev. Dr. Edwards then addressed a large audience, on 'the Christian Sabbath.' He said it is not good for man to be without knowledge, especially the knowledge of God and Jesus Christ, and took the ground that the Sabbath was a sign by which we might know God. If the Sabbath had always been kept, as God kept the Sabbath when he rested from his labors, which was 'the pattern Sabbath,' all nations would have known the Lord, and idolatry would never have been known. This was giving a prominence and importance to the Sabbath, which many refuse to give it. Dr. Edwards showed, very clearly, that God established the Sabbath, not to injure, but to benefit man, and that there was not a man but needed the Sabbath. He also showed clearly that Sabbath breaking led to all other transgressions, opening the flood gates of vice. 'How many murderers were not Sabbath breakers? Who knows one? Who was he? When was the murder committed?' He said that of 100 men committed to the Massachusetts State Prison in a year, 89 of them were Sabbath breakers. Some of them went to the stables and hired horses, and took a Sabbath-day ride; some went aboard the steamboat, and some rode in the cars, with all those who wish to break the Sabbath; and so they went on, till they committed some crime, for which they were shut up in prison. He urged on all present the importance of a holy observance of the Sabbath; for unless we thus observe it, we cannot transmit it to others."

☞ We clip the above paragraph from a newspaper report of the proceedings of the General Conference of Maine. Dr. Edwards was there surrounded by men of his own school, and might of course say what he pleased without fear of contradiction or scrutiny. But it strikes us, that if there had been a person present who did not believe in the common notion respecting the sacredness of the first day of the week, he might have asked the Doctor several questions which it would puzzle him exceedingly to answer.

Dr. Edwards takes the ground, in the first place, that the Sabbath which God kept when he rested from his labors was the pattern Sabbath, and that if it had always been rightly kept all nations would have known the Lord and idolatry would never have been known. Now a candid inquirer, in view of this assertion, would naturally ask, On what day, and for what reason, was that pattern Sabbath kept? And he would find, that it was kept on the seventh day, and for the reason that in it God rested from all his work. Again, he would inquire, What day does Dr. Edwards exhort us to keep, and for what reason? And he would find, that Dr Edwards exhorts us to keep the first day, and for the reason that in it Christ rose from the dead. Here then he would find the Doctor changing both the day and the reason for its observance, and yet making a great flourish about the "pattern Sabbath." In such circumstances, his third and last inquiry would naturally be, Do you take us to be stupid, Dr. Edwards, or shall we take you to be so, when you urge us, in view of the pattern Sabbath, to keep a day which has nothing in common with the pattern? It is hard to believe, that the men who profess so much regard for the observance of the Sabbath and the glory of God, would deliberately and knowingly palm off upon the public false and deceitful arguments. Yet when they continue to repeat them, as they do in support of the first day, after having been once and again rebuked, what else can we think? We would not unnecessarily say hard things about any man; but when we hear a man talk about the duty of keeping the pattern Sabbath, and know that on the very next return of that day he will be engaged in his ordinary work, we own ourselves unable to explain the matter except by supposing that he knows how deliberately to eat up his own words.

Again, Dr. Edwards tells us that Sabbath-breaking leads to all other transgressions. This is a kind of special pleading which is quite common among the advocates for any particular and partial reform. One lecturer tells us that intemperance leads to all other transgressions; another that gambling does it; and a third that licentiousness, or profane swearing, or wilful lying, does it. But Dr. Edwards knows, or ought to know, that the state of heart which leads to Sabbath-breaking, leads also to lying, and swearing, and intemperance; and that, therefore, there is no propriety in charging all these evils upon some single form of transgression. The corruption of the human heart is the real cause of transgression; and the only way to cure that, is by applying the law of God in simplicity and power. Let this be done in regard to the Sabbath, and let those who apply the law practice consistently, and it will have more influence to promote the sanctification of the Sabbath, than all the state-prison statistics or physicians' certificates, which the Doctor ever has collected, or ever can collect.

THE CROSS ON TRINITY CHURCH.

There has been not a little speculation in certain circles, as to what would give the finishing touch to the lofty spire of the new Trinity Church, New York. This question was settled a few days since, by the erection of a large gilt cross to surmount the whole structure. Of course the selection of such a symbol has called forth numerous expressions of approval or disapproval. Episcopalians of the high-church party regard it with deep satisfaction as a triumph of the spirit which they desire to see prevail, while those of the low-church party think the whole proceding throws contempt upon the principles of the reformation. Among the Presbyterians there is some difference of opinion about the matter; but the prevailing notion, we think, is pretty well expressed by one of their number, who says, that "if the cross is erected under the notion that it adds any thing to the sanctity of the place, that this cross will be an object of admiration, or veneration even, the design is distinctly idolatrous, and in thorough rejection of Him who died on Calvary on a cross, as a sacrifice in the place of sinners." The Catholics make no secret of their satisfaction in view of this "happy event," as one of their papers terms it. They regard the cross as being "in the most approved Catholic style, and after the most orthodox Catholic pattern," and they think it an omen of good, that "an emblem, rejected and despised for many generations, is again thus caught up as a piece of legitimate property." Their only fear seems to be, lest some Catholic brother, "a sojourner here from far off climes, misled by the outward emblem, should enter where nothing but cold disappointment awaits him."

The comments of the different classes of persons upon this Trinity Cross are not uninstructive. They show that the most orthodox Presbyterians profess to regard the adoption of a Catholic symbol as a species of idolatry, and naturally raise the inquiry, how then can they consent longer to countenance practices which originated in the spirit of popery, and have always been characteristic of Rome? They show, also, how closely the movements of Protestants are marked by Romanists, and how much any apparent approximation to the "mother church," strengthens the hands of the members of that church.

INSTRUCTION OF THE DEAF AND DUMB.—In the Seventh Annual Report of the Massachusetts Board of Education, made by the Hon. Horace Mann, it was stated that the schools for the deaf and dumb in Prussia, Saxony, and Holland, were altogether superior to our own, because articulation was the basis of their system, while signs were employed in our own. In consequence of this statement the Rev. Geo. E. Day was appointed to visit the institutions of the deaf and dumb in Central and Western Europe, for the purpose of investigating and reporting on the subject. His report has been published, which completely disproves the statement of Mr. Mann, and sets at rest the question as to the comparative merits of the two systems of instruction. The institutions of this country far exceed those of Germany in the amount of instruction which they convey, and in their facilities for exciting the interest of the pupils. Much more religious instruction is conveyed in this country than in Germany, and with much better success. Mr. Day mentions a gentleman whom he met in one of the German cities, who had visited a large number of institutions in Germany, France, and the United States, and who expressed his opinion, that "the schools for the deaf and dumb in the United States have no superiors in the world."

TEMPERANCE ONE HUNDRED YEARS AGO.—An old book on the subject of intemperate drinking, printed in London about one hundred years ago, contains some language on the subject as strong as we ever hear now-a-days. Speaking of gin-shops, the writer says, "Desperate diseases require desperate remedies. If laws are rigidly executed against murderers in the highway, those who provide a draught of gin, which we see is murderous, ought not to be countenanced." Again, he has a proposition in regard to the use of the article which might perhaps be adopted with advantage now. It is this: "But if other cases still demand liquid fire, I would really propose that it should be only sold in small bottles, sealed up with the king's seal, with a very high duty, and none sold without being mixed with a strong emetic." Happy would it have been for England if many of the suggestions of this book had been heeded.

DIVISION OF THE METHODISTS.—A division among the Methodists, Northern and Southern, seems to be inevitable, and is generally concluded upon. But there is likely to be difficulty about dividing the property which now belongs to the Methodist Episcopal Church as a whole. Some there are who regard the Methodist Episcopal Church South as a secession, and therefore not entitled to any part of the Book Fund or the Chartered Fund. The property involved is so extensive, that the question of dividing it will excite considerable feeling, and may lead to serious difficulty. An apostle once cautioned the early Christians to beware of rich men; in these days, a caution to beware of rich churches would be quite as appropriate.

FOURTH OF JULY.—A great change has taken place within a few years in the character of Fourth of July celebrations. Instead of being given up to rum-drinking and carousing as formerly, the day is now used in many places to promote the cause of temperance and general improvement. We notice that the present year has been remarkably fruitful of such celebrations, and chronicle the fact as an omen of good. There is no reason why men should make themselves peculiarly the slaves of passion and sense in order to keep in memory the birth day of their country's freedom.

CONVERSION OF CATHOLICS.—At the recent meeting of the General Convention of Vermont, a delegate was present from the Congregational Union of Canada East. In giving an account of the state of religion in that Union, he said that three hundred Roman Catholics had been converted in Canada, who are now members of Protestant churches. Among them is a Roman priest, now a Congregational minister, who was brought to repentance by means of a Protestant Bible which he took by stealth from a store where it had been placed with others in order to be burned by his Bishop.

CORRECTION.—In hastily noticing, last week, "A Treatise on the Sabbath, by a Friend of Truth," we were led into error as to its authorship by a note penciled on the title page. Farther examination has shown us, that the work is not original, but a reprint—the Treatise having been prepared some years ago by Eld. Wm. B. Maxson, and the Appendix having been taken from the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Magazine, into which it was copied from the Utica Christian Magazine. We are informed by Dr. Wm. M. Fahnestock, of Bordentown, N. J., that the pamphlet was reprinted for gratuitous distribution through the influence, and mainly at the expense, of Br. Charles Hoch, of Showhill, Pa.

THE NEW JERSEY SLAVE CASE.—This interesting case, which was argued some weeks ago by Alvan Stewart, Esq., who endeavored to show that there could be no slaves in New Jersey under the New Constitution, has at length been decided. The decision was pronounced by Judge Nevius and concurred in by Judges Carpenter and Randolph; Chief Justice Hornblower dissented, and Judge Whitehead gave no opinion because he had not heard the argument. The following is the decision:—

1. That the relation of master and slave existed by law at the adoption of the Constitution in 1844.

2. That the Constitution has not destroyed that relation or abolished slavery.

3. That the colored man, William, should be remanded to the custody of the defendant.

The Gradual Emancipation Act of 1820 permitted all who were born Slaves prior to 1800 to be held so perpetually; while all others became free at specified periods. There are still 674 slaves in New Jersey, and perhaps 3000 children of Slaves who are held subject to their masters, the men till 25, the women till 21 years of age.

IMPOSITION OF HANDS.—The following extract, showing the practice of some of the Baptist denomination, is taken from the Biography of the late Dr. Brantly, of S. C., an eminent preacher of that denomination:—

"Dr. Brantly was baptized in Deep River, one of the head branches of the Cape Fear, and was united to a Baptist Church, then called, from the name of the neighboring ferry, the Gulf Church. At that time the ceremony of 'washing the saints' feet,' and also that of 'laying on of hands,' was practiced in that church, and among the Baptist churches generally. Accordingly, after baptism, young Brantly, with a very large number of newly baptized persons, were arranged, kneeling, on the river bank; and the elders present, led by the venerable Bishop Pope, passed along the entire range, laying their hands on their heads, uttering prayers and blessings on them severally, 'confirming the souls of the disciples.'"

"THE ALLEGHANIAN; or, United States Weekly Miscellany of Science, Letters, and Art," is the title of a periodical of which nine numbers have already been issued from New York. It is designed to occupy a position midway between the heavy Reviews and the frivolous monthly Magazines. Its editorials are written with a good deal of spirit and talent; its typographical execution is admirable; and the appearance of the sheet as a whole is very promising. RICHARD GRANT WHITE, Editor; BLANCHARD AND BRIZEE, publishers. Office 25 John street. Terms of subscription, $2 a year in advance.

"THE LITERARY EMPORIUM; a compendium of Religious, Literary, and Philosophical Knowledge."—Under this title, J. K. Wellman has issued several numbers of a monthly magazine from No. 16 Spruce street, New York. He aims to serve up a palatable monthly dish, without any aid from light literature or sectarian zeal. His effort is quite successful. Terms—$1 a year in advance.

EXTENSIVE RENUNCIATION OF IDOLATRY.—An Episcopal Missionary, writing from the Tennevelly District, in India, says—"The extensive movements in favor of Christianity, call for my warmest gratitude to the Giver of all good. It is now my privilege to report, that nearly the whole of the Shanar population, scattered about from my station as far as four miles distant, have embraced the gospel. Since October last, two hundred and twenty-seven families, residing in seven villages, have renounced idolatry. The number of converts in them amounts to eight hundred and thirty-two, and I have little doubt that many more will soon be added. In another village also, there have been accessions of between five and six hundred. So far as I can judge, all appear sincere, and promise well.

DR. MERLE D'AUBIGNE.

This distinguished man, author of a History of the Great Reformation, has recently visited England and Scotland. He was present and delivered an address at the meeting of the General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland on 22d of May. The Edinburgh Witness speaks thus of his appearance and speech on that occasion:

"He is a tall, robust, grave looking man in middle life, a noble representative, in person at least, of that great Gothic race which has so vastly increased in the world during the last twenty centuries, and before which, wherever it settles itself down, the other races of mankind seem gradually to retire and diminish. His countenance was singularly pleasing and manly, and his forehead largely developed in what phrenologists regard as the region of the knowing order.

He began his address. It was at once evident that his pronunciation was considerably more imperfect than that of the speaker who had gone before; his words were English, but not a few of them sounded as if they belonged to some foreign tongue. The first few sentences were short; the words were in what Swift calls the 'little language;' and nothing could be more artless than the collection. Anon, however, a strange power that riveted every listener was found associated with the imperfect pronunciation and the simple words. What the speaker said, the hearers saw. There were pictures in the sentences, thoughts of large size loomed tall and stately through the haze of a foreign idiom, and now some stroke of feeling went direct to the heart, now some picturesque image was stamped warm upon the imagination, now some profoundly philosophic remark called into activity the severer powers of the understanding. It needed no one to say that the speaker whose genius could thus triumph over difficulties which no common man could overcome, was the greatest of living historians—a man whose master work has been translated into the language of every Protestant country, and of which no fewer than five different translations already exist in the language of our own.

His speech fared in no degree the worse from the slight haze which a foreign idiom threw over it. The skillful carver, that he may give the more effect to his figures, roughens the ground from which they are projected; and the idiom of D'Aubigne formed, in like manner, a roughening of the ground, if we may so speak, that served but to render more prominent the magnitude and beauty of his thoughts. We shall attempt no summary of his speech. Who, with one of the works of the masters before him, would look at a copy of it done in small?"

RELIGIOUS ITEMS.

UNIVERSALISTS AND SLAVERY.—The Quinnebaug Association of Universalists, which recently held a meeting at Bolton, Mass., gave the following testimony against slavery, which it were well if other denominations would imitate:—

Whereas, it is the duty of all those who believe in the ultimate reign of truth and grace by Jesus Christ, to bear faithful testimony against the prominent and flagrant sins of the land; and both by precept and example labor to promote the cause of God and humanity with singleness of heart; Therefore,

Resolved, That this Association deem it their duty as Christians and philanthrophists, to enter their solemn protest against the sin of slaveholding as it now exists it the slave States of this Union, as a gross immorality, combining covetousness and extortion in their worst forms, as in direct violation of the law of God.

JEWS IN NEW ORLEANS.—The New Orleans Protestant states, that there are about five hundred Jews in that city; that they are distinguished for their intelligence and enterprise, are become a reading people, and are no longer afraid to read the New Testament; a number of them have, within a few weeks, purchased Bibles at the Depository; that not an individual among them has been convicted of a capital offence; not one of them can be found in the penitentiary; rarely one in the city prison or charity hospital; nor have any of their dead been buried at public expense in the "potter's field."

CHURCHES IN NEW YORK.—We see it stated in Doggett's City Directory, that there are 166 churches and places of public worship in this city, of which 36 are Protestant Episcopal, 30 Presbyterian, 24 Methodist Episcopal, 22 Baptist, 16 Roman Catholic, 15 Dutch Reformed, 8 Jewish, 8 African, 5 Congregational, 5 Associate Reformed Presbyterian, 4 Universalist, 4 French, 3 Lutheran, 3 Reformed Presbyterian, 2 Unitarian, 2 Welsh, 1 Methodist Protestant, 18 miscellaneous. Connected with the various congregations are 39 moral and religious societies.

HEATHENISM.—One of the missionaries in Pennsylvania tells a sad story in his parochial report, at the late Convention of that Diocese, when he says, "I hazard nothing in saying, that just as much heathenism may be found in many parts of our own State, as in India or Africa."

LIBERAL BEQUESTS.—Hon. Daniel Waldo, of Worcester, Mass., died lately, leaving a portion of his property to benevolent institutions. His whole estate is estimated to be from $300,000 to $400,000; and of this, he has left in legacies, chiefly, if not entirely, to benevolent objects—about $160,000. To the American Board of Foreign Missions he has left $40,000; to the Massachusetts Hospital, $40,000; to the Colonization Society, $10,000; to the American Education Society, $6,000; to the Seaman's Friend Society, $6,000, and to the Prison Discipline Society $6,000.

PURITAN RELICS.—Our dissenting brethren bid fair to rival Romanists themselves in their veneration for these things. We lately noticed the "old arm-chair" of the "Dairyman's Daughter," which is annually paraded on the stage of the N. Y. Tabernacle during the "anniversary week;" and now we learn from the Calender, that a "Congregational editor last week went into ecstacy at having recently seen 'the veritable pipe which Miles Standish, that hero among the Pilgrim fathers, used to smoke full two centuries ago.'" Perhaps we shall next hear of Martin Luther's beer tankard, John Calvin's black cap, or John Knox's snuff-box! [Banner of the Cross.

It is said that the Wesleyan Methodists of Great Britain are about to disown any connection with those of the United States who are slaveholders.

IMMENSE FIRE IN NEW YORK.

Three Hundred Buildings burnt—Loss of Stores and Merchandize from Five to Eight Millions of Dollars—Several lives lost.

At half past two o'clock on Saturday morning last, July 19, a fire broke out in an oil store in New street, near Broadway, which speedily communicated to several adjoining buildings, but of which the firemen had nearly obtained the mastery, when a terrible explosion took place, throwing down six or eight buildings, and sending its fiery missiles like a huge volcano in every direction. By this explosion and others which followed, the air was filled with flame to an immense distance, and the fire was communicated to a great number of buildings, enlarging the circle of the flame in every direction, and rendering all efforts to arrest its progress perfectly futile. In a short time the whole area between Broad-street, Exchange Place, Beaver-street, and Broadway, was one vast amphitheatre of red flame, sweeping over the buildings near by like a resistless hurricane. The fire extended on one hand down both sides of Broad-street, thence through to Broadway, taking both sides of New-street, the Waverly House, and then down Broadway to Bowling Green; on the other hand it reached near Wall-street, endangering the Merchant's Exchange, and burning both sides of Exchange Place.

The burnt district is probably as important and valuable as any part of the city, being composed of large and costly buildings, filled with expensive merchandize. It is the vicinity in which the French and German merchants chiefly congregate, whose goods were for the most part burnt, as the consternation was so great as to render it impossible to remove them. One single firm lost $250,000, and several other firms lost $100,000 each. It is estimated that the loss of merchandize will amount to $2,000,000, and the loss of buildings to probably $4,000,000.

It is impossible yet to state the number of lives lost. Some cases are known, and the probability is that the loss of life was considerable. A Mr. Von Groening, with another gentleman, and the porter, went into his store to get out the books, when there was no fire in it; but the explosion blew down the store, and it is supposed all three perished. Several others are known to be lost, and it is feared that many will die from injuries received.

Numerous narrow escapes are mentioned. One is that of a fireman, who was on the roof of the saltpetre store in which the explosion occurred. Explosion after explosion took place—the building fell in with a tremendous crash—the engine was smashed, several firemen injured, and one man killed—yet he, who was apparently in the most imminent peril, descended with the roof in such a way as to receive but very slight injury.

"In front of the Trinity Church yard—tables, mirrors, pianos, bedsteads, and bedding, costly lamps and well worn tin candlesticks, cradles and pictures, bird cages with the birds in them, crockery, fenders, chairs, footstools, knives and forks—in a word, all manner of articles employed in splendid or lowly housekeeping, were heaped pell-mell together with the utmost disregard for propriety or effect in grouping."

"In the Battery there are acres upon acres of household goods scattered upon the grass—each little pile attended by the out-driven family. Here is a pine cradle, roughly rocking a pale, squalid-looking infant—there a group of smutched faces refreshing themselves from a broken whisky-bottle. Such a scene has never been dreamed or imagined."

"In the midst of one household group, (says a reporter) we saw a young woman in feeble health; she reclined languidly in an easy chair, and her wan, thin cheek, afforded ground for the belief that she had been hastily borne amid the terror and uproar of the disaster from a bed of sickness. In close juxta-position was a little family party of children, with their nurse—the youngest delighted with the novelty of their position and the bustle around them, while the elder, more thoughtful and more conscious of the evil, looked on with a pretty air of bewilderment which seemed just ready to resolve itself into a burst of lamentation. A little farther on a young man was coolly arranging his hair and contemplating the graces of his person before a large mirror, which leaned against a tree; and our attention was next caught by a ragged, loafing boy of some fourteen or fifteen years, who had flung himself upon a handsome sofa and was fast asleep."

The district includes some ground which was burnt over by the great fire in 1835. It is somewhat remarkable, that in Exchange Place the fire stopped at the site of R. S. Lord's large store, which was blown up to stop the great fire. Much property was insured abroad, and it is believed that most of the Companies will be able to pray their losses, although it will probably ruin some of them.

GEN. JACKSON'S LAST WILL.—The Union publishes the following extract of a letter from Nashville, dated June 7:

"The last will and testament of the old hero was this day approved in our County Court, and is of public record. He commences by giving his body to the dust, whence it came, his soul to God that gave it, &c., devoting his estate, first to the payment of two debts, viz: one of $6,000, with interest, borrowed of General Plauche, of New Orleans; another of $10,000, with interest, borrowed of Blair & Rives; and the balance to his son, Andrew Jackson, Jr. with the exception of a few servants to his grandchildren.

"The sword presented him by the State of Tennessee, he gives to A. J. Donelson, (his nephew,) now Charge d'Affairs at Texas. The sword presented him at New Orleans, he leaves to Andrew Jackson Coffee, the son of his old friend General Coffee. The sword presented him at Philadelphia, he leaves to his grandson and namesake. The sword and pistols he carried through the British and Indian wars, he leaves to General R. Armstrong. The pistols of Washington, by him given to Lafayette, and by Lafayette given to Jackson, he leaves to George Washington Lafayette, the son of General Lafayette. Sundry other presents made him during his long and eventful career, are left with his adopted son, with instructions to him, that, in the event of a war, they shall, upon the restoration of peace, be distributed amongst those who shall have conducted themselves most worthy of their country in the conflict, in the opinion of their 'countrymen and the ladies.'

"It is dated, I think, in September, 1844, and revokes a will made by him several years before. It is in his own steady and firm hand writing, and, like all things that ever fell from his pen, breathes the purest patriotism throughout."

FIFTEEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The steamships Britannia and Great Western have arrived since our last, bringing foreign news to the 5th inst., from which we collect the following summary:—

The steamship Cambria went out in 10 days and 16 hours, including her stoppage at Halifax. The mammoth steamer Great Britain is to sail for N. Y. on the 26th inst.

IRELAND—DREADFUL CONFLICT.—An extraordinary edition of the Cork Reporter, dated July 2, brings intelligence of a dreadful conflict between the police and the peasantry, at a place called Ballinhassing, about seven miles south of the city of Cork. Eight of the country people were shot dead, and a great number, it is supposed, are dreadfully wounded. The correspondent of the Reporter writes from the scene of conflict as follows: "I have been for the last seven or eight hours witnessing scenes of such an agonizing and heart-rending nature, that I almost despair of being enabled to convey any idea of their horror. The peace of this hitherto most tranquil villiage has been sadly disturbed, and in almost every second house about the neighborhood are heard the wailings of widowed mothers and fatherless children, or the loud and disconsolate grief of friends and neighbors at the sufferings of their wounded relatives."

It seems that certain persons attempted to rescue a man whom the police had arrested for getting up a quarrel at a fair. The police fired upon the rioters, and a general fight ensued. The affair is to undergo a judicial investigation.

THE SOCIAL CONDITION OF IRELAND is at the present moment distressing—painful—most deplorable. The physical destitution of the people impels them to crime. The disputes about land gave rise to assassination. Mr. O'Connell asserts that there are at the present moment four millions and a half of paupers in his country; if true, an astounding, and, as regards the British Government, a disgraceful confession. With such combustible materials it is useless to expect permanent peace, or safety for life or property. A military force has been sent into the disturbed districts, but the chronic complaint of the country will not yield to mere blood letting.

SYRIA—MOUNT LEBANON.—The London journals of July 3d, publish accounts from Syria which are very unsatisfactory. An armistice, which had been agreed to at Beyrout, on the 2d June, by the chiefs of the contending parties assembled for that purpose, was broken by the Druses on the 12th ult., and several churches and convents had been pillaged and the priests murdered. Civil war was again raging in all parts of the country, and food was so scarce that thousands of people were literally starving in the neighborhood of Beyrout.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Most satisfactory accounts continue to be received from all sections of Great Britain, relative to the prospects of the harvest, as far as can be judged from present appearances. Should the weather continue favorable, a heavy yield is confidently expected.

The United Service Gazette states, that in consequence of the massacre of the crew of the Wasp, on the coast of Africa, it has been determined to give no quarter to slavers offering the slightest resistance.

The Earl of Winchelsea and Nottingham has addressed a letter to the Protestants of Great Britain, calling upon them to establish nation clubs, for the support of Protestant principles, in every county and borough of the kingdom.

The money raised in England and Scotland, last year, by thirteen Missionary, Tract, Bible, and School societies, amounted to no less a sum than £393,912.

Large subscriptions have been made in England for the sufferers by the fire at Quebec.

Mr. Everett, the American Minister, has been delivering an address before the British Agricultural Association at Cambridge.

The Railway Bell announces a discovery of a Dr. Bickes, by which the earth, including the poorest soils, and even sand, is made, to produce abundantly all sorts of crops without any kind of manure.

The number of fires in London during the last half-year is upwards of 400; as compared with former years, their magnitude has increased.

The German booksellers talk of opening establishments in the United States to protect themselves against what they consider the literary piracies which exist there.

The creditable exertions which the citizens of Philadelphia are making to sustain—or, more strictly speaking, perhaps, to regain their credit, has had a tendency, not only to improve that description of stock, but also American securities in general.

The Journal des Debats contains an account of the Russian Count Apraxim, his wife and children, being burned in vengeance by their infuriated serfs. He treated his murderers, it is said, with unheard of cruelty, and the terrible retaliation is therefore the less surprising.

The London Times sent a "commissioner" to Scotland to inquire into the state of the tenantry, and his letters, giving a true picture of their deplorable condition, have been the means of inducing the Duke of Southerland to make personal inquiries into the condition of the poor on his very extensive estates.

Colonel Todd, the American Minister at St. Petersburgh, so deservedly popular in the Russian Capital, has been appointed a member of the Imperial Agricultural Society—an honor never before conferred upon a foreigner.

Rev. Dr. Scoresby, Vicar of Bedford, and formerly of Liverpool, has published a valuable and interesting little work under the title of "American Factories and their Female Operatives."

The sale of the Napoleon Museum took place last week in London. Most of the articles connected with the personal and historical associations of the extraordinary man they commemorated, which originally cost large sums of money, have been sold for almost nothing.

The London Morning Herald states that Mr. Newman, the leader of the Tractarian party at Oxford, is writing a book to justify his secession from the Church of England to that of Rome.

Another tractarian, Rev. J. M. Capes, of St. John the Baptist's Church, Eastover, Bridgewater, has formally announced his secession from the Church of England, and given up all the emoluments derived from his situation.

The prorogation of Parliament, it is confidently expected, will take place about the middle of August, after which the Queen and Prince Albert will leave for Germany.

There is every reason to believe that the Irish Collegiate Bill will prove a failure in the working.

COLORED TEMPERANCE CONVENTION.—On Tuesday last the great annual meeting of the Delavan State Temperance Union was held in this city. From 10 o'clock until 12 delegations continued to arrive from different points, accompanied by several bands of music, and bearing numerous tastefully executed banners. After marching through the principal streets, they proceeded to the Court House; from a staging erected in front, the Convention was organized by electing the Rev. Mr. Garnett, of Troy, President, who together with others made short addresses, each speaker being limited to 12 minutes. The Rev. Mr. Beman, of New Haven, Ct., a highly intelligent and educated speaker, made the most effective address. He urged upon his colored brethren the necessity and importance of elevating their race to a higher degree of intelligence and respectability by education, sobriety and good conduct, as the best and surest means of attaining the rights and privileges to which the speaker contended they were entitled.

The entire proceedings were conducted with the strictest regard to propriety, and the appearance of the delegates, who, so far as we observed, conducted themselves throughout the day with the strictest decorum, was highly creditable to them in every respect. They numbered, according to our estimation, about 3,000, and out of this immense throng we did not discover but one single case of intoxication. The Temperance cause has probably done more for the elevation and improvement of the colored population of this country than any other class. But a few years since, a great number of this class were wallowing in the most disgusting and polluted haunts of intemperance and vice. Now with few exceptions they have become steady and industrious citizens, and are becoming daily more intelligent and useful.

The next Convention, in July, 1846, was appointed to be held at Poughkeepsie. [Hud. Rep.

MARRIAGE OF MUTES.—The most beautiful and interesting ceremony, the marriage of two deaf and dumb lovers—took place on Tuesday evening, July 15, at the Church of the Ascension, N. Y. The groom was Mr. Gallaudet—a fine young man, of gentlemanly and intelligent aspect—the bride a vision of beauty in her attire of snowy white, with the bridal chaplet crowning her fair brow. With their attendants they advance to the chancel and kneel. The clergyman reads the introductory prayer, which Mr. Peet translates into the language of silence by expressive signs and reverential movements.

The nuptial rite proceeds—the groom answers when he is called upon to make the solemn pledge of fidelity, honor and comfort, for he has the gift of speech; but the fair maiden at his side looks to the interpreter for the sense of what she has to promise, and ratifies it only with a lowly bend of her graceful head. The solemnity is ended—at the close of the final benediction the proud young husband of a moment tenderly salutes his lovely bride, and many a heart whispers, 'Heaven bless them in their wedded love!'

Another couple, both deaf mutes and inmates of the Institution, were also united in marriage—Mr. Reed and Miss Relyes—the second ceremony following close upon the first.

YALE COLLEGE.—President Day, LL. D. has been connected with that College, as an instructor, for 45 years. And the Professors under him have held their offices for the following periods: Benj. Silliman, LL. D. 41 years; J. L. Kingsley, LL. D. 40; Eli Ives, M. D. 32; Jona. Knight, M. D. 32; C. A. Goodrich, D. D. 28; E. T. Fitch, D. D. 28; T. W. Taylor, D. D. 23; Josiah W. Gibbs, M. A. 21; Dennison Olmstead, LL. D. 20; Hon. D. Daggett, LL. D. 19; Dr. Beers, 15; Prof. Woolsey, 14; A. D. Stanley, 9; Charles Hooker, M. D. 7; Wm. A. Larned, 6.

FROM NEW ZEALAND.—The New Bedford Mercury states, on the authority of a letter from Captain Howland, of the ship London Packet of Fairhaven, dated Bay of Islands, New Zealand, March 13th, that the natives of New Zealand had risen upon the English inhabitants of the Bay of Islands and completely overpowered them. On the 13th of March a battle was fought between the English and natives, in which the former sustained a loss of twenty or thirty killed, and a great many wounded. The English fled to the vessels in port, leaving the town in possession of the natives, who soon reduced it to ashes.

A company of citizens of Onondaga and Madison Counties, among whom is Gen. J. D. Ledyard of Cazenovia, have commenced the work of turning a fine and never-failing stream, known as 'Limestone Creek,' through the village of Fayetteville, Onondaga Co., where it will have a fall 120 feet, and afford sufficient power to run eight or ten large factories. This will give life and business to the village, employment and wages to hundreds of men, women and children, and furnish a new market for the bounteous productions of one of the richest wheat-growing sections of our State. Fayetteville is but an hour's drive from Syracuse, already one of the largest inland places of our State, and rapidly advancing to greatness. The Erie Canal is close at hand, and the railroad but two miles off. The adjacent country abounds in beds of Gypsum, affording inexhaustible supplies of Water Lime. There can hardly be a better site for a manufacturing village.

The Pawnee Indians have killed two of the Oregon emigrants and stolen several horses.

SUMMARY.

There is much surmising about the cause of the great explosion at the late fire—whether it was from saltpetre or gunpowder. It is said that the owners of the store where it took place have been arrested, and if it shall appear that they had powder in the store, they will be tried for murder.

Henry G. Green, who was on trial last week at Troy, for the murder of his wife at Berlin, was on Saturday last pronounced guilty by the Jury, and sentenced to be hung on Wednesday the 10th of September next. The circumstances were such as to leave no doubt of his guilt.

A communication in the New Hampshire Patriot states that there was recently a meeting at Henniker, N. H., of seven brothers of the name of Wood, whose united ages were a little more than 453 years—the average being 64 1-2 years. They had never all been together before, even in childhood; and now met for the last as well as the first time.

During the last half-year no less than sixteen criminals have been executed in England. Calcraft, the hangman of Newgate, strangled thirteen out of the number, for which he was paid at the rate of £10 per head!

The Morning News tells the history of a man named John Thorpe, who has just been sentenced in the Court of Sessions to the State Prison for grand larceny. He is the son of an eminent antiquary and bookseller in London. His life has been very eventful, and until now he has escaped punishment for the crimes which he has perpetrated in England and this country. He is a man of talents and a scholar—familiar with all the fine arts, and a penman of extraordinary ability. It is said that he can copy, with pen and ink, a line engraving with such nicety that it is almost impossible to tell it from the engraving itself—and that, after seeing a signature once, he can imitate it so perfectly that it cannot be discovered which is the genuine.

The Wheat crops in Western Pennsylvania, it is stated, will be very abundant. The Washington County Reporter says, that in some sections of the county, there are three bushels of prime wheat this year where there was one of very indifferent wheat last year. As a general thing the yield is better than for several years; the heads are well filled, and the grain is perfect.

It is stated that one-third of the burnt district of Pittsburgh is rebuilt and rebuilding. Handsome edifices are rising in rapid succession.

A prophet, aged 19, has started up in Nauvoo, and announces himself as a messenger of woe to many. Among other revelations, is one of especial warning to the Saints, informing them that Nauvoo is to be destroyed, and that the true Church should place themselves under the direction of the young prophet, and repair at once to California.

The Van Buren (Ark.) Two other horses of Mr. Dietritch's were also bitten, and it is said that two children of Mr. Quinn, in the same township, had been bitten by a rabid dog.

Robert E. Levering, the "American Antiquarian," has arrived in the packet ship Liverpool from England, where he has been completing his work called "Antiquarian Analogies," exhibiting the similarities he has discovered existing between the antiquities of America and those of Europe, particularly those of Great Britain, establishing at the same time the unity of the human race.

Accounts from Cape May state that fifty six or fifty-seven visitors to that place, boarding at Ludlam's Hotel, suddenly sickened on Monday, after dinner, and that some of them were seriously affected. The cause had not been ascertained, but it was supposed to have been something of a deleterious nature contained in a portion of the food at the dinner meal.

DIED,

At Perry, Lake Co., Ohio, July the 8th, Col. SILAS BAILEY, aged 91 years lacking one day. He enjoyed good health until the latter part of February last, when he had a severe attack of influenza, from which he so far recovered as to be able to walk out of doors. About four weeks previous to his death he began to fail, and gradually declined until he sank in death.

He professed religion in early life, and united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Hopkinton, R. I. He continued a member of said church a number of years, when, in consequence of some difference of opinion in doctrine, he left the church and united with the first-day Baptists, in which connection he continued until, about ten years ago, he obtained a letter from the Baptist Church in Kingsville, Ohio, and united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church at Hayfield, Pa., with whom it is believed he continued until his death. During his latter years religion seemed to be his principal theme. He was ardently attached to the Bible Sabbath, which he boldly defended. During his last sickness he manifested the greatest willingness to die, and ever desired to depart and be with Christ. He cast his whole soul upon the Redeemer, and trusted in his merits alone for salvation. At one time he was in the dark relative to his interest in Christ, but in agonizing prayer soon found relief and unspeakable consolation from the promise, "Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." This promise he often repeated with ecstacy up to the day of his death. The dying scene was truly a triumphant one. E. S. B.

CHRIST BLESSING LITTLE CHILDREN.

The waters of Jordan lay beaming and calm,
The breezes swayed lightly the leaves of the palm,
The vineyards and fields slept in motionless green,
And soft fell the sun-light on fair-Palestine.
'Twas nature's repose: but each slumbering glen,
Awoke to the footsteps of hurrying men.

For the summons had gone to each low cottage home,
"Up! haste ye to Jordan!—the Master hath come!"
And the borders of Juda have echoed the sound;
In the hearts of its dwellers an answer was found,
And the multitude hastened, with joyous accord,
To hear the message of Jesus, the Lord.

Long, breathless and eager, each listener hung
On the accents of mercy that dropped from his tongue.
He ceased: and a mother pressed forth from the crowd,
And low at the feet of the Savior she bowed.
Her blooming babes, trembling, before him she laid,
And, "Bless, bless my children!" she tearfully prayed.

Harsh glances gleamed on her from many an eye.
"Why trouble the Master?" rebuking, they cry.
But what saith the Savior? will He, too, reprove.
Nor grant to the suppliant one token of love?
Not so: for the infant he takes in his arms,
And says, in mild accents that quell her alarms,

'Forbid not the children to come unto me,
For they, too, my kingdom of glory shall see!
Proud men! until humbled like them ye have been,
At the portals of bliss ye shall ne'er enter in!
I bless them! I own them! 'Tis meet that they come.
And find with my Father in heaven a home."

Thus spake the Redeemer: and still, from above,
The children he calls to the arms of his love.
Like the small rain that falls on the tender young flowers,
His Spirit descends on their blossoming powers.
Forbear then, oh mortal! to limit His grace!
These too in the garden of God may have place!

A SCENE IN A GRAVEYARD.

BY ROBERT MORRIS.

On passing through one of the cemeteries connected with our city, a few afternoons since, we noticed that a funeral had just wound its way slowly up the principal pathway, and, lingering for a few moments, we saw that the concourse in attendance was unusually large, while, as the last solemn ceremonies proceeded, tears trickled from many an eye. Scenes connected with death and the grave are of such every day occurrence, in a thickly populated metropolis like ours, obituary notices are so constantly written for the newspapers, that the hearts of the multitude grow callous, comparatively speaking, and few are touched except in extraordinary cases, or when some loved and cherished one is torn from those to whom they have long been friends and benefactors. To see the thousands, indeed, hurrying on from day to day, so apparently careless of the future, and so utterly listless as to the life beyond the grave, one might suppose the opinion to prevail, that the soul perished with the body, and that all was night, darkness and oblivion with the termination of our mortal being. Perhaps if one could occupy an eminence, and with the millions that constitute the family of man within the range of human vision, see the death-shafts of the Arch Destroyer, and the falling victims on every side, the spectacle would afford an adequate view of the perils of this life, and of the hundreds constantly summoned to another and a darker or a brighter world. But it is not so. We know little of death, except among those immediately around us, and thus many of us wander on, greedy of gain, and sometimes periling the pearls of soul with the object of accumulating the dross of Mammon, and as if time, human existence and eternity were the same. But there are moments when even the most stubborn are compelled to yield, when the icy frozenness of man's nature is subdued, when the feelings gush forth beyond our power to control them, and we realize that we are indeed perishing things of mortality. Such a moment was that to which we have called the attention of the reader. We saw before us Old Age, with his white hairs and bending form—Youth and Beauty with their cheeks of rose, and eyes of light—ripened Manhood, with its erect frame and firm step, while sunny Childhood, with its laughing voice was also there. But the hearts of old and young seemed alike touched. The cheek of the aged was moistened, the long lash above the eye of beauty was steeped in tears, and convulsive sobs were heard from many a near and dear relative. Even the lip of the man of God trembled as he pronounced a warm eulogy upon the virtues of the deceased, and, as turning from the fresh earth and the uncovered grave, he pointed the thoughts of the listeners upwards, to where the white-winged spirit of the disembodied soared to join her angel voice to those of the cherubim and seraphim!

We listened, not a little moved at such a scene, and anxious to know the cause of such unusual and general grief. The buried one was the form of a young mother. She had been wedded several years, she was the pride of her father's house, and the earthly idol of a fond and devoted husband. Her marriage had been one of harmony and love, and her parents rejoiced because they did not desire that the family should perish with them, because they concurred in the preference of their child, and because the chosen one of their affections was worthy. Thus everything conspired to render the nuptials auspicious and happy. They were so. The parties lived in harmony together for several years, time mellowing and softening the beauty of the wife, and each newly developed merit of her character serving as a fresh tie to bind her to the affection of her husband. But as in every thing human, their cup of joy was not without its dreg of bitterness. The sky that shone in its richness above them, was not wholly free from shadow. At the end of five years they were still childless, and although they endeavored each to conceal from the other the disappointment and the baffled expectation from year to year, the topic was constantly presenting itself, and was evidently a source of uneasiness, not only to the husband but to the wife. That one magic bond was wanting—that link which seemed necessary to cement life to life, and destiny to destiny. Imagine then the joy when, under these circumstances, they believed that the cloud was about to pass away; that Providence was about to respond to their prayers, and that the expectations of all were about to be realized. There may be in the world those who are indifferent to such things; but there are others who cherish the affections, to whom childhood has a thousand charms, and for whom life would be comparatively desolate, without some living pledge. Sunshine then, once more broke in all its glory on the prospects of the yet young wife, and the whole family circle were again happy. She was now more cheerful than ever. Her husband, her friends, all joined in the feeling. She had the best wishes of many a gentle heart, and the kindliest sympathies of many a fond mother. Her hour came. For a moment all was hope and expectation. Another, and apprehension and agony succeeded. A little longer, and mother and child were still and cold in the embrace of death.

The funeral, gentle reader, which we have attempted to describe, was that of the young mother. In realizing the dearest wish of her heart, her soul had passed from its tenement of clay, and soared, we may hope, to the regions of the blest.

THE LAST MOMENTS OF GENERAL JACKSON.

The Union contains a letter from General Jackson's family physician, giving an account of the last moments of that distinguished man, from which we take the following:—

"I was sent for on Saturday the 7th inst. The messenger informed me that the General was much worse. I hastened to the hermitage, and found him very much exhausted. He had great difficulty in respiration, in consequence of an accumulation of water in his chest. He requested I should remain with him, as he was well aware that his dissolution was near at hand. He took an anodyne and expectorant, and appeared to pass the first part of the night tolerably comfortable. He had not been able to lie down for the last six months. He had to be propped up in his bed at night, and in his arm-chair during the day. On Sunday morning, the 8th instant, (the day on which he died,) on entering his room, I found him sitting in his arm-chair, with his two faithful servants, George and Dick, by his side, who had just removed him from his bed. I immediately perceived that the hand of death was upon him. I informed his son that he could not survive but a few hours; and he immediately dispatched a servant for Major William B. Lewis, the General's devoted friend. Mr. Jackson informed me that it was the General's request that, in case he grew worse, or was thought to be near his death, Major Lewis should be sent for, as he wished him to be near him in his last moments. He was instantly removed to his bed; but, before he could be placed there, he had swooned away. His family and servants, believing him to be dead, were very much alarmed, and manifested the most intense grief; however, in a few seconds reaction took place, and he became conscious; and raised his eyes, and said: 'My dear children, do not grieve for me; it is true, I am going to leave you; I am well aware of my situation; I have suffered much bodily pain, but my sufferings are but nothing compared with that which our blessed Saviour endured upon that accursed cross, that we might all be saved who put their trust in him.'

He first addressed Mrs. Jackson, (his daughter-in-law,) and took leave of her, reminding her of her tender kindness manifested towards him at all times, and especially during his protracted illness. He next took leave of Mrs. Adams (a widowed sister of Mrs. Jackson, who has been a member of the General's family for several years) in the most kind and affectionate manner, reminding her also of her tender devotion to him during his illness. He next took leave of his adopted son in the most affectionate and devoted manner. He next took leave of his grandchildren and the children of Mrs. Adams. He kissed and blessed them in a manner so touching and impressive, that I have no language that can do this scene justice. He discovered that there were two of the boys absent:—one of his grandsons and one of Mrs. Adams'. He inquired for them. He was informed that they were at the chapel attending Sunday school. He desired that they should be sent for. As soon as they came, he kissed and blessed them also, as he had done to those with him. By this time, most of his servants had collected in his room, or at the windows. When he had taken leave of them all, he delived one of the most impressive lectures on the subject of religion that I have ever heard. He spoke for near half an hour, and apparently with the power of inspiration; for he spoke with calmness, with strength, and indeed with animation. I regret exceedingly, my dear sir, that there was no one present who could have noted down his precise words. They might have been read with profit, and would have been fondly cherished as a precious gem by all the good and great of the land.

In conclusion, he said: "My dear children, and friends and servants, I hope and trust to meet you all in heaven, both white and black." The last sentence he repeated—"both white and black," looking at them with the tenderest solicitude. With these words, he ceased to speak, but fixed his eyes on his granddaughter, Rachel Jackson, (who bears the name of his own beloved wife,) for several seconds. What was passing through his mind at that moment, I will not pretend to say; but it did appear to me that he was invoking the blessings of Heaven to rest upon her. The lecture to his family was awfully sublime. His implicit belief in the Christian Religion, and in the plan of salvation, as revealed in the Bible—his great anxiety that they should believe in religion, as taught by the holy Scriptures: and that in so doing, they would ensure their eternal salvation, and join him in heaven; such sentiments, from such a man, at such a time, was enough to put to flight all scepticism on the subject of religion.

Major Lewis arrived about two o'clock. The general appeared to know him, when he spoke to him. As I before stated, the general had to be propped up in his bed; and Major Lewis supported his head until he breathed his last; which was precisely at six o'clock, P. M. Thus died the greatest and the best man of the age, or perhaps, of any age.

I am, with regard, your friend and obedient servant, JNO. N. ESSELMAN.

FRANCIS P. BLAIR, ESQ.

DOMESTIC SLAVE TRADE.

It has all the loathsome features of the foreign trade, with the additional one of "breeding and raising slaves for sales," which stands out in disgusting prominence, defying all competition. Niles' Register, published at Baltimore, vol. 35, p. 4, states that "dealing in slaves has become a large business—establishments are made in several places in Maryland and Virginia, at which they are sold like cattle. These places of deposit are strongly built, and well supplied with thumb screws and gags, and ornamented with cowskins and other whips, oftentimes bloody!" From these prisons they are driven in droves to the Southern market, and the cruelties and atrocities practiced upon them between Baltimore, Washington and New Orleans, are scarcely excelled by the agonies of the middle passage.

The Maryville Tenn. Intelligencer of October 4th, 1835, speaking of these droves of human cattle, remarks: "That they are driven with heavy galling chains riveted upon their persons, their backs lacerated with the knotted whip, traveling to a region where their condition through time will be second only to the wretched creatures in hell; this depicting is not visionary, would to God that it was."

The New-Orleans Courier of February 15, 1845, says, "we think it would require some casuistry to show, that the present slave-trade from Virginia is a whit better than the one from Africa." And the Presbyterian Synod of Kentucky, in 1835, in an address to the churches under its care says: "brothers and sisters, parents and children, husbands and wives are separated, and permitted to see each other no more. These acts are daily occurring in the midst of us. The shrieks and agony often witnessed on such occasions, proclaim with a trumpet tongue the iniquity of our system. There is not a neighborhood where these heart-[illegible] is not a village or road that does not behold the sad procession of manacled outcasts, whose mournful countenances tell that they are exiled by force from all that their hearts hold dear."

Of the extent of this trade few of us have any just conception. Between the years 1817, and 1837, a period of twenty years, 300,000 slaves were taken from Virginia, North Carolina and Maryland, to the Southern market, agreeably to the statement of the Rev. Dr. Graham, of North Carolina; and in 1835 it was estimated by the most intelligent men in Virginia, that 120,000 slaves were exported from that State during the preceding 12 months. About two-thirds of these accompanied their owners, who removed; the remaining one-third were sold at an average of $600 each, amounting to 24,000,000 of dollars, which the domestic slave-trade poured into Virginia in one year. In 1836, says the Maryville Tenn. Intelligencer, "60,000 slaves passed through a little Western town on their way to the Southern market, and in the same year four States imported 200,000 slaves from the North." In 1837 a committee appointed by the citizens of Mobile, Ala., to inquire into the causes of pecuniary distress so prevalent, reported that between 1833 and 1837, Alabama alone imported from the Northern Slave States 10,000,000 dollars worth of slaves annually, amounting to 40,000,000 in four years, the price paid by one State alone, for the bodies and souls of men, women and children, in the heart of a Republic. [Cor. Trenton Gazette.

A BAD BARGAIN.

The following occurred in one of the towns of Massachusetts not far from Rhode Island. It is a compound of rum and benevolence, appetite and cunning, high and low depravity, such as seldom comes to light.

'Husband, what do you think I have done to-day?' said Mrs. C. to a keeper of a country store, where the drunkard's 'O be joyful' was still sold, upon his return home to dinner.

'I cannot possibly tell, my dear; I dare say something clever.'

'Well, I never did such a thing before—but the man looked so pitiful, I thought I would encroach upon your wardrobe a little, for once, as I knew you could well supply the poor creature's wants without any inconvenience to yourself.'

'You have given away one of my coats, I suppose; hope you didn't make a mistake, and give my go-to-meeting one, did you?'

'O no; I have given away one of your shirts. He said he'd none, and had called to beg one—so I gave him one, and he went off as happy as if I had given him a cow. I don't know when I have seen such a smile of joy at so small a gift.'

'Given a shirt? I should like to know who there is so poor as to be without a shirt. Old Tom Jones is the poorest creature I know of, and I don't believe but he has got a shirt, as poor a drunkard as he is!'

'Tom Jones! there, I don't believe, but it was Jones; I have heard you describe him, and it was him I know. He looked cunning, and that smile of his seemed to be half joy, half fun, and if I was Irish, I should say the other half savage.'

'Very likely it was Jones, for he has been in the store to-day.'

'Has he? and had he a short jacket on, and holes in his pants, and miserable shoes without stockings?'

'Just so.'

'He is the very man. Had he a bundle, or had he put his shirt on?'

'He had a bottle, as usual, but I saw no bundle, and I did not notice whether he had a collar or not.'

'His bottle! well I hope you did not fill it for him, for that would seem like the story in the paper lately, where the wife told the husband she would supply the drunkard's family out of the house, as long as he supplied the rum from the store. Did you let him have any?'

'Any what, my dear, molasses or vinegar? You have no objections to my selling him any thing he will pay for.'

'Yes, I have, you know I have. I would not sell him rum for pay, and you may trust him for any thing else. I wish you would let him have molasses. His wife would be glad of that. But did you let him have any rum?'

'Yes, my dear, I did. He seemed so feeble, and wished that I would let him have a little.'

'How much?'

'Half a pint.'

'Half a pint! enough to make him drunk, and he will lose his shirt before he gets home, and I might as well have turned him off without it. Well now, husband, let me know,—do you trust Jones for rum?'

'No.'

'Did he pay for it?'

'Yes.'

'How much?'

'Six cents.'

'In money?'

'No.'

'How then?'

'In rags.'

'In rags! I'll bet a dollar you have bought your own shirt back again, and I'll go this minute and see.'

'No, you sit still and finish your dinner.'

'No, no, you shan't go, I'll go myself. It will be such a good one. I'll make you ashamed of selling rum this time at any rate. There! there! Here it is, torn to pieces—and you have bought it for rags.'

PAINE'S AGE OF REASON.

Some years since we procured and read Paine's Age of Reason, and the most deep of any one impression that was made upon our mind at the time, was that the writer every where betrayed a total want of a thorough acquaintance with the Scriptures. If the following is to be relied upon, it proves our impression to have been correct. What follows is stated by a writer in the Christian Intelligencer, which, he says, he received from Mr. Paine's own lips:—

"I will explain the origin of the 'Age of Reason' to you. You may remember that in consequence of my vote against the execution of Louis XVI., with some other circumstances that were opposed to the proceedings of the French rulers during the Reign of Terror, I was first suspected of dissatisfaction to Marat, Robespierre, and their accomplices, and finally arrested and cast into prison." I think Mr. Paine said La Conciergerie. "While in the dungeon, and constantly expecting, like the others, without a moment's warning to be transferred to the guillotine, it was suggested to me that if I would make it known that I was a devout worshipper of the Goddess of Reason, and utterly rejected every thing Christian, I might escape the decapitation to which I fancied myself doomed. A tacit pledge was given by a friend, that if my life was spared, I should write a work adverse to Christianity, expressly to be disseminated in Britain, to weaken the power of Pitt and his administration. By the death of Robespierre, I was liberated from prison, and to obtain the favor of the Oligarchs, and regain my former position, I determined to compose the work entitled the 'Age of Reason.' Great difficulty was interposed, for a copy of the Bible could not be found. I had not seen or read a word of it for a long period before. At length, a Testament was procured; probably Paine added, also, afterwards, a Bible'—and by the help of some quotations from other sources, I composed the 'Age of Reason,' which produced the effect designed; for the proscription of the work by the British government rendered the French rulers propitious towards me. Since that period I have never concerned myself about any religion, and it was only your sentiments that made me advert to it; as I hold no conversation upon that subject, except with some companions, to ridicule the hypocritical fanatics and their priestcraft."

"HARD SHELL" CHRISTIANS.—The following instance of almost incredible ignorance occurred in Georgia. [Cong. Jour.

Two men were lately cited to appear before a "Hard shell" (Anti-Missionary) Baptist church, to stand a trial; the one was charged with drunkenness, and the other with the crime of having joined a temperance society. The trial resulted in the acquital of the drunkard and the excommunication of the temperance man. The reason assigned for this conduct is this:—the drunkard acknowledged he had done wrong, but the temperance man would make no such acknowledgment!

AN INCIDENT OF SLAVERY.—The N. O. Picayune of the 22d ult. gives the decision of the Supreme Court of Louisiana, in the case of Sally Muller vs. Louis Belmonti and John F. Muller, called in warranty. The decree orders Sally Muller to be released from the bonds of slavery. She claimed to be born in Germany and of German parents; of having come to this country when an infant with her father and mother, who reached here as "redemptioners," and died shortly after their arrival. John F. Muller alleged that she was born a slave and his property; as such he brought her up, and as such he sold her to Louis Belmonti; and now, after being for a quarter of a century or thereabouts, subjected to all the degradations of domestic and servile labor, she is, by the highest tribunal, declared free!

ANECDOTE OF FRANKLIN.

When Dr. Franklin's mother-in-law first discovered that the young man had a hankering for her daughter, the good old lady said she did not know so well about giving her daughter to a printer—there were already two printing offices in the United States, and she was not certain the country would support them. It was plain young Franklin would depend for the support of his family on the profits of the third, and this was rather a doubtful chance. If such an objection was urged to a would-be-son-in-law, when there were but two printing offices in the United States, how can a printer get a wife now, when the last census shows the number to be 1,557?

GOV. SEWARD ON SLAVERY.—Among the letters received and read at the late Anti-Slavery Convention at Cincinnati, was one from Ex-Governor Seward. That part which enunciates his views as to the mode in which Slavery is to be moved, our readers may like to see:

Emancipation is now a political enterprise, to be effected through the consent and action of the American people. They will lend no countenance or favor to any other than lawful and constitutional means. Nor is the range of our efforts narrowly circumscribed by the Constitution.

In many of the free States there is a large mass of citizens disfranchised on the ground of color. They must be invested with the right of suffrage. Give them this right and their influence will be immediately felt in the National Councils, and it is needless to say will be cast in favor of those who uphold the cause of Human Liberty. We must resist unceasingly the admission of slave States, and urge and demand the abolition of slavery in the district of Columbia. We have secured the right of petition, but the Federal Government continues to be swerved by the influences of Slavery as before. This tendency can and must be counteracted; and when one independent Congress shall have been elected, the internal slave trade will be subjected to inquiry. Amendments to the Constitution may be initiated, and the obstacles in the way of emancipation will no longer appear insurmountable.

RICE CEMENT.—This useful and elegant cement, which is beautifully white, and dries almost transparent, is made by mixing rice with cold water, and then gently boiling it. Papers pasted together with this cement will sooner separate in their own substance than at the joining. It is, therefore, an excellent cement in the preparation of curious paper articles, as tea-trays, ladies' dressing and work boxes, and other articles which require layers of paper to be cemented together. In every respect, it is preferable to common paste made with wheat flour. It answers well for pasting into books the copies of writing taken off by copying machines, on unsized silver paper. With this composition, made with a small quantity of water, that it may have a consistence similar to plastic clay, models, busts, statues, basso-relivos, and the like may be formed. When dry, the articles made of it are susceptible of a high polish; they are also very durable.

Respect for Consistency.—Some time since two heathen boys were brought to this country to obtain a Christian education. The evil of rum-drinking had been so impressed upon their minds by our Missionaries, as to render it, in their estimation, incompatible with the purity of religion. On landing, they were invited to share a pleasant home with a citizen distinguished for hospitality, whose kindness they amply repaid by their cheerful artless manners. During their stay, the host was visited by a distinguished clergyman, whom he, in a most affectionate manner, introduced to the boys as a "Michanary," (adopting their own pronunciation.) The boys seemed awe-struck with the presence of so high a dignitary; and seated themselves in a distant part of the room, silent and reserved. At length the host stepped to the sideboard and got the welcome decanter for his guest. No sooner had the clergyman taken a draught than the spell was dissolved, and springing from their seats they moved off, saying, "He no Michanary! Michanary no drink rum!

Surgical Operation without pain.—Dr. Albert T. Wheelock, of Belfast, Me., certifies in the Boston Medical and Surgical Journal to his having removed a polypus from the nose of a lady about 24 years of age, while in a mesmeric condition. The tumor was of an oblong rounding form, largely attached base, probably half an inch in its smallest diameter, had been there three months, and was so firmly adherent that it had to be torn away in pieces. The operation lasted four or five minutes, during which time the patient evinced not the slightest symptom of pain, but appeared like a dead body, and when awaked, said she was unconscious that any thing painful had been done.

Banking in New York.—There are 85 incorporated Banking Associations, making in all 150 Banks in the State, with a capital of $43,734,833. In the counties of Alleghany, Clinton, Courtland, Franklin, Hamilton, Queens, Richmond, Rockland, Scoharie, Sullivan and Wyoming there are no banks. There are 14 Savings Banks in the State.

A Mormon Elder Caught.—Charles Chrisman, a Mormon Elder, was caught in Hancock County, Illinois, a few days ago, in the act of carrying off railroad iron, which he had stolen from the Railroad between Jacksonville and Meredosia. He had taken three loads before, amounting to more than two tons.

The Sabbath Recorder.

EDITED BY GEORGE B. UTTER. "THE SEVENTH DAY IS THE SABBATH OF THE LORD THY GOD." PUBLISHED AT NO. 9 SPRUCE ST.

VOL. II—NO. 6. NEW YORK, FIFTH-DAY, JULY 31, 1845. WHOLE NO. 58.

A GOOD CONSCIENCE.

"I feel, and 'tis my proudest boast,
That Conscience is itself a host;
While this inspires my swelling breast,
Let all forsake me, I'm at rest;
Ten thousand deaths in every nerve,
I'd rather SUFFER than DESERVE."

So spake Montgomery, while incarcerated in a gloomy dungeon, and who does not respond to the sentiment so sweetly breathed in song? We learn from the Word of God, and from observation, that a good or an evil conscience is man's constant attendant through life, and that it ever affects individual happiness more than all things else. The former is his best earthly friend in time of trouble, the latter his direst foe.

Behold that Bible Christian smiling in the midst of blight and desolation, where all around him withers. The fires have consumed his substance—death has changed the countenances that once shone around his household hearth, radiant with light and love—envy and detraction have pierced him with their envenomed stings; but he has within him a treasure untouched, unapproachable, "the answer of a good conscience toward God." The moral elements may rage without, and for a moment ruffle the surface of his moral being, and yet there is peace deep within, flowing sweetly as the gentle river, and wafting the soul continually close by

"Siloa's brook that flowed
Fast by the oracles of God."

Behold in contrast the man who can 'spread his arms like seas, and take in all the shore,' who can scarce enumerate his flocks and herds, and lands, kindred and (summer) friends, but who withal has a conscience corrupted with injustice; mark the workings of that heart, when none but God can see, as it writhes beneath a "whip of scorpions, "fierce as ten furies, terrible as hell." Hear the remorse-stricken spirit exclaim, while the ghost of his guilt seems almost an embodied petrifaction before his mental vision—

"Oh! that mind!
That mind of man! that godlike spring of action;
That source whence virtue, learning, honor flow!
Which lifts us to the stars; which carries us
O'er the swoll'n waters of the angry deep,
As swallows skim the air; that fame's sole fountain,
That doth transmit a fair and spotless name,
When the vile trunk is rotten; give me that,
Oh! give me but to live in after age,
Remembered and unsullied— * * *
* * * And the slow fire
That wears my vitals now, will no more move me
Than 'twould a corpse within a monument."

So—when it speaks out—writhes the stricken conscience of the murderer, the seducer, the slanderer, the libertine, the thief, the hypocrite, the habitual violator of any of God's known laws. Perhaps their crimes may never see the light this side the eternal Judgment, but they are seen by the eye of Omniscience, they are known to the guilty perpetrator, and whatever his external circumstances or condition, they haunt him by day, and plant thorns in his pillow by night.

Let the young, as they value the happiness to be found in a present or future existence—as they value the favor of God, and peace in death—possess a conscience void of offence. Say nothing, think nothing, read nothing that can stain the virgin purity of the mind, or create associations that may in the far future place it upon the rack, and be beyond their power to obliterate.

To illustrate, let us cite a fact. Not long since, while bending over the sick, and apparently dying couch of a sufferer, and trying to point her to the Great Physician, in whom she had no hope, she said, "My symptoms were very bad last night, and I thought I could not live till morning. I tried to pray to the Lord many times, but as often as I began, things that I had read in Paine's works and foolish novels many years ago, would rush in and fill my mind. I could not pray connectedly—it was impossible—and I gave it up in despair. Oh, if I had never read those vile books! What shall I do? What will become of my poor soul?" Could the young reader have witnessed the mental anguish occasioned in this instance by improper reading and baleful associations, it would be a lesson long to be remembered. These books came in her way at an early age, she wished to read them, and said to herself, "Where's the harm? I shall think as I please after all." The harm was, that they made an impression—an impression that clung to her like an incubus through life, and at the very gates of death, rose up with giant strength between her soul and God, and formed a barrier to the Mercy-seat that she could not surmount.

Parent—if you would keep your children free from the power of an evil conscience, guard their earliest years with unceasing assiduity from evil associations. Does it give you pleasure to gaze upon your children in infancy, robed in stainless white—do you love to have the frail casket emblem forth the purity that you would fain impart to the priceless gem it covers? It rests with you to say whether that gem shall be kept free from stains, that once made, no sorrow can efface. Put your child in the way of temptation—let him read the loose novel—hear the trifling or ambiguous jest, the unchaste word, the false tales of the vulgar—associate with those of doubtful principles—behold deception practiced unrebuked—the Sabbath disregarded—God's laws dishonored by those who profess to revere them—and expect not that he will sustain no injury—no moral loss. Let such be his exposures, and the gem is inevitably tarnished.

Could parents but realize how improper ideas, when once communicated, affect the heart in different circumstances—how stealthily they follow the soul through life's weary pilgrimage, and like a secret foe, thrust their missiles in the dark, and "worry whom they can't devour," surely they would be ever on the alert—ever solicitous that their little ones may be delivered from evil. As of wrong ideas, so of what is true, and good, and pure—an early impression of the beautiful is never forgotten. The pleasure of a good conscience—the result of right action—is an idea as vividly and as long remembered by the child as any other. Coleridge has justly remarked, "It is a well known fact, that bright colors in motion both make and leave the strongest impressions on the eye. Nothing is more likely too, than that a vivid image, or visual spectrum thus originated, may become the link of association in recalling the feelings and images that had accompanied the original impression. But if we describe this in such lines as "They flash upon the inward eye,

Which is the bliss of solitude,"

In what words shall we describe the joy of retrospection, when the images and virtuous actions of a whole well spent life, pass before that conscience which is indeed the inward eye, which is indeed "the bliss of solitude."

HE IS THY BROTHER YET.

BY J. L. HOFFORD.

What though his erring feet
Have stumbled in the way,
And in a thoughtless hour
He has been led astray?
The great Creator's seal
Upon his brow is set,
And fallen though he be,
"He is thy brother yet."

Look with a tender eye
Upon that clouded brow,
And win him if you can
To paths of virtue now;
But oh! forbear to bend
Thy cold and distant gaze
Upon thy early friend,
The loved of other days.

Will not the happy hours
That bless'd your younger years,
When he was by thy side
In mirthfulness and tears—
Will not the thought of these
Within thy heart beget
A sad yet sweet response,
"He is thy brother yet."

And when in later life
Where science holds her sway,
You travel'd hand in hand
The devious winding way,
Until her hidden mines
Of rich mysterious lore,
Had paid you for the ease
You bartered to explore.

Behold the path of fame
That opens to your view,
And tremble when you tread
Its giddy mazes, too;
Oh, if you do not ask
Some higher power to guide,
Your ever varying bark,
As on the storm you ride.

That proud majestic step,
And lofty soul of thine,
May all be made to bow
To dark misfortune's shrine.
And then when trials come,
You never will regret
You owned the wayward one
To be "thy brother yet."

THE LITTLE CHIMNEY SWEEP.

This story is founded upon fact. In London, on the first of May, 17—, the Countess of Belville and her son, aged eleven years, were sitting in a magnificent saloon, at the head of a long table; around this table, filled with cakes, sugar-plums, &c., fifty little chimney-sweeps were seated, with clean hands and faces, and with joyful hearts, singing,

"Sweep ho! sweep ho!
From the bottom to the top."

You are astonished, perhaps, my little friends, to see these little chimney-sweeps at the table of so great a lady, and in such a beautiful room. I am going to tell you how this happened.

Some years before this anniversary day, Lady Belville had a son about five years old. She was a widow, and this little boy was her only child. Upon her little Charles she had placed all her affection, and this child had become the sole object of her thoughts and her cares. The great desire of the heart of the Countess was, that her son should become pious—truly converted to the Lord. She prayed without ceasing, that God would touch the heart of her child, and turn it towards him. The more she prayed, and the more pains she took, the further he seemed removed from the good end to which she wished to conduct him. He was idle, disobedient, and wilful; and but little disposed to attend to the subject of religion. Whenever the Bible was read to him, he became weary; thinking of other things, turning upon his seat, and gazing at the furniture of the room. When she required him to repeat his morning prayers, he said he wanted his breakfast first; and in the evening, that he was too sleepy, and wished to go to bed. He had no desire to be more wise, and had no wish to ask of God to teach him, and his mother could never be satisfied that he even ever prayed from the abundance of the heart. She prayed often herself, and she greatly desired that her son should pray also. In the hope of encouraging him, she composed prayers for him to recite each night; but Charles would never learn but one of them; after saying which he would quickly say, "Amen," and go to bed. "Lord, convert me—change my heart, teach me to love thee, and to love my brethren, as Jesus Christ loved us. Amen." The poor mother wept much, and prayed more; but we must say that she failed to correct him.

Her weakness imboldened Charles to disobedience, and he every day became more wicked. Lady Belville, seeing that her son changed not, began to doubt of the promises of God, and to her eyes he seemed to fail in his word, for he had said in many passages of the Bible, "Call upon me, and I will answer."

One day, as usual, she was plunged in tears. A servant came to tell her that for an hour they had sought for Charles about the house without finding him, that the outer gate had been kept fastened, and that the child had been all the morning amusing himself alone in the garden.

You can imagine the anxiety of his mother; she ran through the house, the garden, the neighborhood—but no person could give her any news of her son. She sent her servants to seek him through all streets of the city. She sent notices to the authorities; she published in all the papers the disappearance of her child, and offered a large reward to those who would give her tidings of him.

Twenty different persons came within a few days to bring her intelligence of several children they had seen; but no one brought her any satisfactory information. One had seen a child resembling the description of him who departed in a post-chaise; a person had seen another weeping in the streets, and asking for his mother; a third pretended to have seen a little boy of the same age, clothed in the same manner, amusing himself alone, casting stones into the water, upon the bank of a river, and he affirmed, that having passed a few moments afterward, he was not to be seen.

This last recital, either that it was more frightful, or the portrait given of the child had more resemblance to Charles, made a deep impression on the mind of the mother, who no longer doubted that it was her son, and that he had been drowned. She had, moreover, reason to believe it, as she learned, not long after, that the body of a child had been found upon the river, and buried in a little hamlet three leagues from the city. This time, well persuaded of the death of her son, the poor mother thought of nothing but to raise a tombstone to his memory, and to go there and weep, and pray to God to console her. She would have wished to persuade herself that her child was not very wicked; and that he had at least some good qualities to redeem his defects. She tried to remember one time in his life when the little Charles had uttered one prayer from the heart; she repeated to herself that which she had taught him; but alas! what came to the remembrance of the poor mother was always the recollection of his disobedience to the orders of his mother, his impatience during her serious reading, and his weariness during prayer. Oh! if the little Charles could have known how much grief he afterwards caused to his mother, how he would have wept! Perhaps he would not have been so wicked and disobedient. But to console herself, Lady Belville wished to have before her eyes the sweetest recollection that remained to her of her Charles; she caused to be sculptured upon a tomb a young child kneeling, and had inscribed upon the black marble this prayer: "Lord, convert me; change my heart, and teach me to love my brethren as Jesus Christ loved us. Amen."

Now one year, two years, three years passed away, without bringing any solace to the grief of the Countess: her only happiness upon this earth (next to her religious duties) was, whenever she met a child of the age that Charles would have been had he lived, to say to herself, that perhaps it might be her son, and that she was falsely persuaded of his death. She approached every such child, and examined him with care, questioned him with eager curiosity, and always ended by discovering with sorrow that the child was not her son!

One day, on returning from the country (where she had been passing some weeks) unexpected by her domestics, who were occupied in cleaning the apartments, she saw with surprise, on entering the saloon, a little chimney-sweep leaning against the jamb. He was very sorrowful; and, in spite of the soot which covered his face, might be seen his white skin and his extreme thinness. His head rested upon his breast; the poor child was weeping, and large tears rolled down his cheeks, leaving white traces upon his dark face.

"What is the matter, child!" said the countess.

"Nothing, madam—it is nothing. We are come to sweep your chimney. My master is upon the roof; he is coming down."

"But why do you weep?"

"It is because," trying to restrain his tears, "it is because ——."

"Take courage, my boy," said the good lady, "tell me thy troubles."

"It is because my master will beat me again."

"Again, you say, does he beat you often?"

"Almost every day, madam."

"And for what?"

"Because I don't earn money enough. When I return at night, after having cried out all the day, without having obtained any work, he says I have been idle; but I assure you, madam, it is not my fault. I cry out as loud as I can, and nobody calls me. I can't force people to let me sweep their chimneys."

"But, then, every day does not pass without work, and then thy master does not whip thee," said the countess.

"Well, madam, then he says to me that I don't climb fast enough—that I do not scrape hard enough; and when I come down he strikes me again; and all the time I do all that I can. More than once I have run the risk of falling; yesterday I hurt my leg; you see, madam, my pantaloons are worn through at the knees," and the poor boy wept bitterly.

"But, then, when you work better?" said the good lady.

"O when I work better he is content to scold me."

"And how much do you gain each day?"

"Nothing, only he gives me my food; but so little that I very often go to bed hungry."

"Ah! well, I will speak to thy master."

"Ah no, madam, he will beat me the more yet. I complain to nobody, but in the evening to ——."

"To whom?"

"To God."

"And what do you say to him?"

"I ask him to take me back to my mother."

"Thou hast, then, a mother."

"O! yes. And a very good mother; if I could go to her I should not be so unhappy."

"Do you know where she lives?"

"No: I recollect only one house, one garden. See! see! madam, it was like this. The trees of the garden were seen through the windows of the saloon, as you see those poplars in front. The chimney ran in the garden like this; the door in front, and my mother was like you, only she was handsome, and was not dressed in black as you are."

These words overcame Lady Belville. A shivering ran through her frame; her hands trembled; she could scarcely stand upon her feet. She sank upon the sofa; and taking the boy by one hand, she drew him near to her, and continued the conversation.

"And has the Lord never answered you, my child?"

"Not yet, madam; but he will hear me one day, I am sure."

"Sure! and why?"

"Because he has said so in his word."

"You have confidence, then, in prayer?"

"Yes, madam, because I have already been heard."

"In what?"

"I have asked God to make me better, and it seems to me that I am not so bad as formerly. Now, I do almost all that my master tells me. When I can I read a little in the New Testament, which a good gentleman gave me; and I pray every day with pleasure."

"With pleasure, do you say?"

"Yes, with pleasure; above all, when I repeat the prayer that my mother taught me by heart."

"And what is that prayer? tell it me, I beseech you."

The child knelt down, joined his hands, and, shedding some tears, he said, with a trembling voice:

"Lord, convert me; change my heart. Teach me to love thee, and to love my brethren, as Jesus Christ loved us. Amen."

"My child! my child!" cried the countess, pressing the boy in her arms; thou art my son Charles!"

"My mother!" said the child, "where is she? It was thus that she used to call me, Charles! Charles!"

"I am thy mother, I tell thee," and sobs stopped the voices of the mother and the child. They both wept, but they were tears of joy. The mother knelt by the side of the child; and exclaimed in the fullness of her heart, "My God! my God! forgive me for having offended thee by my unbelief. Pardon me for having doubted thy promises; forgive my impatience. I have prayed for his conversion, but I was unwilling to wait; and yet thou hast heard me, and answered my prayer. Teach me, O Lord, to confide in thee; teach me to remember that thou hearest always; but if thou deferrest to answer, it is in order to bless the better. But if thou dost not as we would wish, it is because thy ways are not as our ways, and thou knowest better than we what is for our good. Henceforth, I will say, Let thy will, not mine, be done."

Here the master sweep entered the saloon, and was much surprised to find his apprentice and this great lady both upon their knees. She asked him how he had become possessor of the child. He answered that a man, calling himself his father, placed him in his hands for a sum of money; that this man for some time past had been ill at the hospital, and perhaps was now dead.

Lady Belville now hastened to the hospital, and found a dying man, who confessed to her that about three years since he had stolen a child who was jumping over a garden wall; and that he committed this crime in the hope of gaining some money, by letting him out as a chimney-sweep to one of his vocation. Lady Belville, too happy at this moment to reproach him, and thinking that God had permitted this event in order that Charles might be placed in circumstances more favorable for the good of his soul, freely pardoned the unhappy man; and she saw him die, in the hope that God had pardoned him also.

From this time Charles was the joy of his mother; and she, to perpetuate this event in his history, assembled every year, on the first of May, (the day on which she found her son,) a large number of the sweeps of his age, to give them an entertainment, and to relate the history of Charles, to teach them that God always hears our prayers, and answers them; but oftentimes in a manner that we do not expect.

THE MOTHER AT PRAYER.

She enters her chamber. All is quiet and retired. There is no eye to witness her deep emotions, but that of Omnipotence; no ear to hear her earnest pleadings, but that of the Almighty. A sweet and sacred solemnity pervades her soul. She feels that she is about to commune with a Being who holds her destiny in his hands, but who notwithstanding his power and might, has encouraged her to come and will condescend and even delights to listen to her prayer. She bows her knee before him, and lifts her imploring eyes to heaven. O, hallowed moment! O, interesting sight! Listen to the language of her heart. For what does she plead? It is for her dear children. What does she ask for them? Not the riches of earth, nor the plaudits of surrounding admirers, nor the eternal gracefulness and beauty of youth. These are, in her estimation, of little value. Instead of these, she asks for her dear ones the protecting care of God, and for strength to discharge her duty toward them. With what anxious solicitude is each one remembered before him from the absent son on the boisterous ocean to the unconscious babe of her bosom. She asks, that from the earliest lispings of infancy, the best tribute of their hearts may ascend to their Creator. With what increased earnestness does she plead, as the recollection of the many snares and temptations which they must encounter crosses her anxious mind. It is then she feels her own weakness, and her entire dependence upon God. It is then she sees her need of divine assistance and support, and the vast importance of maternal prayer. It is then she fervently exclaims, "of myself I can do nothing; O thou who holdest the hearts of my children in thy hand, I bless thee for this resource." I know that the mother's prayer of faith will avail much. She takes courage as she remembers the many instances of the efficacy of maternal prayer. John the Baptist; who was filled with the Holy Ghost from his birth; Timothy that eminent minister of the New Testament; St. Augustine, the celebrated Bishop of Hippo; Doddridge, and many other subjects of praying mothers. With these examples before her, her hope brightens, her confidence is strengthened, and she determines that no difficulties shall dishearten her, no discouragements shake her firm reliance on the promises of God, which in the performances of her duty she feels to claim as her own. She remembers the perseverance of the Syro-Phenician woman, and she expects like her to hear at last, "O, woman, great is thy faith; be it unto thee as thou wilt." When the season of prayer is over, she leaves her chamber with a spirit refreshed and invigorated; with a mind untroubled. She has left all in the hands of God. The serenity of her soul is visible in her countenance. It sweetens every duty, and influences all her conduct. Praying mother, surely thou art blest.

TRUTH IS STRANGER THAN FICTION.

BY REV. G. W. WEEKS.

It was a beautiful morning in June, 1819, when I left my play at the call of my mother, took dinner from her, and received her usual counsel,—"Be a good boy to-day, George,"—and hastened away to school. O, how those days of innocence and joy come back on memory's wing. They are green and sunny spots in this cold world. They are springs and running brooks to the parched and weary traveler over life's desert. O, the memories of early days gone forever, yet loved for what they were.

On my way to school, I lingered for a moment beneath a lofty elm, whose spreading branches shaded the neat little cottage of the widow W., and sat down till her son, my schoolmate, would be ready to go with me. He was later than usual. While he tarried I heard several loud words, and casting my eyes toward the house, I saw Mary, the widow's only daughter, standing in the door, smoothing her long tresses which fell in rich profusion around her neck. Her mother soon stood beside her, and it was evident that something uncommon was stirring the passions of both mother and child. Billy soon made his appearance from a back door, and I rose from my grassy seat to depart, when I heard the mother utter, which even now seems to vibrate on my ear, the following solemn sentence:—"Mary, I tell you, once for all, if you follow that vile seducer, and leave your mother in her old age, you will break my heart, and ruin yourself, both soul and body."

Mary was a child of sorrow and care, for her father, who had for some years been dead. She was left, however, with ample means for the support of herself and these two children.

Mary at this time was only seventeen;—young, handsome, thoughtless and gay,—with little knowledge of the world, and less of the human heart. Billy was twelve, a good boy, sober and thoughtful; and his love for his mother and sister was little less than adoration. Poor Billy! he died before sixteen summers had cast their light upon him.

There was in our neighborhood a gentleman dancing-master. He was just like most men of his profession, and just what such professions are calculated to make of any man—conceited, hollow, heartless, and intemperate. It was against the wiles of such a man, that I had heard the mother warning her lovely daughter. But with this creature, despite the fearful warnings of her mother, the gay Mary soon eloped.

Sadness and sorrow veiled the poor mother's dwelling for the sunlight of youth and innocence which had cheered her heart so long, had set forever—had set in shame and infamy! The childless, broken-hearted mother, soon followed her darling boy to the grave. Poor woman! The iron had entered her soul. The last we knew of the poor deluded Mary, she was in New York city.

Years rolled away.

"They never wait for mortals' care or bliss."

Time changes all things earthly, and, ah, how sad the change we sometimes see! Time's changes had obliterated from my memory all recollection of this family, except so much of it as might still linger in its secret silent chambers.

* * * * * *

It was a bitter day in February, 1834. The storm of the preceding night had increased to a perfect tempest of snow and hail, and I was compelled to give over my journey, and halt for the day, six miles north of Providence, R. I. All day the storm had raged without abatement, and approaching night threw a sullen gloom over earth and sky. I stood by a window gazing on the scene before me. "God help the poor traveler," thought I "who has no shelter in such a night." I was just turning away, when I beheld a poor horse endeavoring to make his way into an adjacent shed. He halted. In an old box, an apology for a sleigh, from beneath snow, hay, and rags, issued a man and a woman, followed by five children. I will not attempt to describe the dress or appearance of this miserable group. They were the wretched workmanship of intemperance, and its attendant vices. At first, the landlord refused them admittance, but another stranger and myself, plead the cause of suffering humanity, and they entered the bar-room. The man was intoxicated, and while the woman was holding in her arms, and endeavoring to warm the stiffened limbs of her infant, the big tear ran down her pale and care-worn cheeks. I gazed on the scene before me, with feeling of unmingled pity. At length she ventured to look up, and for a moment our eyes met. A thrill, like a shock of electricity, passed through my whole frame. A spark had fallen on memory's altar, and was lighting up her slumbering fires.

"Where is your native place?" I asked. It was not until I had repeated the question several times, that I obtained an answer. At length, with faltering voice she said, "P., in New Hampshire, was my home."

"And your mother was widow W." I added. With some effort she rose from her seat, cast into my face a searching glance, reeled for a moment, then sunk down on the floor. With some effort she was restored to consciousness, when I learned from her own lips, the following brief history of one, who by the curse of disobedience and ingratitude, had been made to drink deep of the waters of misery and despair.

Soon after arriving in New York she began to see things in their true light. In less than a year, her paramour had become so degraded as to be unable to support her, and she was obliged to earn a scanty subsistence with her own hands. Step by step the guilty man descended to the lowest depths of vice, infamy and crime.—For two years he was confined in prison, while she was reduced to the most deplorable state of poverty and wretchedness. She had no home, no friends, no employment, and was left in a land of strangers to struggle with life, death, and misery. Sometimes she was the object of public, sometimes of private charity. She had embraced the meanest and most servile employments to keep from starvation.

At length her guilty companion was released from prison. They sought and found each other. She had since endured years of shame and suffering with him, which none can know but those who feel them. She had at length prevailed on him to leave the city and go into the country; but wherever they wandered, the wages of sin had been his portion and the misery consequent upon disobedience to a kind parent, hers.

They were now endeavoring to make their way back to New Hampshire, in the vain hope of relieving a guilty conscience, and finding sympathy among early friends. To return and die among her native hills, seemed to be her only wish. "To return," said she, "and lay me down on my mother's grave and die, is all I ask. O, for that hour." Her heart was bursting! Sobs choked her utterance. I turned away and wept. Alas! alas for poor human nature. My heart bleeds while I rehearse its tales of wo. I weep over the miseries which fell to her lot, and many of these I feel are the direct results of the sin of disobedience to a parent's wishes.

I have been a constant traveler for more than eight years out of my short life, and have seen misery in all its various forms, but few instances have more deeply affected my heart than the one I have related.

When shall we learn wisdom from the past, and by timely caution, save ourselves from the mournful fate of the [illegible] children heed the command, "Obey your parents in the Lord." [Morning Star.

THE HAPPY MATCH.

'Now,' said Harry Hemphill to his young wife, when they went to house-keeping, 'it's my business to bring money into the house, and yours to see that none goes foolishly out of it.'

This was the agreement with which they set forward in the world. He chose her, first, because he loved her; and in the second place, because he knew she was sensible, economical, and industrious—just the reasons which should influence every sensible man in his choice now. And he thought it best that each should have a distinct sphere of action. Their interests were one and indivisible, consequently each had the same motives to act well the allotted part. His business called for his whole attention; he wished therefore, to pursue it undistracted by other cares. For himself, he looked for happiness only at home; there he expected a supply for all his wants,—and he was of course not disposed to spend any thing abroad, in pursuit of what he thought every reasonable man ought to enjoy in the bosom of his own family.—Her duties being all domestic, she was able to accomplish them better by turning her attention to them. Her husband's business-doing habits, his temperate and correct life, had all the power of example; increasing her esteem, and doubling her anxiety to deserve his.

They had married without waiting to get rich. They neither distrusted Providence nor each other. With little besides health, and a disposition to improve it, they had, nevertheless, a strong confidence of final success, which prudent resolutions inspire in those who feel that they have perseverance enough to adhere to them. Thus they began in the world.

To attach a man to his home, it is necessary that his home should have some attractions. Harry Hemphill's had. There he sought repose after the toil and weariness of the day, and there he found it. When perplexed and low spirited he retired thither, and amid the soothing influence of its quiet and peaceful shades, he forgot the heartlessness of the world and all the wrongs of men.—When things went ill with him, he found a solace in the sunshine of affection that in the domestic circle beamed upon him, and chased every cloud from his brow. However others treated him, there was always kindness, confidence, and esteem. If others deceived him, and hypocrisy [illegible] upon him, there all was sincerity—that sincerity of the heart which makes amends for suffering, and wins the troubled spirit from misanthropy.

Nothing so directly tends to make a wife a good housekeeper, a good domestic economist, as that kindness on the part of the husband which speaks the language of approbation, and that careful and well directed industry which thrives and gives strong promise that her care and prudence will have a profitable issue. And Mary Hemphill had this token and this assurance.

Harry devoted himself to business with steady purpose and untiring zeal. He obtained credit by his plain and honest dealing, custom by his faithful punctuality and constant care, friends by his obliging deportment and accommodating disposition. He gained the reputation of being the best workman in the village. None were ever deceived who trusted to his work; he always drove his business a little before-hand, for, he said, things go badly when the cart gets before the horse.

I noticed once a little incident which illustrated his character. A thrifty old farmer was accosted, in the road at the end of the village, by a youngster who was making a great dash in business, and who wanted the loan of a few hundred dollars. The wily old man was perfectly ignorant where it could be had, and sided off from him as fast as he could. He rode directly down to Hemphill's, and told him that he had a sum of money to loan, and he wished he would take it—the payments should be made easy, just as would suit him. 'Indeed,' replied Harry, 'you have come to a bad market; I have a little cash to spare myself, and have been looking round these two weeks for a good opportunity of putting it out.'

While Harry was prospering in his business, all went like clockwork at home. The family expenditures were carefully made; not a farthing was wasted, not a script lost. The furniture was all neat and useful, rather than ornamental. The table plain, frugal, but wholesome and well spread. Little went either to the seamstress or the tailor. No extravagance in dress, no costly company keeping, no wasteful use of time in too much visiting, and yet the whole town praised Mary Hemphill and loved her. She was kind without ostentation, sociable without being troublesome.

And while few people lived more comfortably, none lived more economically.

The result of such management can never disappoint the reasonable expectation of those who build upon them—even the angry frown of misfortune is almost put at defiance. A vantage ground is gained which the storm seldom reaches, and a full reward comes in its proper time to crown the meed of lives thus spent.

The music of Harry's tools was in full play on the morning that I left the village for a distant residence. It was not yet sunrise; and as the coach bore us by, the door was open, and the breakfast smoking upon the table. Mary, in her neat morning dress and white apron, blooming in health and loveliness, was busy amid her household affairs; and a stranger who chanced to be my fellow passenger to the city, observed it, and said, "There is a thriving family—my word for it." And he spoke well.—There are certain signs about those who are working all things right, that cannot be mistaken by the most casual observer.

On my return to Aylesbury many years afterwards, I noticed a beautiful country residence on the banks of the river, surrounded by all the elegance of wealth and taste. Richly cultivated fields spread themselves out on every side as far as the eye could reach; flocks and herds were scattered in every direction. It was a splendid scene. The sun was just setting beyond the western hills—and while groups of neatly dressed children sported on the adjacent school-house green, the mellow notes of the flute mingled with their noisy mirth. "There," said an old friend, "lives Harry Hemphill; that is his farm, and these are his cattle; here is his school-house, and these are his own and some orphan children of his adoption, whom he educated at his own expense; having made a noble fortune by his industry and prudence, he spends his large income in deeds of charity; and he and Mary mutually give each other the credit of doing all this."

My heart expanded then—it expands still when I think of them. And I pen this simple history in the hope that as it is imitable, some who read it will attempt to imitate it. [Emporium.

THE CHRISTIAN SABBATH.

From the Religious Recorder, published at Syracuse, N. Y.

It is curious and instructive to observe the sympathy which some men manifest for the Jews and Seventh-day Baptists. Whenever there is an effort made to induce our government not to require labor on the Lord's Day, they are in perfect panics lest these people should be denied their civil rights, and have their consciences wounded. As if a cessation from labor on the first day of the week must needs disturb those who keep the seventh! As if a Christian government could not refrain from violating the Christian Sabbath without trampling on the rights of the abettors of Judaism! As if a community of Christians were bound to keep the canals open and the stages and cars running the whole length of the land, seven days in the week, just to accommodate a handful of Jews and Sabbatarians, in observing the seventh day as the Sabbath!

Verily some men have sympathies wonderfully tender, on some points of Christian duty. Because there is a handful of people among us who wish to preserve the usages of Judaism, therefore the government must habitually violate the Christian Sabbath, and a Christian people must have no Sabbath at all.

Seriously, we have no great fellowship for this kind of sympathy. It looks too much like an effort to block up the way of those who are laboring to secure the rights of our boatmen and other public carriers; the right of all men to have a Sabbath. Of this right tens of thousands are deprived, by the action of our national and state governments. They have no Sabbath at all, and cannot have, whilst they continue in their present employment.

What a perfect burlesque is it, when such a question is pending, to raise the question, whether Jews or Christians keep the right day of the week! The demand from thousands of burdened hearts, is for a Sabbath! Give us one day in seven for rest and moral improvement. This request our government resists; and when we complain of the injustice and wickedness of such denial, we are coolly challenged to furnish proof, that the first day of the week is the Christian Sabbath.

We cannot regard such challenges in any other light, than that of hostility to this benevolent movement. Men who can coolly affirm that it is just as right to drive a stage or run a canal boat on the Lord's day as to preach the gospel, cannot be men of great scrupulousness in regard to God's requirements, nor over anxious to know his will in this matter. They merely make use of weapons which good men have furnished to their hands, with which to fight against the people of God, and the institutions of the gospel.

It has often seemed to us, that, if our Seventh-day brethren would realize the use that is made of their arguments against the first day of the week, they would be less anxious to push their views into notice; and be content to enjoy their Sabbath, as they now do, unmolested. Their rights are secured by special enactment. Why need they complain? Why should it disturb them to see us laboring to bring about a reform in practice among the mass of the people, who, if they ever have any Sabbath, must and will have only the Christian Sabbath?

But the question has been raised whether Christians have a Sabbath by divine appointment? and there is hardly an infidel writer in the land who does not attempt to argue the question and come out in favor of the utter abolishment of our strict and holy Sabbaths. Should not every Christian be prepared to meet their cavils and answer their arguments?

1. The following reference to the heads of argument, may assist those who wish to examine the question for themselves.

The Sabbath was appointed for all men, therefore Christians have a Sabbath. "The Sabbath," says our Saviour, "was made for man." Not for Jews, not for a particular age, but for man. It was instituted at the creation, and designed for the whole human race.

It was written on stone, as one of the commands which were never to perish. It was never abolished, and is therefore as binding as either of the ten.

2. A change in the day alters not at all the force of the command. It was originally every seventh day. It is so now. After six days of labor comes the day of rest, the Sabbath of the Lord, and the command—"Remember the Sabbath day"—applies just as fully to the Christian, as it did to the Jewish day of rest and devotion. Whatever day of the seven is fixed upon as the Sabbath, the command of God is still binding in all the sacredness of its original import.

3. Christ, as Lord of the Sabbath, had authority to change the day of its observance. And he had a right to do it, either by precept or example. If he has sanctioned the keeping of the first day, by his own example, by the example of his apostles and primitive churches, and by the outpouring of his spirit; then the first day of the week is the Sabbath for all Christians, and should be regarded by all, as holy to the Lord.

What then are we to understand by Christ's rising on the first day of the week? Did he not, on that day, finish his work, and rest from his labors, as God originally rested on the seventh?

What are we to understand by his meeting his disciples on that day, and again on the eighth day after, (See Jr. 20. 18, and 26.) The expression eight days after, evidently means, according to the Hebrew idiom, on the eighth day after, i. e. the next first day of the week. Was there no meaning in all this?

And how shall we account for the fact, that the first great outpouring of the spirit was on the first day of the week. The day of Pentecost was on the 50th day after the Passover Sabbath, See Lev. 23. 15, 16. This was the day which Christ selected for sending the Comforter, and setting up in a visible and public manner, the Christian church. Can any one doubt that he ment to make this the great day for his church—the Christian Sabbath? Is it strange that on this day the disciples ever after, came together to break bread (Acts 20. 7,) that it was called by the way of distinction, THE LORD'S DAY, (Rev. 1. 10,) and that it was observed by all the early Christians, as holy to the Lord! Have we not, in these facts, a clear intimation of the will of Christ, and conclusive evidence that he intended, in a quiet, yet effectual manner, to change the day of the Sabbath without altering, or at all imparing the force of the law, which binds all men to keep one day in seven holy to the Lord.

Now be it remembered, that we advocate no coercive laws to bind the consciences of the Jews, and Judaizing Christians. Let them enjoy the seventh day and work on the first, if they will. But we do insist that a Christian government should not make laws, requiring a Christian people to break the CHRISTIAN SABBATH. Ninety-nine hundredths of the people will either keep the first day of the week, or none at all. The question is, shall they be permitted to keep this day, or shall they have no Sabbath at all?

Will our legislators dare say again as they have said hitherto, there shall be no Sabbath, on our canals and railroads? Will the people uphold them in this trampling on their rights, and make no resistance?

Remarks.

☞ The foregoing article is a fair specimen of the spirit and logic of the advocates for legislative action in favor of Sunday. We hope, therefore, that it will be carefully read, and allowed to have its full weight. It appears that the editor of the Recorder finds in his own village a brother editor, whom he has difficulty in convincing that a law ought to be passed in favor of closing the canal locks on the first day of the week. Considerable has been said on both sides of the question, in which, if we mistake not, the Recorder comes off second best. Hence this long tirade against some unnamed person, which is evidently aimed for the most part at the before-mentioned intractable editor. Now we do not wish to intermeddle with the quarrels of other men; yet there are several statements in this article which so palpably misrepresent Sabbath-keepers and pervert the truth, that we cannot refrain from saying a few words about them.

The first statement of the question at issue, although quite specious, is altogether false. It represents the friends of legislative action as endeavoring only to induce the government not to require labor on Sunday, whereas their endeavor is to induce the government also by closing the locks, to forbid labor on that day. There is a wide difference between not requiring labor, and forbidding labor—a difference which in this controversy seems to be entirely overlooked. We are not aware that any man is now required to labor on Sunday. As to the boatmen, who seem to be the principal objects of sympathy, they are perfectly at liberty to lie by on any or every day of the week if they please, so that they are not required to labor. As to the lock-tenders, they are perfectly at liberty to resign their offices if they have scruples about discharging their duties; so that there is no more propriety in representing them as being required to labor, than there would be in representing the man who thinks he can make more money by working on Sunday than by resting as being thereby required to work on Sunday. All this talk, therefore, about the government's requiring labor on Sunday, is both gratuitous and untrue. Indeed, when we read such an assertion as this, "Our boatmen and other carriers have no Sabbath at all, and cannot have, whilst they continue in their present employment," we can hardly help pronouncing it a deliberate falsehood. It is certainly a sort of religious cant with which we have no fellowship.

In the same paragraph, the editor, in his pious indignation, vents his spleen by saying, "As if a Christian government could not refrain from violating the Christian Sabbath, without trampling on the rights of the abettors of Judaism! As if a community of Christians were bound to keep the canals open, and the stages and cars running the whole length of the land, seven days in the week, just to accommodate a handful of Jews and Sabbatarians, in observing the seventh day as the Sabbath!" If the editor means to include Sabbath-keepers among the "abettors of Judaism," we have nothing to say in reply, since we should deem such an allusion, in view of the facts in the case, too contemptible to merit a reply. But in regard to keeping the stages and cars running seven days in the week to accommodate a handful of Jews and Sabbatarians, we will relieve him of all anxiety on that point by assuring him, that Sabbatarians are the very last men to ask such a favor. Even while their opponents have been pressing their wishes upon the attention of legislators, Sabbath-keepers have never seriously asked that the stages or canal boats might either run on the first day, or lie still on the seventh day. They would, of course, be exceedingly glad to have all secular business laid aside on the seventh day, the Sabbath, out of regard to that commandment which says, "In it thou shalt not do any work." But they would never run to the Legislature for help to enforce their own theological dogmas or practices. We believe it would be well for the advocates of the first day to follow their example in this respect.

Does the editor of the Recorder really think it a burlesque, to raise the question whether Jews or Christians keep the right day of the week? He acknowledges, that "there is hardly an infidel in the land who does not attempt to argue the question, and come out in favor of the abolishment of our strict and holy Sabbaths." But does he not know, that his own course tends most directly and powerfully to this result? If Christians may abolish that part of the commandment which points out the particular day of the Sabbath, why may not others abolish that part which points out any day? Or, if Christians may lay aside the Word of God, and attempt to sustain a Sabbath on the mere ground of expediency, why may not infidels use their wits upon this question of expediency, and come to the conclusion that no Sabbath is needed? They have done it to an alarming extent, and in perfect consistency with the example which has been set them. It is hardly possible, in this day, to reprove an intelligent man for breaking the Sunday, without having the question raised at once, By what authority are we required to keep that day? This question is raised alike by believers and unbelievers, and often to the confusion of those who would secure a better observance of the first day. In such circumstances, it is the height of folly to shift the issue, and assert that it is a burlesque to raise the question whether Jews or Christians keep the right day. It is not uncommon, we know, for those who can not answer the arguments of opponents, to speak of them as unimportant, or endeavor to turn them into ridicule. But such an unmanly course always injures the cause it is designed to promote.

"It has often seemed to us," says the writer of the article under consideration, "that if our Seventh-day brethren would realize the use that is made of their arguments against the first day of the week, they would be less anxious to push their views into notice." We have no doubt of this assertion; indeed, we should expect that it would seem exactly so to a man who advocates the views of which we have spoken. And we should expect farther, that a man with such principles, should he find himself among Mahommedans where the sixth day of the week is the popular Sabbath, would cheerfully adopt that, and wonder that any body should labor to extend a different opinion. Nay more—we should expect him, if he happened to be in a land where idolatry and injustice were popular, at once to fall in with the prevailing practices, and wonder that any body should oppose them. But we have not so learned Christian duty; and do not therefore feel called upon to withhold a truth for fear of its consequences, or to uphold a falsehood for the sake of its advantages.

—But the "heads of the argument" for the perpetuity and change of the Sabbath, with which the editor has favored us, appear to be the greatest curiosity of the whole article. The great proof of the perpetuity of the Sabbath, is the declaration of Christ, that "the Sabbath was made for man," and the fact that the Sabbath law was written on tables of stone—all of which, of course, goes in favor of the seventh day, which is the only Sabbath known in the Scriptures. Next we are told, that "a change in the day alters not at all the force of the command." If by this is meant that any man or set of men may fix upon some day of their own devising, and still retain the force of the command, we deny the position. If it is meant, that God can change the day, without destroying the command, we ask for the proof that he has done so. This proof is professedly derived from the example of Christ and the apostles. But there is not a single example nor word which necessarily implies the sacredness of the first day, much less the abolition or change of the seventh. Indeed, the writer himself does not venture to assert such a thing. He simply refers to a variety of disconnected facts, and asks if they do not intimate the will of Christ. We say they do not; and we defy any man to prove that they do.

In conclusion, we have one question, and only [illegible] and we hope his next article on the subject of the Sabbath will furnish us an answer to it. It is this: The fourth commandment says, "the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God; in it thou shalt not do any work." Now by what authority, Mr. Editor, do you work on the seventh day?

"LIBERALITY."

It was distinctly asserted by an English statesman, in discussing the Maynooth Bill, "that whenever, in matters of State, questions of religion arise, these questions must be decided upon political and not theological grounds." This policy seems to have been carried out very extensively by the British Government in some of its Colonies. In India, for instance, it is not long since the priests of Juggernaut, the dancing women, and the car of the idol, which annually crushes hundreds of victims in its hideous progress, were all established and paid by the State. The taxes upon the pilgrims who attended the festival of the idol, were a source of immense revenue to the British Government; hence the superstition was countenanced and encouraged, at the expense of the most palpable inconsistency.

But a more recent instance of favoring superstition for State purposes has occurred in the island of Ceylon. According to a formal treaty, the British Government is bound to maintain and protect the religion of Buddh in that island, and has the privilege of appointing the priests, disposing of the temple patronage, and holding in sacred keeping the tooth and other relics of Buddh. Not long ago several Siamese priests visited the island for the purpose of seeing and worshiping these relics, on which occasion the tooth of Buddh was brought forth with much ado, by a government agent, in the presence of an English lord, and held up to the adoring gaze of these visitors from Siam.

Such facts are a mournful commentary upon the doctrine that in a Christian State 'questions of religion must be decided upon political grounds.' They show that the Queen of England, while she is the head of the Church in her own country, is also the nursing mother of the worst forms of superstition and idolatry in foreign countries. This is "liberality" with a witness.

A CATECHISM of the Distinctive Doctrines of the Evangelical Protestant and the Roman Catholic Church, with appropiate Scripture proof-texts. New York: printed for the Trade, by Henry Ludwig.

This is a reprint of a work compiled by several ministers of the district Synod of Duisburg, Germany. We have been interested and pained in examining it—interested with the clear statement of the way of salvation by Christ in distinction from the doctrine of salvation by penances and good works, but pained at the manifest inconsistencies of those who attempt to oppose the practice and theory of Catholics upon certain other points. In regard to "Tradition," for instance, we are gravely told in this book, that the Romish Church teaches, that "the doctrine of Christ and his Apostles, propagated merely by word of mouth, and thus transmitted to subsequent teachers of the Church, and by them recorded in writing, is as much of Divine authority as the Holy Scriptures, and implicit credit is to be yielded to them." On the other hand, we are as gravely told in the very next paragraph, that Protestants teach, that "whatsoever is at variance with Scripture, is to be unconditionally rejected, even though it have been taught by ancient fathers, whole councils, and many Popes." Now mark these two views, and compare them with the common mode of advocating the claims of the first day. Do Protestants claim an express precept of Scripture for the observance of the first day, or for the neglect of the seventh day? Never. Do they not rest satisfied with evidence for the day, which they claim no higher authority for, than the teaching of "Christ and his Apostles, propagated merely by word of mouth, and thus transmitted to subsequent teachers of the church, and by them recorded in writing?" Most certainly they do. How then can they cry out so vociferously against that doctrine of the Catholic Church? They cannot with consistency. Indeed, we believe it would be impossible for an intelligent Protestant, after attempting to support the claims of the first day by the common arguments, immediately to stand up before an intelligent Catholic and reiterate the cardinal doctrine of Protestantism without blushing for his own inconsistency. To such thoughts did a perusal of the book under consideration lead us. We believe it will affect others in a similar manner.

GREAT CELEBRATION AT UNION COLLEGE.

Tuesday of last week, the 22d inst., was the day chosen for the Semi-Centennial Celebration of the Foundation of Union College, at Schenectada. At an early hour, a Procession was formed at the West College, and proceeded to the church where the public exercises were to take place. In the procession, places were assigned for the various classes graduated since 1797, each class being preceded by a boy bearing a little flag with the year of graduation. Several classes had no representa[illegible] represented. The class of 1818 was represented by two Bishops of the Episcopal Church—Doane of N. J., and Potter of Pa.

At the church the exercises were in a high degree entertaining. After singing and prayer, an eloquent address was delivered by Rev. JOSEPH SWEETMAN, one of the three who graduated the first commencement, nearly half a century ago.

He described what Schenectada was fifty years ago; the customs of the people, their merry-makings and holidays, their Santy-Clause and Paas Pinxter too. At that period Dutch was the generally spoken language. The buildings too were of a different style, the ends fronting on the street, where there was a large stoop which, on summer evenings, was filled with those who enjoyed social intercourse. At that time Schenectada was on the verge of civilization. Early in the history of this State a controversy was carried on about the location of a College—Albany, Hudson and other places wanted to have it. At last Schenectada was chosen, and as the object of the College was to give toleration and forbearance, it was called Union College. After some further account of the history of the College, Mr. Sweetman delivered a somewhat lengthy essay on the Culture of the Social Affections.

DR. POTTER, who that day resigned the Professor's chair for the office of Bishop of Pennsylvania, then delivered an address which has seldom, if ever, been equaled on any such occasion. We stand to-day between those of the last and those of the future half century. During the past our Mother has been advocating and illustrating progress. Fifty years ago an infant, to-day a strong matron. Fifty years from to-day she will stand the venerated mother of thousands.

Of her 231 first benefactors only five are now living. Of the 95 names on her charter only one, the youngest, Mr. Van Ingen, remains. Of the 24 original trustees only one remains, Mr. Cochran, who comes from Oswego to assist us to-day.

Of the 56 Trustees of the College 46 are gone to the Spirit Land. Three or four Presidents are dead, as well as 9 of her 21 Professors. Death has struck at us even since we issued notices for this meeting. John Reed has been borne from us, and another who graduated but one year ago full of hope and promise is dead. W. D. Tallmadge, son of N. P. Tallmadge, who graduated just 30 years ago.

But where are those who were in active life when this College commenced? They are gone—yet death fails to make an impression on our College. Death has taken five hundred of our family, but thrice five hundred have arisen to take their places.

The orator then went into a long comparison of 1795 and 1845. Bonapartes and Wellingtons and Bluchers have yielded to Herschells and Liebigs. During that last fifty years what have been done in the arts and sciences? The blind have been made to see—the dumb to speak—reason has been wooed back to the shattered brain, and the spirit of equality and justice to all classes of the people has been strengthened.

He then went into an eloquent and highly finished defence of College Education, properly defined and guarded,—and concluded by making a reference to himself and his departure from College to other scenes. The sternest in the church wept as he recalled the scenes of his happiness here. It was thirty years since he came to this city a stranger, and he found friends; he found a home; and he found a treasure that brightened that home. He now leaves that home and that treasured dust for new and untried associations.

The choir then sung, and after the benediction was pronounced the meeting adjourned.

After the exercises at the Church, the Procession again formed, and proceeded to the beautiful grove back of the space between the colleges, where a sumptuous repast had been prepared under two tents, and plates were laid for 850 persons. The exercises here, (after dinner was disposed of,) consisted in singing odes prepared for the occasion, listening to short speeches, toasts, anecdotes of olden time, etc. etc. Some of the anecdotes and historical statements were exceedingly amusing, and several of the speeches were eloquent and stirring. We have only room for a notice of one, which shall close our account of the celebration:

To Chancelor Walworth's toast, which was, "Our venerable and venerated President, who understands the true secret of teaching others to govern, by teaching them to govern themselves," the venerable Dr. Nott responded. He was dressed in a long black coat and a blue or purple cap, from beneath which his silver hair trembled in the breeze. No one could see him without mourning that his life must end so soon, for

> "Upon his aged temples grow
> The blossoms of the grave."

My children, said he, I come at the request of many pupils. Though sickness told me not to speak, yet I could not refuse a request coming from my children and their children. My children, we have but one life to live, and therefore let us live it well. Man is mortal. Institutions such as this never die. By them we transmit to other generations our influences. They have done much good by reviving letters, but more by reviving the reading of the Bible. Where has the Bible gone and has not carried with it love of arts, love of letters, love of liberty? The Bible alone meets the case of man. Chemistry can never discover an Elixir which can reanimate the urn—but the Bible teaches us how life shall spring from death—how mortality shall be clothed with immortality.

When fifty years more shall have passed away others will come up here—I shall not be here. Many of you, my children, will not be here—be it so. We shall separate after the ceremonies are ended, but not for ever—so shall we meet in another world. I have been young, but now am old, yet I declare, that had I to live my life over again, I would live more than I have done for my God and my country. Were I to live ever so short a time, even if no longer than the merest ephemera floating in the sunbeam, I would rather soar with the eagle and be lost among the stars, than meanly to grovel in the earth with things that perish.

Some of you will be alive at that next Jubilee, when I shall be forgotten. The cold earth shall soon rest on this aged bosom; and this arm shall be cold and senseless to the appeals of the poor and the distressed. But you, my children, see to it, that while you live the poor shall never want a friend, nor the defenceless defenders. And should it be my happiness to reach—oh! happy thought—those mansions of bliss, let every angel bear tidings from Earth to Heaven of your good works. Let it be told in those Mansions that other Brainards, and Hales, and Howards, and Granville Sharpes, have arisen. Nor feel your work accomplished till misery and vice shall cease on this planet, and virtue and happiness be universal. I shall close these remarks, my children, by offering the following sentiment, "The Alumni of Union College—distinguished less by the honors received than conferred—having rendered their Alma Mater, while in the greenness of youth, venerable by their deeds."

FIRST OF AUGUST.—This day, which commemorates one of the sublimest events ever witnessed—the emancipation of eight hundred thousand slaves in the British West India Islands—is to be extensively celebrated in different parts of the country. It should be joyfully remembered by every man who hates oppression and rejoices in the triumph of justice and freedom. It ought to be made the occasion of new and more determined attacks upon that abominable system, which now curses and disgraces our otherwise happy land.

THE REV. MR. HERSCHELL, from England, who has been lecturing in different parts of this country for some time past in regard to the Jews, his visit to their land, and his labors among them, sailed for home by the steamer of the 16th inst. We learn from the Jewish Chronicle, that the Board of the American Society for Meliorating the Condition of the Jews, passed resolutions expressive of their sincere and hearty gratitude, and also appropriating $250 to be expended by Mr. Herschell in such manner as he shall deem best calculated to promote the cause of Israel. Mr. H. declined receiving any personal remuneration. The Board however urged his acceptance of a copy of the Encyclopedia Americana, "as a memorial of his visit to this land of the West, and of the many friends he leaves behind him here."

JEWISH MISSION-HOUSE AND CHAPEL.—The Jewish Chronicle for July informs us, that the Society for Meliorating the Condition of the Jews has just established a Mission-House in New York, for the purpose of furnishing a home to such Jewish inquirers as may need shelter from persecution, and instruction in the principles of the Gospel. The house is to contain a chapel for worship, and is to be under the care of an able Superintendent. Students for the ministry from among the Jews are to receive special encouragement. Others are to receive a support in part from the funds of the Society, and arrangements will be made to supply them with work so far as possible.

The New Orleans Picayune of July 20, brings intelligence that the people of Texas, in Convention assembled, have almost unanimously accepted the terms of Annexation proposed by the United States, so that "the question of Annexation has been finally consumated."

THE EVERY-DAY CHRISTIAN—No. 1. By Rev T. H. GALLAUDET, late Principal of the American Asylum for the education of the Deaf and Dumb. New York: Paine and Burgess—1845—pp. 142.

This is a beautiful little volume, designed to delineate certain traits of Christian character, and lead the reader to a consideration of certain every-day duties, which are too often overlooked. It points out in a masterly manner the indissoluble connection of the various pursuits of man in this life with his eternal existence beyond the grave. No person can breathe the sacred air which it throws around the common duties of every day without being benefited. We heartily recommend it to a reading.

General Intelligence.

THE WAR IN ST. DOMINGO.—We learn from the correspondent of the Merchants' Exchange, by brig Almatia, from St. Domingo city, July 7th, that on the 16th of June the Dominican army started from Las Matas and stopped at Commendador, a Dominican post; from thence on the 17th at 6 o'clock, A. M. they marched in three strong columns, the first under the command of Gen. F. Alfaii, to cut off the enemy's retreat; the second under Lieut. F. Pimenter, the third, being Artillery with two field pieces, to attack on the right, under Gen. Duverge. At 8 o'clock on the same morning, the third column halted in front of the enemy, forming in order of battle, and giving time for the first column to arrive and cut off the retreat of the enemy. At 10 o'clock the signal was given, and the general attack commenced. The firing commenced at three different points at the same time. After a battle of about two hours, and a well-sustained fire from the enemy, the Dominican army made a furious charge, completely routed their opponents, who abandoned four different points which they had previously occupied. Up to the 22d, the number ascertained to be killed, amounted to 100, amongst whom were two officers. Fourteen prisoners were taken, 7 officers, a surgeon, and 6 non-commissioned officers and privates. Some munitions of war were also seized. On the Dominican side, 2 were killed and 8 wounded; and on the 19th they were on the march, with orders to attack a village about a half a day's journey to the westward; but the enemy had fled, and the place was taken possession of. An official report of General Duverge, from Las Caobas, under date of June 25th, also states that the van-guard had taken that place, and were in undisputed possession; and that there was news that Lieut. F. Faberas, commander of Ondoballe, had attacked and completely routed the enemy there. [Boston Atlas.

THE FUGITIVE SLAVES.—The Herald correspondent at Baltimore favors us with the following tidings from the captured fugitives and their captors and masters.

"A meeting has been held by the citizens of Charles County, from where the gang of runaway slaves recently arrested at Rockville started. They are overrunning with fire and brimstone for the Northern abolitionists, and are full of thanks for the bravery, activity, and patriotism of the citizen soldiery at Rockville. Two of the negroes butchered by these brave Bachanalians have since died, and others are in a very precarious condition. The cause of their death is attributable as much to the want of attention as to the brutality of their captors. You will see by the resolutions passed at the meeting, that the preachers are not to be allowed to instruct the slaves in religion unless in the presence of their masters, and as they scorn the subject generally, they will but seldom find it convenient to afford them an opportunity by being present. The free negroes are also to be driven out of the county by the first of December next, without either law, judge or jury. What a patriotic, law-abiding people the slaveholders of Maryland are.

ANTI-RENT EXPENSES.—The 'Freeholder' gives a statement of the expenses incurred by the Anti-Renters in the trial of Big Thunder and others at Hudson, amounting to $949. And it says, "Of this amount $210 88 has been raised among the Anti-Renters in Rensselaerville, Bern and Knox, leaving a deficiency of over $700."

The expenses to the State and County, for lawyers' fees, &c. connected with these trials, probably exceeded the expenses of the Anti-Renters, exclusive of the sums paid for troops ordered from New York and Albany to Hudson. There has already been paid from the Treasury over $50,000 for expenses in calling the troops into service and for posses organized to aid the Sheriffs and protect the jails.

Of this sum nearly twenty thousand dollars is to be assessed to the counties this Fall; the residue comes out of the State treasury. There is a large sum to be assessed on the county of Columbia, for expenses incurred before the law passed authorizing the money in the first instance to be advanced from the treasury.

COL. H. S. RANDALL'S MERINO SHEEP.—Last season we noticed the enormous clip of the Merino Sheep of Col. Henry S. Randall, of this village. This season we learn that his Paular stock, including two rams, averaged over six pounds of well washed wool per head! A three year old ram sheared 13 lbs. 8 oz. (the heaviest fleece, we believe, ever taken from a three year old Merino in the United States,) and a yearling 8 lbs. 8 oz. Many of the ewes sheared 6, 7, and 8 lbs. per head, and one the unparalleled weight of 9 lbs. 1 oz! Col. R. received the first premium on rams, and the first and second on ewes, at the State Fair, at Poughkeepsie, (1844,) and the gold medal of the Society, for the best managed and most profitable flock of sheep, at the annual winter meeting of the Society in Albany. Cortland against the world! [Cortland Village Democrat.

ARRESTS OF ABOLITIONISTS.—The Parkersburgh Gazette (Va.) of the 12th gives the following:

"Information was recently received that the slaves of John H. Harwood, living at Washington, about twelve miles below his place, would attempt an escape on the night of Wednesday. Six persons of that neighborhood crossed the river after dark, and concealed themselves on the Ohio side. About 2 o'clock on the morning of Thursday, six of Mr. Harwood's negroes came across, and were received by a party of whites, at least seven in number; and while the latter were engaged in assisting the former and their baggage from the canoe, the concealed Virginians made a descent upon them, and after a severe struggle, succeeded in capturing and securing five of the blacks and three of the whites. The latter were brought to this place and committed to prison. As the offence of which these men are accused is a felony under our laws, an examining court has been summoned for Friday next, 18th inst.

LIFE IN THE SOUTH.—A correspondent of the N. Y. Herald, writing from Mobile, gives the particulars of a dreadful fight with bowie knives, between two young men, near that city on the 28th ult. The parties were John Bagley, of N. Y., and Leonard Wilson, of Richmond, Va. After slashing at one another for an hour, during which, Wilson was nearly cut in pieces, his second interfered and it was stopped. Wilson died of his wounds, and Bagley was supposed to be on his way for the North.

THE LATE FIRE.—Another body—or rather skeleton—was found on Thursday, buried under the ruins of the recent explosion. It was like exhuming the bones of one forgotten, from the grave. A few calcined and discolored bones that seemed ready to pulverize into magnesia at the touch—a smooth piece of a skull—a ghastly lock of hair—these were the only remaining tokens of the living. No—we mistake. A huge bundle of charred Ledgers was grasped under the circling bones of the left arm, while the fingers of the 'good right hand' clutched among some scattered pieces of gold—precious gold! The skeleton lay crushed upon the steps, and the poor faithful wretch was joyfully making his escape from the burning building with his employer's books and his employer's gold—to say nothing of his own life—safe, safe! What a triumph! what a something to tell of and to be proud of for all time to come, that he had so narrowly escaped the great fire in 1845—escaped after having at the peril of his life secured the books and the gold, and brought them out safe in his own hands! All this said that scorched and blackened skull to our busy fancy as we communed in thought with its vacant and dreamless cells. [Tribune.

THE MILITIA OFFICER AND THE QUAKER.—Gen. Samuel Fessenden, of Portland, at a recent Peace meeting at that place, took occasion, says the Advertiser, to relate the circumstances of his conversion to Peace principles. He had formerly been a war man, and had passed through all the grades of military office from the corporal up to the commandant of a full division. He was on a certain occasion going to a military review—riding in full dress regimentals, when he chanced to meet an acquaintance, a Quaker. The latter appeared not to notice him as he approached, until he came so near that he was obliged to check his horse to keep from running against him. The honest Quaker then looking up to him with a peculiar significance, said—"Friend Fessenden, has thee got thy Christian armor on?" The words touched him to the quick, for he was then a professed disciple of Christ, and while riding to the field, and while reviewing his troops, with the multitude of bristling bayonets before him, he thought of the Quaker and his Christian armor. From that time he lost his interest in military affairs, and now ranks among the zealous advocates of Peace.

A JOKE.—A most reprehensible joke was perpetrated by a young clergyman and some very foolish young men and women, on board the Delaware, a few days ago. The victims of this serious hoax are a young gentleman and lady, scarcely at all acquainted with each other, who were married in fun, during the excursion, but found out on getting ashore that the voyage upon which they had embarked promised to be longer than they had intended—being for life and death. The gentleman behaves very gallantly on the subject, and leaves the matter entirely at the choice of the lady. If she chooses to consider herself a bride, he will accept in earnest the hand he took in sport. The lady, however, we believe, is much mortified and chagrined at the affair. The young clergyman who could behave so thoughtlessly ought to travel to Jericho and 'tarry till his beard be grown.'

PRIVILEGES OF POSTMASTERS.—We have just seen a letter from the office of the Postmaster General, under date of July 12, from which we make the following extract:

"When subscribers refuse to take Pamphlets or Newspapers from the Office, Postmasters are now as heretofore required to notify Editors, &c., and may frank letters containing such notice."

POSTING.—Hutchings, the Daguerreotypist, corner of Canal and Chartres streets, yesterday had hanging up against an awning post the phiz of a chap with a good, round, open countenance, presenting the appearance of a "jail bird" peeping through the iron grates of his cage. This was effected by placing over the plate horizontally and perpendicularly, small strips of black, so as to form squares, through which the features of the incarcerated might be seen with admirable effect. Beneath the picture were these emphatic words: "This man swindled me out of Fifty Dollars!"

We would admonish persons to be cautious how they trifle with Mr. Hutchings, and the same time admire his way of "showing up" a fellow.

EL DORADOS.—It is amusing sometimes to listen to the tales that are told by new settlers, to enthusiastic travelers of new countries. One would think, listening to them, and judging of these countries by them, that they were Edens, nothing more nor less.

We met with one of these travelers, or settlers rather, not long since. It was a raw, rainy day, and the wind had suddenly chopped round from the South-West to North-East. "Oh," said he, "what a climate; [he was born and bred in Ohio,] I should die here. Where I live we have no such changes. The soil is rich; the climate steady; every thing is as it should be." "And pray where do you live?" asked an inquisitive farmer. "In such a county in Missouri," was his response. "Water is plenty there?" said the farmer inquiringly. "Why, there is one small difficulty; we have as much as we want, but it is rather hard to get." "There are no chills and fevers?" doggedly continued the querist. "None to speak of—only, strangers have to be acclimated." "Teachers and schoolmasters very abundant I suppose?" our friend continued. "Why, they are always scarce in a new country; but we have them sometimes, and when we have them we get as much good out of them as if they were with us always." "No snakes, nor small troubles, such as blacksmithing, carpentering, doctoring, &c., rather scarce and hard to get?" asked again the farmer. "Why," replied the settler, "we have of course these difficulties to contend with; but what are they?" "Oh nothing," rejoined the farmer, "only I would rather have our climate without these difficulties, than live in yours with them."

A prophecy has been current among the lower orders in Quebec, that on the 17th inst. the remaining portion of Quebec would be destroyed by fire. As the day (Thursday) drew near, the utmost terror and consternation prevailed, and although the day passed without any fire, either through incendiarism or otherwise, so impressed were the poor inhabitants with the vivid recollection of the terrible scenes of the last conflagrations, that they could not be induced to consider themselves out of danger until the supposed fatal day was over.

In an address on Peace delivered in Portsmouth recently by Samuel E. Coues, Esq., the orator stated that by the last arrival from England he had received intelligence that on one Sunday, recently, no less than one hundred and ten sermons were preached in London on the subject.

There are about 200 suits to which the New York City Government is a party now in the courts.

SUMMARY.

Nations should wear mourning for none but their benefactors. The representatives of nations should recommend to the public homage only those who have been the heroes of humanity.

Not less than ten thousand of our fellow citizens have this year left the fertile prairies of the Great Valley to encounter the perils and privations of the tedious over-land journey to Oregon.

In the Superior Court of New York city, Susan Parker has obtained a verdict of $5,000 against William Emerson, executor of the late Charles Walker, who died at Concord, (N. H.,) and gave a note for that sum to the plaintiff, his aunt, who nursed him in his last illness.

It has been ascertained that there are some fifty or sixty white children among the Osages, who say that they purchased them from the Spaniards, who stole them from the United States and Mexico. Should not some measure be taken, by which they shall be restored?

The population of Salem, Mass., as ascertained by a census just completed, is 16,697, being a gain of 1695 since 1836. The number of white males is 7,843; of white females 8,514; of colored males 162; colored females 178; children between the ages of 4 and 16, 3,761.

The city of St. Louis has paid $47,831 31 to support paupers in the hospital, in the brief space of time which elapsed between the 10th of April and the 10th of June. 1845.

Next year will complete a century since the institution of Princeton College, and the Faculty have made preparations to celebrate the centenary anniversary in a proper spirit.

Santa Ana is still at Havana, waiting advices as is said. He has taken a beautiful residence nine miles from the city for four months, at the expiration of which time he expects to be permitted to return to Mexico. He is in excellent health and spirits.

The Captain-General of Cuba has suddenly determined to check the slave trade by decisive and effectual measures. It had been hitherto tolerated without the slightest attempt at its suppression. At present a vessel engaged in the slave trade cannot enter the ports of Cuba; but the island is very large and its bays and harbors innumerable. You may readily divine the consequences. The kidnapped blacks are taken to some plantation along the coast, their nakedness is covered, they are kept a few days to restore their good looks, and then sent with impunity to every part of the island.

A deputation from the Free Church of Scotland, consisting of Rev. Drs. Simpson, McLeod, and Rev. N. McLeod, arrived at Halifax a few days since. The object of their mission is to ascertain and supply the existing spiritual destitutions in British North America with the means of grace.

The difficulty of acquiring our language which a foreigner must experience, is illustrated by the following question: "Did you ever see a person pare an apple or a pear with a pair of scissors?"

The foreigners are not the only persons who are puzzled by reason of the similarity in sound of words having a very different meaning. For example:—"The schoolmaster of a certain village could never make John Wright write rite right."

Green, the Reformed Gambler, is lecturing at Cleveland. In a speech at a temperance meeting he gave the following answer to one who asked him where he received his education: "Born a Buckeye, raised a Hoosier, took a lesson in Cincinnati jail, studied and practiced gambling for twelve years on the Mississippi, and graduated in Texas."

Mankind might do without physicians, if they would observe the laws of health; without soldiers, if they would obsrerve the laws of Christianity; without lawyers, if they would keep their tempers—but there is no living without farmers.

Seven native newspapers are printed in Calcutta, a city numbering a population of 500,000.—The light is advancing gradually, but the great mass of intellect in those hundreds of thousands is still asleep, and buried beneath worn-out superstitions of ages. It is stated that the circulation of the seven native papers averages only about 200 each.

"The Razor-Strop Man" has sent twenty-five dollars for the relief of the sufferers by the late fire in New York.

In Providence, on Saturday, Almira Phillips was so badly injured by the upsetting of a stage, that her life is despaired of.

The Boston Chronicle, after reading Delia Webster's pamphlet, says it is satisfied that she is, as she declares, entirely innocent of the act she was charged with, of aiding the slave Lewis and his family to escape.

Rev. Dr. Judson, whose missionary labors during a long course of years, in the East Indies, are familiar to our readers, is now on his return to his native country, by way of England.

The Fourth Volume of D'Aubigne's History of the Reformation is now ready and will be shortly published in this City. At the last accounts D'Aubigne was in Scotland, a Delegate from Geneva to the Anniversary of the Free Church of Scotland. He had been very ill, but was rapidly recovering.

It appears by the Report on the Affairs of the Indians in Canada, laid before the Legislative Assembly on the 20th of March, 1845, that some 12,000 Indians reside in the Provinces, and that the number is on the increase.

The brig Cameo, from Antwerp, arrived at this port, passed, on the 24th June, in lat. 42, long. 50, more than 150 icebergs! Three ships were among them.

A traveler informs the editor of the Buffalo Commercial Advertiser that in Illinois he saw 40,000 acres of wheat in one body divided only by cross roads. The yield upon the whole lot gave promise of something beter than was seen last year.

☞ We are sorry to learn, that in some instances our papers for Allegany Co. have not reached their destination at the proper time. The reason of the delay we know not. We only know, that they leave New York invariably on the afternoon of the fourth day at 5 o'clock, and should regularly be in Geneva on the evening of fifth day. If any direction or change as to the route they should take would hasten their arrival, we hope our friends will immediately inform us thereo.

DIED,

At Unadilla Forks, Otsego Co., N. Y., on the 27th inst., CLARKE LEWIS, in the 73d year of his age. His health had been failing for some months past, and he declined gradually until he fell asleep. Through his sickness he manifested true Christian meekness and patience, enjoyed an unwavering confidence in God, and finally died as he had lived, in the blessed hope of immortality and eternal life. He was a member of the 1st Seventh-day Baptist Church in Brookfield, where he will be remembered as one possessing much of that meek and quiet spirit which is of great price.

At Portageville, Allegany Co., N. Y., on the 28th of April last, Eld. JOHN BLISS, in the 86th year of his age.

Elder Bliss removed in early life, with a small family, from Newport, R. I., to what was afterwards the town of Greenfield, Saratoga Co., when that country was all a wilderness, without a road or friend to direct him, his only guide-board being the blazed trees. He was one of the first settlers in that town, where he remained till about the year 1820, when he sold his farm, and removed with a large family to another almost unexplored and uncultivated wilderness in the centre county of Pennsylvania, where they endured (from circumstances unforeseen and unexpected) much suffering and distress for want of the necessary comforts of life, before they could get their new land into a state of cultivation to produce them; and for a season or two they were in a measure dependent on the rifles of the young men for existence, as the nearest place where provisions could be bought was 60 or 70 miles by canoe navigation down the Sinamahoning creek, and there at a very dear rate. How long Elder Bliss remained in that inhospitable country, I cannot say, probably 12 or 15 years, when he disposed of what property he had left, and returned to Allegany County, where he resided to the end of his days.

It will doubtless be a satisfaction to his numerous friends and connections to learn, that he retained to the last a good degree of health, free from disease or pain, and the usual vigor of his mind but little if any abated, especially on religious subjects. About 8 o'clock in the evening he undressed himself and went to bed as usual. His aged companion (83 years) soon followed him. In a short time she thought she heard a little noise, as if something was in his throat. She spoke twice, but received no answer. She instantly arose and procured a candle, when behold his immortal spirit had left its mortal tenement, without a struggle or a groan, or even the move of a hand or foot.

From conversation with his eldest son, and directions given him, it is evident he was sensible of his approaching dissolution, and fully prepared to meet it. But a day or two previous to his departure, he wrote a short epitaph, which he requested to have inscribed on his tomb stone, as follows: "In Memory of John Bliss, son of Elder William Bliss, of Rhode Island. He was a soldier in the Revolution, and for many years a Seventh-day Baptist preacher." J. S.

DIED—On the 27th of July, at his residence near New Market, N. J., JOEL DUNN, in the 98th year of his age.

In June, 1844, he received a slight paralytic shock, which affected his speech, right hand and side considerably, but from which he partially recovered in a few weeks, so as to be able to talk and use his hand again. For some time previous to his receiving this shock, he had viewed his dissolution as near, and had spoken of it with composure, seldom complaining and never murmuring, but cheerfully resigning himself to the will of his Heavenly Father. He calmly viewed the approach of death, often expressed himself as waiting the will of the Lord, yet desirous to depart and be with Christ, which he considered to be far better. In this frame of mind he continued until his last moment, when he sunk into the slumber of death without a struggle or a groan, and from no other apparant disease than old age.

He was a prominent and active member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Piscataway for more than half a century. Having shared with her the fellowship and joys of the church militant, he also cheerfully bore his part in her trials, persecutions, and labors, always firmly defending the truth which distinguished her from the surrounding churches.

His mind was composed, and his memory remarkably distinct in relation to some portions of his life—especially in relation to the scenes of the Revolution, in which he bore an active part. His residence was so near the scene of action, that he was often driven from his home, and compelled, upon a moment's warning, to remove his helpless family to escape the insults of the British soldiery. At other times he endured the fatigues and hardships of the campaign. On one occasion, he received intelligence, that the enemy were approaching his dwelling. He immediately took his wife and three small children, with some few articles of clothing, and a short supply of provisions for one meal, and left his house, furniture, and provisions, and fled to the mountain for shelter during the night. Before he was half a mile away, he knew that the enemy had possession of his home and effects, and on his return he realized more than his fears in the destruction of his property. On another occasion, while at home, and having charge of a neighbor's family in the absence of the man who was out on duty, he was surprized, and his house surrounded by a band of six British, led on by some of his tory neighbors. They entered his dwelling in the darkness of the night, and commenced their work of pillage and threats, intending to confine him and make sure of the whole. But a small party, having heard of their approach, came to his relief in time to defeat their purpose. He not only endured the severe trials of a long and desolating war, but also shared his small remaining property with those who had left their far-distant homes and beloved families for the cause of liberty. Many came from the State of Virginia, and other parts, who remained in this vicinity until peace was declared, and the most of them in a destitute condition; but he still felt it imperative to feed, shelter, clothe, and nurse the wounded and destitute, until Government could adopt some means for their relief.

Through a good part of his life, he has sustained a portion of the duties incumbent on a faithful citizen of the State—always ready to attend her calls, and to aid in the direction of her affairs.—He has left a numerous and respectable posterity, who will ever venerate the memory of their ancestor. He was married in 1771. The companion of his youth still survives him. They lived together in this connection nearly 74 years, and always resided in the same dwelling, with the exception of a short interval of sickness and during those flights in the Revolution. His family at one time consisted of 12 children, and before his death he saw a number of the fourth generation. The exact number of his decendants can not be accurately ascertained, for they are scattered through six States of the Union. It is the opinion of the writer, who is well acquainted with every branch of the family, that they number upwards of 250.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' SEMINARY.

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, Principal, and Professor of Languages.
IRA SAYLES, Associate Principal, and Professor of Mathematics.
GURDON EVANS, Professor of Natural Sciences.
J. R. HARTSHORN, Professor of Anatomy and Physiology.
C. STILLMAN, Professor of Vocal and Instrumental Music.
Miss C. B. MAXSON, Preceptress, Instructress in French, Italian, Drawing and Painting.
Mrs. M. B. KENYON, Assistant in the Female Department.

From the very liberal patronage extended to this Institution during the past seven years, the Trustees have been induced to make arrangements for greatly increasing its facilities. The Chemical, Philosophical, Astronomical, and Mathematical apparatus is amply sufficient for a full illustration of the different departments of those Sciences. The apparatus will be farther increased at the commencement of the ensuing Fall Term, by the introduction of whatever may be necessary in other Sciences than those above mentioned, especially, by a MANIKIN of the most approved structure, now being imported from Paris, expressly for this Institution. This will enable the student of Physiology and Anatomy to pursue his studies with advantages nearly equal to those afforded by an actual subject, having this farther advantage of being divested of all those revolting circumstances ever attendant on the dissecting room.

THE TEACHERS' CLASSES, as usual, will be exercised in practical teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective Instructors. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. Daily Lectures will also be given during the Fall and Winter Terms; and the public may be assured that this department of the Institution shall be conducted upon the principles of the best regulated Normal Schools, in this, or any other country.

Finally, the proprietors pledge themselves, that the reputation of this Institution shall be sustained by the introduction of whatever may be necessary to meet the demands of an intelligent public.

The Institution is liberally endowed and subject to the visitation of the Regents.

Its Library is choice and extensive, and accessible, also, to all the students gratis.

THE ACADEMIC YEAR for 1845—6 consists of three Terms, as follows:—The First, commencing Wednesday August 13, 1845, and ending Thursday, November 20. The Second, commencing Wednesday, November 26, and ending Thursday, March 6, 1846. The Third, commencing Wednesday, March 25, and ending Thursday, July 2.

EXPENSES.—Tuition, per term, from $3 50 to $5 00. Board, per week, $1 00. Piano, (extra,) per term, $10 00. Washing, lights and fuel, per term, from $2 00 to $5 00. The entire expenses for an Academic Year, including board, washing, lights, fuel and tuition, (except on the Piano,) need not exceed $40 00, and may even be reduced much below this, where individuls board themselves, either separately or in clubs. For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense. SAMUEL RUSSELL,
President of the Board of Trustees

"THERE WAS SILENCE IN HEAVEN."

Can angel spirits need repose,
In the full sunlight of the sky?
And can the veil of slumber close
A cherub's bright and beaming eye?

Have seraphims a weary brow,
A fainting heart, and aching breast?
No, far too high their pulses flow,
To languish with inglorious rest.

How could they sleep amid the bliss,
The banquet of delight above?
Or bear for one short hour to miss
The vision of the Lord they love?

Oh! not the death-like calm of sleep
Could hush the everlasting song;
No fairy dream or slumber deep,
Entrance the rapt and holy throng.

Yet not the lightest tone was heard
From angel voice or angel hand,
And not one plumed pinion stirred
Among the bowed and blissful band.

For there was silence in the sky,
A joy no angel tongue could tell,
As from its mystic point on high
The peace of God in stillness fell.

O, what is silence here below?
The quiet of concealed despair,
The pause of pain, the dream of wo,—
It is the rest of rapture there.

And, to the way-worn pilgrim here,
More kindred seems that perfect peace
Than the full chants of joy to hear
Roll on, and never, never cease.

From earthly agonies set free,
Tired with the path too slowly trod,
May such a silence welcome me
Into the palace of my God!

Church Music, No. 3.

The importance of good music, as a means of attraction and of increasing a congregation, is well understood by the advocates of error. Many a Universalist Church is crowded to its utmost capacity, merely because the music is attractive.

The Roman Catholic Churches, are often visited by persons who would never go, but for their beautiful singing. It is folly to complain of this, God made men so that good music delights us, more than almost any thing else, and he that complains of this complains of God. I confess that when I enter a church, where the deep, mellow, solemn tones of the organ, accompanied with some well trained voices, chants the touching words, "The Lord is in his holy temple, let all the earth keep silence before him," I feel an awe come over me I cannot describe, which leads me to cry with Jacob, "How dreadful is this place, this is none other than the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven." How often have I compared the appearance of congregations where the music was good, with those where it was indifferent, or decidedly bad.

I have entered the desk—the congregation are partly seated, but an air of painful listlessness reigns throughout the house—conversation is going on, either loud, or in disturbing whispers, to my very great annoyance. But if a well regulated choir occupy the seats, and in an appropriate manner, sing some devotional pieces, the congregation wears another aspect altogether. I can offer up my supplications to God for his help, select the Scriptures to be read, and the hymns to be sung, while the feeling in my own mind, and the congregation, is every moment becoming deeper and more solemn, till I finally rise before a hushed and silent audience, with a melted heart, filled with sentiments of love and gratitude, of awe and reverence—such as the music and the words were well adapted to excite. As a means of filling our houses with the very class to be made the subjects of revivals of religion, (the young) we can hardly overrate good singing. No minister in N. E., be he ever so popular as a pulpit orator, can sustain an intelligent audience, without singing. A finished musician, with pious motives and intentions, at the head of his choir, does nearly as much for the cause of righteousness, for the salvation of men, and the honor of Christ, as a devoted minister in the desk. The announcement that certain singers will be present on any public occasion, at a Temperance or Anti-Slavery convention, will attract a larger audience than the name of the most accomplished orator of the land.

And not only as a means of attraction, but to produce the effect upon all minds which we desire to have produced, a good choir is invaluable. During a revival in a village where many had been brought to Christ, I preached to the converts. They were seated alone, in the body pews; and to commence, the choir sung, "Vain delusive world adieu," &c. Scarcely had they finished the first line, when all eyes were swimming in tears. On another occasion, I preached in a Congregationalist Church, on the future judgment, the choir was led by a highly cultivated and pious gentleman, who observing the state of feeling in the audience, when I sat down, commenced singing,—

"Day of judgment, day of wonders,
Hark! the trumpet's awful sound,
Louder than a thousand thunders,
Shakes the vast creation round,
How the summons will the sinner's heart confound."

The effect was deep, scores came to the altar for prayers.

How affecting at the funeral of some youthful, amiable, and devoted lady, if appropriately sung, is the hymn commencing:

"Sister thou wast mild and lovely,
Gentle as the summer's breeze."

But I must close. Brethren in the ministry, let us do all we can to improve musical taste, and elevate the character of church music among our people. I almost sanction the views of Luther, who made it indispensable to prepare one for the sacred office, that he should be a singer.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

The Pretty Bee.

Pretty bee, pray tell me why,
Thus from flower to flower you fly;
Culling sweets the live long day,
Never leaving off to play?
Little child, I'll tell you why,
Thus from flower to flower I fly,
Let the cause thy thoughts engage
From thy youth to riper age.

Summer flowers will soon be o'er,
Winter comes, they bloom no more;
Finest days will soon be past,
Brightest suns will set at last;
Little child, now learn of me,
Let thy youth the seed time be,
And when wintry age shall come,
Richly bear thy harvest home.

Travelers' Wonders.

One winter's evening, as Captain Compass was sitting by the fire-side with his children all round him, little Jack said to him, Papa, pray tell us some stories about what you have seen in your voyages. The Captain replied, I have seen a great many people and their way of living, which will be interesting, and will relate some particulars. Pray do, Papa, cried Jack and all his brothers and sisters; so they drew close round him, and he began as follows:

Well then—I was once, about this time of the year, in a country where it was very cold, and the poor inhabitants had much ado to keep themselves from starving.—They were clad partly in the skins of beasts made soft and smooth by a peculiar art, but chiefly in garments made from the outer covering of a middle-sized quadruped, which they were so cruel as to strip off his back while he was alive. They dwelt in habitations, part of which was sunk under ground. The materials were either stones, or earth hardened by fire; and so violent in that country were the storms of wind and rain, that many of them covered their roofs all over with stones. The walls of their houses had holes to let in the light; but to prevent the cold air and wet from coming in, they were covered with a sort of transparent stone, made artificially of melted sand or flints. As wood was rather scarce, I know not what they would have done for firing, had they not discovered in the bowels of the earth a very extraordinary kind of stone, which when put among burning wood, caught fire and flamed like a torch.

Dear me, said Jack, what a wonderful stone? I suppose it was somewhat like what we call fire-stones, that shine so when we rub them together.—I don't think they these are of a darker color.

Well—but their diet too was remarkable. Some of them eat fish that had been hung in the smoke till they were quite dry and hard; and along with it they eat either the roots of plants, or a sort of coarse black cake made of powdered seeds. These were the poorer class: the richer had a whiter kind of cake, which they were fond of daubing over with a greasy matter that was the product of a large animal among them. This grease they used, too, in almost all their dishes, and when fresh, it really was not unpalatable. They likewise devoured the flesh of many birds and beasts when they could get it; and eat the leaves and other parts of a variety of vegetables growing in the country, some absolutely raw, others variously prepared by the aid of fire. Another great article of food was the curd of milk, pressed into a hard mass and salted. This had so rank a smell, that persons of weak stomachs often could not bear to come near it. For drink, they made great use of the water in which certain dry leaves had been steeped. These leaves, I was told, came from a great distance. They had likewise a method of preparing a liquor of the seeds of a grass-like plant steeped in water, with the addition of a bitter herb, and then set to work or ferment. I was prevailed upon to taste it, and thought it at first nauseous enough, but in time I liked it pretty well. When a large quantity of the ingredients are used, it becomes perfectly intoxicating. But what astonished me most, was their use of a liquor so excessively hot and pungent, that it seems liquid fire. I once got a mouthful of it by mistake, taking it for water, which it resembles in appearance; but I thought it would instantly have taken away my breath. Indeed, people are not unfrequently killed by it; and yet many of them will swallow it greedily whenever they can get it. This, too, is said to be prepared from the seeds above mentioned, which are innocent and even salutary in their natural state, though made to yield such a pernicious juice. The strangest custom that I believe prevails in any nation I found here, which was, that some take a mighty pleasure in filling their mouths full of stinking smoke; and others in thrusting a nasty powder up their nostrils.

I should think it would choke them, said Jack. It almost did me, answered his father, only to stand by while they did it—but use, it is truly said is second nature.

I was glad enough to leave this cold climate; and about half a year after I fell in with a people enjoying a delicious temperature of air, and a country full of beauty and verdure. The trees and shrubs were furnished with a great variety of fruits, which with other vegetable products, constituted a large part of the food of the inhabitants. I particularly relished certain berries growing in bunches, some white and some red, of a very pleasant sourish taste, and so transparent, that one might see the seeds at their very centre. Here were whole fields full of extremely odoriferous flowers, which they told me were succeeded by pods bearing seeds, that afforded good nourishment to man and beast. A great variety of birds enlivened the groves and woods; among which I was entertained with one, that without any teaching spoke almost as articulately as a parrot, though indeed it was all the repetition of a single word. The people were tolerably gentle and civilized, and possessed many of the arts of life. Their dress was very various. Many were clad only in a thin cloth made of the long fibres of the stalk of a plant cultivated for the purpose, which they prepared by soaking in water, and then beating with large mallets. Others wore cloth wove from a sort of vegetable wool, growing in pods upon bushes. But the most singular material was a fine glossy stuff, used chiefly by the richer classes, which, as I was credibly informed, is manufactured out of the webs of caterpillars, a most wonderful circumstance, if we consider the immense number of caterpillars necessary to the production of so large a quantity of the stuff as I saw used. This people are very fantastic in their dress, especially the women, whose apparel consists of a great number of articles impossible to be described, and strangely disguising the natural form of the body. Like most Indian nations, they use feathers in the head-dress. One thing surprised me much, which was, that they bring up in their houses an animal of the tiger kind, with formidable teeth and claws, which, notwithstanding its natural ferocity, is played with and caressed by the most timid and delicate of their women.

I am sure I would not play with it, said Jack. Why you might chance to get an ugly scratch if you did, said the Captain.

The language of this nation seems very harsh and unintelligible to a foreigner, yet they converse among one another with great ease and quickness. One of the oddest customs is that which men use on saluting each other. Let the weather be what it will, they uncover their heads, and remain uncovered for some time, if they mean to be extraordinarily respectful.

Why that's like pulling off our hats, said Jack—Ah, ah! Papa, cried Betsey, I have found you out. You have been telling us of our own country and what is done at home all this while. But, said Jack, we don't burn stones, nor eat grease and powdered seeds, nor wear skins and caterpillar's webs, nor play with tigers. No? said the Captain—pray what are coals but stones; and is not butter, grease; and corn, seeds; and leather, skins; and silk, the web of a kind of caterpillar; and may we not as well call a cat an animal of the tiger-kind, as a tiger an animal of the cat kind? So, if you recollect what I have been describing, you will find, with Betsey's help, that all the other wonderful things I have told you of are matters familiar among ourselves. But I meant to show you, that a foreigner might easily represent every thing as equally strange and wonderful among us, as we could do with respect to his country; and also to make you sensible that we daily call a great many things by their names, without ever inquiring into their nature and properties; so that in reality, it is only the names, and not the things themselves, with

A Child's Evening Hymn.

Father, regard an infant's cry,
And watch each sleeping hour;
Thy throne is far above the sky,
Yet earth can feel thy power.

To thee I now direct my prayer
Before I fall to sleep;
No foe, nor death, nor danger dare
To harm, for thou wilt keep.

Though darkness spread its vail around,
And sickly vapors blend;
Thy care will keep me hale and sound
'Till morning light descend.

And when the morning sun shall rise,
I too will wake and pray;
And lift on high my joyful eyes,
And serve thee all the day.

The Golden Chain.

A pious father, not long since, gave ten dollars to the American Sunday School Union, to purchase a library for some destitute neighborhood at the west. He gave it in the name of his little daughter, saying, "I want to throw one golden chain around her young heart—to bind her to the throne of infinite love." Happy thought! How blessed the influence on the young child's heart, to be brought thus early into communion with the spirit of Christian benevolence. Had that child lived to old age, the influence of that act would have been felt in moulding her character and forming her destiny. But God had larger plans of benevolence than this benevolent father. He took that child to himself. And now the father writes as follows to the agent:—"Mary shall help you every year. Her grandfather had placed some money in bank for her. When I transferred that to our dear little boy, I took out ten dollars more for another library for our Mary in Heaven. I pledge you Mary's library every year. Dear little one! how she loved children. So her legacy shall go on like a little stream out of heaven—pure, bubbling water from the river of life, ever flowing fast by the throne. God of heaven! may it be like a wave of light, tracking its bright course on forever.

You know a father's heart—you know how it rends to take away so sweet a little one from his side. I cannot believe it—it is so dream-like. Her whole life seems like bright fancy. It gleamed—it fell—it is dark—yet I do hope that I am related to God and heaven. I do mean to consecrate her influence to the cause of God. And O, that through her influence, little children in the far west, and everywhere, may get an introduction to the Saviour! That gift goes out from a father's grieved heart upon his knees. God go with it—little legacy. If this little incident can aid you, mention it. Perhaps it will bring many a gift from children. Perhaps many a parent will be glad so to bind the little ones to the great throne. I do not regret that speech or sentiment. If she had lived, I should have doted on the prayer. She is dead—past for ever. It is a 'golden chain.' The sweetest I have now is that she thus being dead yet speaketh. O, parents! multiply your children so, in the features of many a little stranger child, who shall one day see God in heaven—saved by the God-send of your little ones."

A Word to our Boys about War.

Boys of America, you and the boys of Great Britain will determine the character and condition of mankind, twenty-five years from this time. The world is looking forward with earnest expectations and hope to the time when the government shall be on your shoulders. All the wealth of science and the progress of ages; inventions, surpassing all that have yet originated in the mind of man, and which shall bring, as it were, the ends of the earth together, and make one's life and thoughts ubiquitous and immortal; railroad chariots, running "like the lightnings" through the central regions of Asia and Africa, now hardly explored; commerce with nations and seaports now scarcely known by name to the civilized world; enterprises of Christian benevolence, of wide-reaching philanthropy, to which the present are mere dew-drops to a river; the moral power of mind, acting with the attributes of omnipotence upon brute force and barbarous men—all these elements of moral might will be put into your hands when you shall come to be men of the Anglo-Saxon race.

Now, boys of America, would you be first and foremost among these men? Would you stand before the whole race as the captains of their salvation from systems of despotism that have crushed them in the dust? Then let the first act of your administration be, to abolish an old pagan custom that has beggared the world and filled it with ignorance, misery and vice. I mean the whole War-system, especially the preparations for war in time of peace. And let your charity begin at home. Look into the ledger of the United States, and see how this war-breeding system has swallowed up the revenue of the country since the Revolution. From 1791 to 1832, the aggregate of our expenditures, with less than three years of actual warfare, was $842,250,891; and $805,092,844 of this sum were worse than thrown away in compliance with that old heathenish maxim, "In time of peace prepare for War"; all swallowed up by the Army and Navy, which, during that whole period, did not save a life, or add an inch to the territory, or a cent to the wealth, or the slightest iota to the true honor, glory and happiness of the Union. Just think of it for a moment—during a period of about 40 years, all the other expenses of carrying on this Government amounted in the whole to oaly $37,158,047, while $805,092,844 were thrown into the bottomless gulf of war-preparations in time of peace!!!—Take your slates and see how you could have ed from the hands of poor laboring people in this and other countries.

The great Erie Canal, extending from Albany to Buffalo, a distance of 363 miles, cost originally $7,143,789. It was considered almost the wonder of the age when it was opened. The whole country held a kind of jubilee at its completion; and cities and towns grew up as in a single night, where a few years before was nothing but an uncultivated wilderness. Now how many of such public works as this might have been constructed for the sum which the United States expended upon war-preparations in 40 years?

Mr. Whitney, who petitioned Congress for permission to build a railroad from Lake Michigan to the Pacific ocean, affirmed that the magnificent work would not cost over $50,000,000. How many of such railroads might our government have built, had it devoted to their construction what it has appropriated to the prospective destruction of human beings?

One more problem in connection with this subject, and I have done. From 1836 to 1843, the Government expended on the Naval Establishment $45,969,548, nearly nine millions more than for the whole civil list for forty years! Now, boys, will you not tell those who call themselves men, how many merchant ships, of 500 tons, would it take to earn this sum, at $3000 a year net profits for each ship?

Universalism in New Hampshire.—The whole number of Universalist Societies in the State, is 86. Of these, 23 are said by the Universalist paper to be very flourishing, 13 in a very low state, existing only in name, and the rest, neither very strong nor weak. Among the 86 societies, 15 only have churches connected with them—30 only have meeting-houses, and the whole number of permanent and itinerant ministers is 30. 'Not a very flattering statement,' says the Boston Recorder, of the triumphs of the "blessed doctrine," after a struggle of more than a half a century in the midst of an enlightened and virtuous population.

The Whaling Business.—There are now over seven hundred vessels engaged in the whale fishery in the United States, which employ over twenty thousand men, and import, annually, about four hundred and twenty thousand barrels of oil, (150,000 sperm and 270,000 whale,) and two million and eight hundred thousand pounds of whalebone; which is valued at over eight millions of dollars.

Sad Affair.—At Oswego, on Wednesday, 15th, a child was sent to a neighboring store for salts—by mistake saltpetre was put up. A young lady 16 years old, took it and died a horrible death.

Yankeeism.—The New Orleans Picayune states that a scheming Yankee has been selling "purely vegetable pills" through the Southern country at a great rate. They were nothing more nor less than common garden peas, dipped in a solution of powdered liquorice.

The Tiger.

The Tiger is one of the most beautiful creatures in the world, and yet one of the most savage and blood-thirsty. It is fierce without being provoked, and will kill and destroy without hunger. When it falls upon a flock or herd it will shed blood as long as there is one in sight upon which it can fix its dreadful fangs and teeth. The Tiger often attacks and devours men. They are fearfully strong, and will carry off an immense weight. We have read a story of a man who had got his Buffalo stuck in a quagmire, went to get help to lift it out, and on his return, when he came in sight, he saw a tiger leaping off with the greatest ease with his Buffalo. Their usual way of taking their prey is to lurk in ambush until the unsuspecting victim comes within reach, or to crawl up like the cat, until near enough, when it makes a dreadful bound, and seldom misses its aim. We have no such frightful animals in this country, the nearest of any thing we have like the tiger is wicked men; they often act like tigers and devour one another. They do not eat each other, but they kill one another sometimes as a tiger would kill a sheep, and seek to make themselves rich and happy by making others poor and miserable. Rumsellers do this.

The Young Gamblers.

What is a gambler? some young bright-eyed reader will ask. A gambler is one who plays games for money, or for any thing else that is worth or costs money. Some gamblers play with cards, some with dice, and some with other things. Those boys, which you see in the picture, are young gamblers, because they have been playing marbles. But, the children will ask, is it wicked to play marbles? We wish to be very candid with you, children, and tell you just what we think about it. We think there would be nothing very wicked in playing marbles for sport, were it not for the consequences to which it leads. The evil is not so much in it has to lead to other evils. As the picture above, which represents marble players, furnishes us with a good opportunity, we will tell our young friends the evil consequences of playing with marbles.

1. It is a waste of time. Children should study their books, or be engaged in something else useful, and when they play, as children may sometimes, some harmless sport, which would furnish a better exercise than marble playing, should be resorted to.

2. Marble playing for amusement will soon lead to playing for gain. If they have nothing else, they will play for each others marbles. This is wrong, because the person who gets the marbles gets what he does not pay for; the one that loses gets nothing in return for what the other takes away from him. This is dishonest.

3. It always leads to cheating. When boys are playing, and one begins to lose, he will try to get his marbles back, and will try to cheat if he cannot do it without, and as every one that plays know this, they will cheat too if they can.

4. This will lead to quarreling and fighting. We have an illustration of this in the picture before us. Those boys have been playing, and one has got away all the marbles of the other, and having got them in his bag was about making off; but the other, under pretence that he did not win them by fair playing, up and clinched him, and a battle ensued. The cut represents them at the time of the first clinch. There was nothing very interesting in the fight worth relating, more than that they got their noses a little bloody.

5. The last evil resulting from marble playing, which we will notice, is it will lead to gambling on a larger scale. There are many who began by playing marbles that have been led to gambling upon a large scale, and to picking pockets, counterfeiting, and other crimes, and are now in prison for their bad conduct. It is a fearful thing to begin to do wrong, for we cannot tell where it will lead us, and where we shall end our career. The sight of those boys just beginning to fight ought to teach boys not to begin what is likely to lead to such a result.

NEVER SWEAR.—A fisherman having just come ashore with a boat full of fish, was swearing dreadfully, when a minister stepped up and inquired what bait he used to catch his fish. The fisherman answered: "To catch that kind I bait with such a thing, and to catch that kind I bait with such a thing; but that kind is fool enough to bite the naked hook without any bait." "Then," said the minister, "he is like the profane swearer. The devil baits with riches to catch one class of sinners, and with honor to catch another, and with pleasure to catch another; but the swearer is like your foolish fish, he bites at the naked hook!"

DO THE BEST YOU CAN.—Whatever is worth doing is worth doing well. Billy Gray was a poor little boy, and learned to drum. Afterwards he became one of the richest men in Boston. One day he found fault with a carpenter because he had not done his work well. The carpenter got offended, and twitted him of having been "a poor little drummer boy." This, instead of offending Billy, rich as he was, only made him proud, and he exultingly exclaimed: "Did'nt I drum well? Did'nt I drum well?"

Now, children, whatever you do, do well. What is not worth doing well better be let alone, for you can always find enough to do which is worth doing well.

CHRISTIAN OBLIGATION.

"Ye are not your own."—1 Cor. 6: 17.

All the terms of admission into the kingdom of heaven require a hearty consecration of body and soul to Christ Jesus—a devotion of time and estate to the service of God—so that we shall hold ourselves and all that we possess subservient to the glory of God. When the Bible calls upon us to repent and turn to God, it means that we should forsake our own ways to walk in the ways of the Lord; and however pungent a person's conviction for sin, unless he has forsaken his unrighteousness, and turned to the way of the Lord, he needeth yet that godly sorrow which worketh repentance unto salvation. Does the Lord Jesus Christ say, "Follow me?" He saith also, "Whosoever forsaketh not all that he hath cannot be my disciple." Does he propose discipleship to us? It is in these terms, "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross daily, and follow me." A decided choice of his service, when we have counted the cost; and an open avowal of faith in his death and resurrection, before our fellow men, even when they frown upon us—are plain and solemn requisites to membership in his kingdom, and a clear title to an inheritance among them that are sanctified. Every particular of a holy calling, leaves us no other alternative, than either to consider ourselves not our own, or to decline all part and lot in the glorious kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ and of God.

Come then, fellow believer, and join me in a short meditation upon the principles on which this claim is made. To you it is said, "Ye are not your own." Whether this be said directly in the name of the divine Father, or more immediately in the name of Jesus Christ the divine Son, it is all one; for the Son saith to the Father, "All thine are mine, and mine are thine." The apostle saith, "Ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's."

This claim would be just and right, if made on the consideration of our creation and preservation. Surely the Creator has a right to the works he has made. If great favors conferred upon the needy, impose obligations, doubtless the constant bestowment of the blessings of providence upon the dependent, lays us under such great and lasting obligations, that we are bound to feel, that we are not our own, in aught that we have or are. It is due to God that we render unto him as he has ministered unto us.

The glories of Jehovah's name, and the rights of his throne, all make that claim just and right. The seraphim of heaven, bending before the throne of God, say, "The heavens and the earth are full of thy glory." John "heard as it were the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of mighty thunderings, saying, Alleluia, for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth." The sweet singer in Israel takes up the same delightful and all-controling theme, and says, "Glory ye in his holy name. Declare his glory among the heathen; his marvelous works among all nations. Give unto the Lord the glory due unto his name." And all on earth, whose hearts beat in unison with theirs, must say with David, "All that is in the heaven, and in the earth is thine; thine is the kingdom, O Lord."

The principles of love and homage act powerfully when they take full possession of the soul, and have led many on earth to endure toil and hardship, and peril of life, for the love and homage they have felt for illustrious princes. All this is due to the Lord Jesus Christ; and there is not an angel in heaven but worships him, and rejoices to be a ministering spirit to the cause of the blessed Redeemer; all obey the orders of his throne. patriarchs and prophets, and holy men of old, who kept the commandments of God, and apostles, and elders, and the souls of martyred saints now in heaven, cast their crowns at his feet, and say, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and wisdom, and riches, and strength, and honor, and glory, and blessing." While on earth, they counted not their lives dear unto them, so that they might finish their course with joy, and the ministry which they received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the gospel of the grace of God. Such should be the feeling of every believer in the Lord Jesus. They felt that they were not their own, and were therefore willing to lay down their lives for his sake.

But there is yet another consideration to urge on the humble believer in the Lord Jesus Christ. He is not his own, for he is bought with a price; he is a redeemed man—redeemed from guilt and bondage, to holiness of life, and freedom in the kingdom of God. Redeemed from the condemnation of death, to justification of life. Redeemed, not by power, but by price; "not with corruptible things as silver and gold, but by the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish." If love and homage are powerful principles when called forth by worthy objects, what may we not expect from such as feel them, when to all these are superadded the claims of gratitude for favors inexpressibly great? Ah, this affects and moves all the redeemed in heaven, the number of whom is ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands—for they say, "Worthy is the Lamb . . . . . for thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God, by thy blood, out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation." And who is he on earth, that believeth on the son of God, and his heart swelleth not with emotions warm and strong with desire to glory his name? Surely every disciple must feel, that he is not his own; he is bought with a price; and hence is bound to render unto the Lamb that bought him with his own blood, "Power, and wisdom, and riches, and strength, and honor, and glory, and blessing!" Ah, if we feel right, we shall feel that we owe him our life, our strength, our all. Our Saviour, God, combines in his person all the glories that can impose claim, and awaken love, and homage, and gratitude. By all these glorious claims he has purchased us unto himself. Well may the Christian say:

> "Were the whole realm of nature mine,
> That were a present far too small;
> Love so amazing, so divine
> Demands my soul, my life, my all."

Think then, dear fellow Christian believer, of the obligations thou owest to that blessed Saviour. Remember that homage, and love, and gratitude, spring from the heart; and that the heart from which they spring towards the Saviour, must be kept pure unto him—no rival may reign or riot there.

> "The dearest idol I have had,
> Whate'er that idol be,
> Lord, I tear it from my heart,
> To worship only thee."

It is not enough that we abjure the vicious courses of the profligate and the renegade, the votaries of carnal pleasure and fashionable amusement; our hearts must be exercised with holy affections. God and his glory, Christ and his honor, must have such a controlling place in our thoughts and desires, that it may be said our affections are in heaven. The love of the world and the cares of life must be made to bow and go at the bidding of the Holy Spirit.

In order to this, our manner of life should be plain and simple, bland and kind. All affected display of person, equipage, or estate, are at variance with the simplicity inculcated by Christ Jesus, and must be shunned by those who would glorify him in body or spirit. A life of luxurious ease, or indulging the appetites and passions, is seriously inimical to a life of piety. Those who live such a life cannot glorify God in their bodies or in their spirits. What can we expect from a person who cannot exert energy enough to be diligently employed in some useful labors of hand or head? Will such an one war a good warfare, as a soldier of the cross of Christ? Can a person who has not decision of mind enough to govern his appetites, or the softer affections of his nature, but is daily the slave of one or both of these predispositions of fallen humanity, be expected to practice self-denial, and prosecute works of usefulness and mercy towards his fellow men? Can we expect in such, courage to take an unpopular course, and for the truth's sake to meet the frowns of a scoffing world? Can we expect self-denial of the man or woman who gives way to the indulgence of the natural inclinations of the flesh, to be daily their votaries? Can we expect such to engage heart and hand in the labors necessary to the reform of a world that has erred and strayed from God?

A great part of the professing world are at this day carried away with these things, and have no heart for severe self-denial, and long-continued arduous labors. It is not a welcome sentiment with them, to be told they are not their own, and hence they feel but little responsibility for the cause of God, and of Christ, and of souls. If it will go along easily, pleasantly, and genteelly, well; if not, they would rather cringe and succumb to popular sentiment, and relinquish the truth for the popular practices of the large congregations and learned preachers of the age. Such persons feel as though they were their own, and at liberty to dispose of themselves, their time, their influence, and their property, as they list. Truth and righteousness, and the cause of God, are all secondary to their inclinations and indulgences. That disciple who feels that he is not his own, does not feel at liberty to dispose of himself in this way. He feels that he has a God to serve and glorify, in his body and in his spirit which are God's.—How many of the readers of the Sabbath Recorder feel this at the present moment? The cause of Missions needs men to go, east and west; and there are those who could go, if they could feel as they ought, that they are not their own. There are some who have the qualifications to enter upon that service of God, and others who could soon acquire the qalifications they lack, who only need to feel that they are not their own, and they would say, Send me. Try yourselves, dear friends, by these principles; inquire whether you are willing to devote your lives to him who died for you, and in whom all your life, your hope of everlasting joy, centers. And can you withhold your lives from him, when his cause calls for it? It is not a cause in which a man's heart need faint. The uttermost parts of the earth are given in covenant to Jesus Christ; all power in heaven and in earth is his; and he will reign until "all the ends of the world shall remember and turn unto the Lord, and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before him." The Pagan, the Mohammedan, and the eastern and western Anti-Christian population of the globe, shall all be subdued unto him. And that army of the Lamb, who, being called, and chosen, and faithful, go forth with him to the great conflict, will share the victory, and ultimately "stand before the throne and before the lamb, clothed with white robes, and with palms in their hands."

> "Who first in such a conflict dies,
> The speediest victory knows."

Come, then, ye Christian soldiers; there are laurels for you to win. "Gird up the loins of your minds," buckle on your armor, and enter forthwith upon this holy enterprise Nations wait to be instructed in the great mysteries of redemption, and the providence of Jehovah has made a highway through the nations, that ye may go forth and proclaim to the perishing the words of eternal life.

Who is that servant of God, who, feeling that he is not his own, is willing to glorify God by giving body and spirit to a missionary life? We wait with prayerful solicitude your response. Many have already offered a part of their substance, and many more are willing to give a portion of theirs to this cause; but we want the men who are willing to go. If it is our duty to engage in the work of Foreign Missions, it is the duty of some of our brethren to go; and the providences of God will correspond with the manifestations of his mercy and love towards those individuals, to make their duty plain. Will every individual who has a heart for the work of the Lord, and who feels that he is not his own, inquire, "Lord, is it I? Am I the one called to go forth?" Do the churches pray the Lord of the harvest that he would send forth laborers into his harvest? S. D.

CONSEQUENCES OF AN INEFFICIENT MINISTRY.

An inefficient ministry is one made up of such men as have not the scriptural qualifications. Some of this class are unconverted men; others never called of God to the work; others possessed of small minds, and too ignorant to teach; others worldly; others unholy and unsanctified in life and conversation; and others afraid to reprove the great crying sins of the land, lest the people should be offended and withdraw their support.

The results of such a ministry are,

1. A low, lifeless state of religion in the churches. The great mass of professors will not generally go any farther in zeal and love to God and the souls of the impenitent, than their preachers do.

2. Such a ministry commands no respect. Some may profess to regard them; but it is usually a pretence; or it is done out of spite to some devoted, able minister, whom they are angry with for exposing their sins. If such ministers reprove the wicked personally, they in turn will point out their own follies and talk to them with as little fear as parents would to their wayward children.

3. The wicked are not restrained. Such a ministry is not a "terror to evil doers."

4. Sinners are not pointed successfully to the Saviour.

5. Such a ministry cannot have the confidence of the truly good. It is much as it was with John, king of England, in the 13th century. The nation was at war with France, and he attempted to carry it on; but proving himself a weak prince, he failed at every turn; and after a little time none of his efforts were seconded by his courtiers and people, they having no confidence in the success of any plan formed by one of such imbecility.

6. Such ministers will often run into some foolish delusion that comes along. And if they do not, many of their people, having no special interest in them, will.

7. If revivals of religion are realized, they will be but transient excitements. The passions are operated upon, but no very direct blow is given to the obdurate heart. The fountains of sin are not broken up, and after the excitement has passed off, one can scarcely find any traces of the revival.

8. By such a ministry the standard of Christianity is rendered low, and also that of the ministerial office. That the first is true, is seen by remarks already made. The second may be seen by considering that as far as the influence of an inefficient ministry extends, the sacred office is degraded. In these days it is well known that there is a great scramble for office in civil matters. In some states, almost any man who takes it into his head can be commissioned as a Justice of the Peace. So in many towns there is a long list of these men, who know nothing scarcely about law, and are incapable of giving advice, or sitting in judgment in the smallest matter under the sun. They can administer oaths, and more than this they can swear themselves, and do other things that would disgrace the lowest mendicant on the footstool. Now, every one may see that the office is lowered down by such a state of things. And so it is with the office of the ministry when improper men are allowed to enter it, or are pushed in by some few, regardless of their qualifications. [Morning Star.

FALSE AND TRUE GREATNESS.

BY GEO. BABCOCK CLARKE.

War hath its echoes; they are heard afar,
Telling of martial deeds on many a shore;
The aspiring vision hails the lurid star,
Which faintly gleams on fields of human gore!
Oh, did ye know what widowed hearts deplore,
Where tears, as rain-drops, fall upon the slain,
Whose once lov'd forms time never will restore—
Ye would not seek, as now, the battle plain,
To win what many lose—or lose what none regain.

Ambition, does not Mercy rue the day,
Whene'er thou leaguest in arms thy hostile band?
The vile, the thoughtless, swell thy proud array,
Even deep-toned thunders roar at thy command
The shouts of triumph greet thee on each hand—
Cities in ashes laid, and ruins dire,
Leave orphans pillowed on the rocks, or sand;
Thy demon form exults where men expire,
And ghastly yawns o'er tombs, with unappeased desire!

Earth has sweet voices; on the winds along,
They chaunt full requiems o'er th' unhonored dead.
Few names are hallowed in the choral song,
Of those who fought for kings—for tyrants bled;
Their bones now whiten on their grassy bed,
Yet pride still mocks the vengeance of the sky!
What wilt thou answer when thy doom is read?
Thou, who dost dare Omnipotence defy,
And rob with murderous hand the shrines of liberty!

To share the sorrows of the troubled breast,
And set the vassal from his thraldom free;
To strike for freedom, o'er a land oppress'd,
And raise the mind to her high destiny—
These are the deeds that live in memory,
When laurels fade with trophies proudly won.
The praise of millions will awakened be,
When fleeting years through centuries have run,
To him whom virtue owns in death her favor'd son!

ANECDOTE OF ROWLAND HILL.

After Mr. Hill preached for the Missionary Society in Prince Street Chapel, Davenport, two tall, venerable looking men, upwards of seventy years of age, appeared at the vestry door. After a short pause, they entered arm-in-arm, and advanced towards Mr. Hill, when one of them, with some degree of trepidation, inquired, "Sir, will you permit two old sinners to have the honor to shake you by the hand?" Mr. Hill replied, with some reserve, "Yes, sir." One of the gentlemen then took his hand and kissed it, bathed it with tears, and said, "Do you remember preaching on this spot, where this chapel now stands, fifty years ago?" "Yes, I do," was the reply. The old man then proceeded to say, "O, sir, never can the dear friend who has hold of my arm, or myself, forget that sermon. We were two careless young men in his Majesty's dock-yard, posting to destruction as fast as time and sin could carry us thither. Having heard that a young clergyman was to preach out of doors, we determined to go and have some fun. We loaded our pockets with stones, intending to pelt you; but, when you arrived our courage failed; and as soon as you was engaged in prayer, we were so deeply impressed, that we looked at each other and trembled. When you began to speak, the word came with power to our hearts, and the tears rolled down our cheeks; we put our hands into our pockets, and dropped the stones one after another, until they were all gone; for God had taken away the stone from our hearts. When the sermon was over, we retired; but our hearts were too full to speak until we came near our lodgings, when my friend at my elbow said, 'John, this will not do—we are both wrong.—Good night.' This was all he could utter. He retired to his apartment, I to mine; but neither of us dared go to bed, lest we should wake in hell. From that time, we humbly hope we were converted to God, who, of his infinite mercy, has kept us in his ways to the present moment. We thought, sir, if you would permit us, after the lapse of half a century, to have the pleasure of shaking you by the hand before we go home, it would be the greatest honor that could be conferred on us."

Mr. Hill was deeply affected; the tears rolled down his cheeks in quick succession, and he fell on the necks of the old men, quite in the patriarchal style, and each wept tears of holy joy and gratitued before the Father of mercies.

THE POOL OF SILOAM.

A little above the fountain of En Rogel, that leads to the Valley of Jehoshaphat, there is a mulberry of unusual size, with a raised terrace, a favorite halting place for wayfarers and shepherds who repose under its ample shade, while their flocks are drinking from a channel filled with water conducted from the pool of Siloam, which is a few paces above. It was not without emotion that we descended the steps of the fountain, worn and polished by ages, and seating ourselves under the cool moist arch, a delicious shelter from the burning noonday beams of a July sun, reposing on our weary limbs, listening to the gentle current of the "waters of Siloam that go softly," and drinking with the palm of our hand, from the refreshing and limped stream.

As the Arab women of the valley came down to fill their pitchers, we remembered that the daughters of Judah frequented it two thousand years ago; that kings and prophets have drank of its consecrated waters, and that perhaps Jesus and his disciples often reposed on these very steps, in the course of their walks about the city.

To describe the view before us—the path to the fountain is seen above the pool on the right, and figures are descending the steps under its arch down to the water, which flows out by a small orifice into the square pool, and thence by a channel into the valley below, as before stated.

The remains of the pillars at the sides and in the basin, seem to indicate that, at a former period, it must have been wholly or partially covered; and it has been supposed that this is the "Bethesda" with five porches, where at certain hours an angel, according the popular tradition, troubled the waters, which were then supposed to possess a healing power. This receives some countenance from the fact that there is a singular ebb and flow in the stream noticed by many travelers, and lately witnessed by Dr. Robinson, but beyond this there is nothing to support the conjecture. It has been ascertained by the persevering research of Dr. Robinson, that the water is brought to the Pool from that of the Virgin, higher up the valley, by means of a channel cut through the rocky hill of Ophel, a work of great, and unless other fountains are within the city, useless labor. Its length as measured by him, is 1750 feet.

OUR EARLY COLONIAL TIMES.

We have been much amused, and not a little instructed, in looking over some passages of a recent work published in Boston, entitled 'A Sketch of Newbury, Newburyport, and West Newbury, from 1635 to 1845, by Joshua Coffin.' It reveals many curious records, throwing light upon the characteristics of our dauntless and strong-principled progenitors, and the Puritan character in general. In his preface the author justly remarks, 'that no part of our colonial history can be written, that is not ecclesiastical; and there is but little in the present form and character of our New England institutions, at least, that is not deducible from the religious supremacy, the kind of mixed authority, religious and civil, that prevailed among our Puritan ancestry, and found its way into every, the most inconsiderable, act of government.' The following illustrative chapter concerning 'wiggs' will give the curious reader a taste of the times:

"May 7, 1652. The members of the second church in Newbury met to deal with our brother Richard Bartlet, for the following reasons:

First, our said brother refuses communion with the church for no other reason but because the pastor wears a wigg, and because the church justifies him in it, setting up his own opinion in opposition to the church, contrary to that humility which becomes a Christian.

Second, and farther, in an unchristian manner he censures and condemns both pastor and church as anti-christian on the aforesaid account, and he sticks not from time to time to assert with the greatest assurance, that all who wear wiggs, unless they repent of that particular sin before they die, will certainly be damned, which we judge to be a piece of uncharitable and sinful rashness."

This opposition to wigs was not peculiar to Mr. Bartlet, though he was probably one of the last, who took so decided a stand against this article of dress. From their first introduction in New England till the tyranny of fashion had sanctioned their almost universal use, the wearing of wigs had been violently opposed by our fathers, who considered the manner of wearing the hair as a subject of grave and serious consequence. In many places in Judge Sewall's diary, he alludes to this subject. I make a few extracts:

"1685, Sept. 15th. Three admitted to the church, two wore periwigs.

1696. Mr. Sims told me of the assaults he had made on periwigs; seemed to be in good sober sadness.

1697. Mr. Noyes, of Salem, wrote a treatise on periwigs, &c.

1704, January. Walley appears in his wig, having cut off his own hair.

1708, August 20th. Mr. Cheever died. The welfare of the province was much upon his heart. He abominated periwigs."

The venerable John Elliot, the apostle to the Indians, believed that the sufferings endured by the people of Massachusetts in Philip's war, were inflicted on them as a judgment from heaven for wearing wigs!

Even the members of the Society of Friends were troubled with the wig question. From the minutes of the monthly meeting, I make the following extracts:

"1721, November 16th. At this meeting we received an account from ye quarterly meeting, in which we are desired to consider the wearing of wigges and give in our judgment at the next quarterly meeting to be held at Salem.

1721, December 21st, Hampton. The matter above mentioned consarning ye wearing of wigges was discoursed, and it was concluded by this meeting yt ye wearing of extravegent superflues wigges is altogether contrary to truth."

[Newark Daily Adv.

ANECDOTE OF DR. NETTLETON.—A young man just completing his professional studies, was induced to accompany some female friends to the pastor's study. He there gave a promise that before he retired that night, he would, on his knees, offer a prayer for himself. Possessing strict integrity, when he went to his room, he thought of the promise; he was embarrassed—he walked the room, in a cold winter's night, till late, before his proud heart would yield; and when he fell on his knees, such was the struggle in his mind, he said, "He would not, if he could be President of the United States, that any should know he was on his knees in prayer." There he was awakened, and after more than a week's struggle, he was made willing in the day of God's power. He became not only distinguished as a physician, but as a Christian and an officer in the church.

DUTIES OF DAILY LIFE.—It is a great misfortune, that people commonly amuse themselves with idle and imaginary schemes, how they would behave, and what they would do, were they in such and such a situation. They would be very good and very exemplary, were they very great, very learned, very wealthy, very retired, very old, and the like. But they neglect the gift which is in them, and the work which is appointed for them, while they are thinking of that which is not. Alas! that man's thoughts should be so taken up with dreams and reveries how they would manage were they in another station, while the chief wisdom of life consists in the assiduous discharge of those duties which belong to their own proper calling. The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, August 7, 1845.

"O LORD, REVIVE THY WORK."

Zion now languishes, and her watchmen mourn over her desolations. They remember the time when she enjoyed refreshing seasons, and when the anxious inquiries of the thoughtful mingled with the praises of the redeemed. They think of the sinfulness of her present state, of the dangers which threaten the impenitent, of the blessings which would flow from a revival of religion; and they cry out in the language of the prophet, "O Lord, revive thy work in the midst of the years." To this they look as the only security against a decline in numbers, in spirituality, and in holy living—as the only means of sustaining the benevolent movements of the day, and saving our country from the ravages of infidelity. Hence their prayer for a genuine and wide-spread revival of pure and undefiled religion.

We say it is for a genuine revival that they pray—not for one of those seasons technically so called, at which some itinerant preacher is sent for, in expectation that his vociferous efforts and mechanical arrangements will awaken the church, and bring the impenitent into the kingdom of Christ. We have already had too many such excitements. They have in cases not a few withdrawn the thoughts of men from the true source of help, benumbed the finer feelings of the real Christian, and filled the Church with all manner of rubbish, so that her walls are built more of wood, hay, and stubble, than of gold, silver, and precious stones. A revival is needed which shall commence with the feeling of dependence which prompted the prayer of the prophet—shall be continued by the Spirit of God, in connection with faithful individual effort—and shall only cease when the hearts upon which it has wrought its influence are cold in death.

For such a revival we are dependent wholly upon God. It is his prerogative to revive his work, and he will not give his glory to another. We may call together as many eloquent preachers as we please, and afford them every possible opportunity to speak to the people; but unless God sees fit to use them as instruments, and to give his own efficiency to their efforts, they will be totally useless. "Paul may plant and Apollos water, but God giveth the increase." Shall we therefore fold our arms, and wait for him to do the work irrespective of us? Shall we give up hope, because it is said, "Vain is the help of man?" By no means. This would argue extreme unbelief in God's promises—nay, it would prove downright infidelity. He who has power to save us, has explicitly promised, that when his people shall bring into the storehouse their tithes and offerings, he will "open the windows of heaven, and pour out a blessing, till there shall not be room enough to receive it." There is, therefore, no reason for despondency, and no apology for indolence. Indeed, we believe that a just sense of dependence upon divine aid, instead of promoting indolence, is the first preparation to receive this blessing, and the surest pledge that it shall finally be given. It is not upon those who feel confident in their own strength, and rely mainly upon their own wisdom or tact, that God's favors are most richly bestowed. It is upon those who acknowledge that "the excellency of the power is of God," and who therefore cry out from their inmost hearts, "O Lord, revive thy work."

The aid of the Holy Spirit is indispensable to a genuine revival. How is the desponding or backsliding Christian, in a time of declension like the present, to be inspired with new courage or roused to a new and deeper sense of his obligations? Not alone by any internal and self-moving principle, but by the aid of the Spirit of God. "We are not sufficient of ourselves to think any thing as of ourselves, but our sufficiency is of God." How are the careless and stubborn to be awakened from their carelessness and cured of their stubbornness? Not by the unaided sermons of so-called evangelists, but by the influence of the Holy Spirit bestowed in answer to prayer. That alone can breathe upon the dry bones and make them to live. That alone can rouse the soul dead in trespasses and sins to a consideration of the things of a higher life.

Nobody doubts that in this time of general declension a revival is imperatively needed—a revival which shall not be excited and sustained solely by human influences, but which shall spring from and be continued by the life-giving power of the Spirit of God. Such a revival we may have if we will seek it in earnest, and from the true source. Let us then turn our eyes to Him who alone can help us, and unitedly pray, "Wilt thou not revive us, that thy people may rejoice in thee?"

BIBLE BURNING.—We stated some weeks ago, that among the three hundred Roman Catholics who had been converted in Canada, there was one priest, now a Congregational minister, who was brought to repentance by means of a Protestant Bible which he took by stealth from a stove where it had beenplaced by his bishop in order to be burned. The editor of the Catholic Herald wants to know the name and residence of that bishop. We can only say, that the fact was taken from a long statement of missionary labors in Canada, made before the General Convention of Vermont. We have not leisure just now to visit Canada or a mission of inquiry preparatory to answering the editor's question; but we doubt not he could obtain the information he desires, by writing to the President of the Vermont Convention, or to the delegate from Canada who made the statement.

BAPTIST FOREIGN MISSIONS.—The Baptist Foreign Mission Board has been greatly embarrassed for a time past by a debt of forty thousand dollars. The subject was brought up at their Anniversary some three months ago, and a determination expressed to pay up the debt at once. We now learn, that in the space of four weeks twenty-five thousand dollars was subscribed for the object in New England, and that the whole sum will undoubtedly be raised in a short time. This is done mainly by large contributions of five hundred or one thousand dollars each, and will not probably affect the regular contributions for Foreign Missions.

EXPECTING TOO MUCH.

In the Advent Herald for July 23d, we find a long article designed to prove the assertion of Prof. Stuart, that "the early Christians, one and all of them, held the first day of the week to be sacred." The editor of the Herald introduces the article by saying, that "the question has been mooted by some respecting the day that should be observed as the Sabbath;" and he evidently expects, that the testimonials touching the sacredness attached to the first day of the week by the early Christians will satisfy all minds. Now we happen to be of that unfortunate class who cannot take certain quotations from the Fathers as proof of a doctrine, merely because some body says that they are proof. Hence we were led to inquire, after reading the article under consideration, What then? Suppose we grant all that this writer and the best advocates for Sunday ever attempted to prove in regard to the sacred estimation in which the first day of the week was held by the early Christians, what does it amount to? Does it prove that the observance of the seventh day has been abolished, so that we may be excused for neglecting it? Not at all. Does it prove that the first day has been substituted for the seventh as the Sabbath? By no means. What then does it prove? Why, simply this, that the early Christians attached a sacredness to the first day of the week, and were accustomed to hold certain religious services on that day. And yet, on such ground as this, men are expected not only to trample upon the seventh day, which God has once and again pronounced sacred, declaring that "in it thou shalt not do any work," but they are also expected to call the first day the Sabbath, concerning the sacred or sabbatic character of which there is not one single word in the Inspired Volume! This is expecting altogether too much ever to be realized. Thinking men will certainly examine for themselves, and when they find an argument so framed that there is no connection whatever between its premise and its conclusion, it will serve rather to disgust than to convince them.

THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

Strange notions some people entertain about the proper sphere of the religious press. We have now before us a long article on the subject, in which some wiseacre has mapped out the editorial sea, and stuck down stakes to mark its principal dangers. To his mind the chief danger lies in controversy; and to guard against this, he would have it made an invariable rule, that an editor should hold no controversy with any paper, either of his own communion or of other denominations. A wise rule, surely! We wonder what that man thinks religious newspapers are for. He certainly can have no idea of their exerting a positive influence to restrain evil and promote the right and true. All he looks for, evidently, is a good-natured, wishy-washy, purposeless talk once a week, which means nobody and affects nothing. With such notions we have no fellowship. The world is full of evil and error, which very often finds its strongest support in religious newspapers. An editor who makes it a rule never to rebuke such supporters of error, may do them no hurt, but he certainly will do them no good. For our part, we had rather have no dog than to have a "dumb dog;" so we had rather be without newspapers than to have those that dare not or will not speak. We know some papers in which the rule of having no controversy seems to be pretty strictly observed. They always have a good word for every body and every thing. Men and measures directly hostile to each other, and doctrines which are palpably contradictory, are alike noticed and commended, as though it was their principal business to keep on the right side of all parties. We seldom take up one of those papers without thinking of the old sailor, who, in a case of great emergency, betook himself to prayer, and commenced, "Good Lord—good devil."

FOREIGN MISSION OF SOUTHERN BAPTISTS.—The Acting Board of the Southern Foreign Mission Convention has resolved, that with as little delay as possible, it will proceed to establish missions in the free ports of China, or such of them as may be selected for the purpose. Negociations are now pending with the Baptist Board of Missions in Boston, for the transfer of the China mission to the Southern Board. Should these negociations prove successful, a reinforcement of missionaries will be sent out; if not, missionaries will be sent to found an independent mission.

SOUTHERN SPIRIT.—The division between the Baptists of the North and South, leads to a very close scrutiny of the sentiments of such northern men as are connected with southern institutions. The most recent illustration of it is in the case of Rev. Dr. Pattison, who a few weeks since entered upon the duties of his office as President of Covington Institute, Ky. He had no sooner taken his post, than he was assailed by nearly all the southern papers to define his position in regard to slavery, with the comfortable assurance, that he has either to satisfy the reasonable expectations of the South, or his position will yield neither honor nor profit to himself nor the institution. We believe that he has not yet complied with their wishes.

THE LOVE OF MONEY.

"The LOVE of Money if the ROOT of all evil."—PAUL.

When we inquire for the origin of any of the multiform evils which have marred the beauty of society, interrupted the pleasures of social intercourse, corrupted the churches, and rendered lifeless and inefficient most of our religious acts, we generally look no farther than to secondary causes, which are really associate evils with those we are deploring—elder branches of the same strange and corrupt vine, and receiving their nourishment from one accursed root. And while our attention is occupied in lopping those offensive twigs, this fruitful vine is shooting forth other branches of a similar nature, which will produce abundantly the same corrupt fruit.

This root is peculiar to no age, soil, or climate. From it sprang "all evil" eighteen hundred years ago, both in the cities of Israel and in Gentile lands; and now, in this western world, its luxuriant and wide-spread branches yield "only evil continually."

The love of money is identical with selfishness, and their legitimate fruits are the same. It produces envy, discord, and malice; pride, contempt, and folly; lying, cheating, and theft; strife, hatred, and murder; oppression and slavery; starving poverty and destructive luxury; intemperance, disease, and death. It has produced the spiritual dearth and moral death which at this time pervades the nominal church. It modifies the communications of ministers, and warps the understanding of the hearers. It severs the links of brotherhood which should bind the members of the visible church together, and constitutes them isolated beings—encircling each in the mantle of an unyielding avarice. It exalts polished vice, and tramples on humble virtue. It purchases memberships, directorships, flattering titles, and a commanding influence in our religious institutions. It displaces love and consequent obedience to God, frowns upon the utterance of unadulterated truth, exalts tradition, and promotes hypocrisy and self-deception.

That the love of money is the root of all evil, is the testimony of inspiration. Let God be true, though every man be proved a liar. Receive not the suggestions of a depraved and deceitful heart, that the expression is very indefinite or ambiguous. Do not modify it to suit a carnal mind. Add not to it, lest God add to your cup His threatened wrath. Take not from it, lest he take your name from the Book of Life. Receive the truth as God, through the Apostle, has communicated it; and learn from it where to apply the sword of the spirit, to the effectual destruction of the lusts of the flesh.

GORDON.

Stonington, Ct., July 29th, 1845.

HOW IT STRIKES OTHERS.—We copy the following paragraph from a notice, by the editor of the New York Tribune, of a new work entitled "Elements of Moral Philosophy, on the Basis of the Ten Commandments; by S. A. Sawyer, President of Central College, Ohio." The extract shows very well how the common argument for the change of the Sabbath strikes an unbiased observer:—

"We could not concur with the author in his limitations of the great command, 'Thou shalt not kill,' so as to approve of killing by law or by war, otherwise than in absolute, palpable self-defence; nor are we able to follow him in the 'hop, skip and jump' process by which he proves that the Sabbath was changed from the seventh to the first day of the week, by simply showing that Christ's early disciples were accustomed to assemble on the first day for worship and charity, calling it, not the 'Sabbath,' but the 'Lord's day.' He quotes a few lines from Justin Martyr to prove what nobody disputes about the Christian worship on 'the Lord's day' and omits the far more positive and pertinent argument of Justin against a Sabbath, based on the palpable disregard of it by the elements."

ANOTHER ILLUSTRATION.—The editor of "the Perfectionist," has in his last paper a short review of an article which recently appeared in the Gospel Banner upon the subject of the Sabbath. Among the knotty questions which he propounds to the editor of the Banner, we find the following, to which we are quite sure he will get no answer:—

"If those who hold up sabbatism as the chief bulwark of religion, urge it on the ground of its being required in the Mosaic Law, ... I say, if they urge it on the ground of the law, why do they not, with the Seventh-day Baptists, insist on the observance of that day which the law enjoined, i. e. the seventh day, and not the first?—since there is not a particle of proof in the Bible, that the first day of the week was ever appointed by divine authority to be kept as a Sabbath instead of the seventh."

AMERICAN MISSIONARIES IN SYRIA.—The London correspondent of the Boston Traveler, under date of the 3d ult., speaking of the deplorable civil war between the Druses and Maronites on Mount Lebanon, says:—

"I have already mentioned that the American missionaries on Mount Lebanon were very much esteemed by the Druses and Maronites, and exercised a great influence over them. My statement is now confirmed by letters from Egypt and Syria. One letter, written by an Englishman, was published in a London journal yesterday, and the following just tribute is paid to our devoted countrymen in Syria. The writer says—'In the midst of the late struggle between them, (the Druses and Maronites,) the American Protestant missionaries acted a noble part. They remained in the villages after they had been burnt and sacked, dressed the wounds of the Maronites, and then went and performed the same good offices towards the Druses, being equally beloved and respected by both."

PRAYER EXTRAORDINARY.—We have received a copy of that extraordinary prayer delivered by the Rev. Levi Tucker, at Buffalo, on the occasion of the funeral obsequies of Andrew Jackson. It contains many "eloquent passages," and withal tells a great many new things—new to us, we mean, and new, the maker undoubtedly thought, to the Lord. It was not our privilege to hear that prayer, some years ago, which was pronounced "the best prayer ever delivered to a Boston audience." But we doubt much whether it was superior to the one under consideration. We hope our readers will be satisfied with the following extract, which is all we can spare room for:—

"In thy good providence, thou didst reserve this land as an asylum for the oppressed of all the nations of the Earth; as a cradle of civil and religious freedom for the world—a land, of the glory and perfection of which, in ancient times the Doric bards did sing,—a distant region far beyond the seas—in whose Hesperian climes, man should be perfect and be free—whose glittering hills were forever spanned by a bright bow of promise—and where human character was to receive its last perfect finish. This Eldorado of poetic vision, this lost Atlantis, is the home of our freedom. Thou didst direct our fathers hitherward, and watch over the infant colonies, which, amid many prayers and tears, they had planted. Thou didst turn away from our shores the vessels that bore Columbus the great discoverer of our continent, that holier men, and purer principles, than Spanish Catholics, should people this land of promise. And in thine own councils of infinite wisdom, thou didst so overrule the affairs of men, as to bring to these shores, the purest, noblest men of the old world—men fearing God—men in whose bosom liberty was deeply implanted—and who nursed it in the councils of peace, and the storm of war."

THE TRUE REASON.—Some of the Southern editors, in giving an account of the recent desperate attempt of a company of slaves to escape from Maryland, have expressed surprise at the spirit which has come over the slave population generally, and have asked the reason for it. The Baltimore Saturday Visitor thinks the true reason may be found in the following beautiful passage from a speech made in the Assembly of Virginia, by James McDowell, the present Governor of that State:—

"You may place the slave where you please; you may dry up to your utmost the fountains of his feelings, the springs of his thoughts; you may close upon his mind every avenue to knowledge, and cloud it over with artificial night; you may yoke him to your labor as an ox which liveth only to work, and worketh only to live; you may put him under any process which, without destroying his value as a slave, will debase and crush him as a rational being—you may do this, and the idea that he was born to be free will survive it all! It is allied to his hope of immortality; it is the ethereal part of his nature, which oppression cannot reach; it is a torch lit up in his soul by the hand of Deity, and never meant to be extinguished by the hand of man."

SENDING MONEY TO PUBLISHERS.—The plan of the Postmaster-General for sending money to publishers in the form of post-office receipts or certificates of deposite, seems not to meet with much favor. In some cases the Postmasters in small towns are unwilling to issue the receipts, and in others it is attended with considerable delay. We are quite inclined, therefore, to adopt the plan of the Herkimer Freeman, as follows:—

"After all, we think the best way will be for subscribers to mail their money directly to us, post paid. Paying to the Postmaster, taking his receipt, mailing that to us, and obliging us to call on our Postmaster for the money—all this looks to us like 'much ado about nothing;' the postage has got to be paid on your letter, whether it incloses the money or merely the receipt. We say, mail your money, post-pay your letter, and have done with it."

BUSINESS ITEMS.

☞ We publish a revised list of Standing Agents this week. From some of our old agents we have not heard during the last year. In most cases of this kind, we have erased their names from our list. We have also added several new names, and hope that such persons will accept the honors and discharge the duties of the office.

☞ By reference to our terms, it will be seen that when payments are delayed more than six months, $2,50 will be charged instead of $2,00. This rule has not been enforced during the first volume, because a different custom had become common, and we did not wish to incommode any body by breaking in upon it. It is easy to see, however, that such a rule is necessary, and that a neglect of it must often put a publisher to great inconvenience. Our bills are invariably paid when they become due, which is once a week. Of course, if the money due us is not paid in time to meet those bills, we have to advance it. Now however much we may believe in the blessedness of giving, our own experience leads us to doubt the blessedness of lending. We sincerely hope that we shall have no occasion to try it this year, but that before six months of the present volume have passed away, all of our subscribers (extraordinary cases excepted) will have enjoyed the satisfaction of paying the printer promptly. This will save us the necessity of applying the before mentioned unwelcome rule; it will save you the unpleasant consciousness of being in debt; in short; it will be a saving of feeling, purse, and everything else. Just try it this year, and see if you don't find it so.

THE CHRISTIAN PARLOR MAGAZINE.—The August number of this popular monthly is before us, and equals any of its predecessors in variety and elegance. The want of a lively and attractive religious magazine, which could rival those devoted exclusively to light literature, has long been felt. This work supplies the want. Its embellishments are of the highest order, and its literary character is such as to commend it to the refined and moral portion of the reading community. It deserves a liberal patronage. Edited by Rev. DARIUS MEAD; published at 141 Nassau street.

FULFILLMENT OF A PROPHECY.

In one of the letters which the senior editor of the Savannah Republican is writing to his paper descriptive of scenes and events on his tour to Europe, Egypt, Syria, and Palestine, we find the following extract, giving an account of his visit to Tyre, and showing the literal fulfillment of one of God's prophecies:—

We arrived at Tyre early in the afternoon, and surely no place can better correspond to the description of it. Formerly insular, it has been connected with the main land since the conquest of Alexander the Great, and the isthmus is still narrower than the site of the town, notwithstanding the accumulation of centuries. Of the ancient town not a vestige remains. All is buried beneath the sand, and several excavations in progress expose to view the substructions of ancient buildings, the piers and arches of an aqueduct, &c., but even these remains are doubtless long posterior to the era of the first Tyre. The present town is a miserable place, full of filth and wretchedness. The only thing of interest within the walls is the remains of a very fine church, which has been identified as the one in which Eusebius used to preach in the third century. Several fishing nets, spread out to dry, called to mind the prophecy—"And I will cause the noise of thy songs to cease, and the sound of thy harps shall be no more heard. And I will make thee like the top of a rock, thou shalt be a place to spread nets upon; thou shalt build no more."

MAKE THE MOST OF TIME.

Some have little leisure, but there are sundry expedients, any one of which, if farly tried, would make that little leisure longer. Most of the men who have died enormously rich, acquired their wealth, not in huge windfalls, but by minute and careful accumulations. It was not one vast sum bequeathed to them after another, which overwhelmed them with inevitable opulence; but it was the loose money which most men would lavish away, the little sums which many would not think worth looking after, the pennies and half-crowns of which you would keep no reckoning, these are the items which year by year piled up, have reared their pyramid of fortune. From these money-makers let us learn the nobler "avarice of time." One of the longest and most elaborate poems of recent times, was composed in the streets of London by a physician in busy practice, during the brief snatches of time when passing from one patient's door to another. And in order to achieve some good work which you have much at heart, you may not be able to secure an entire week, or even an uninterrupted day. But try what you can make of the broken fragments of time. Glean up its golden dust; those raspings and parings of precious duration, those leavings of days and remnants of hours which so may sweep out into the waste of existence. Perhaps, if you be a miser of moments, if you be frugal and hoard up odd minutes and half-hours and unexpected holidays, your careful gleanings may eke out a long and useful life, and you may die at last richer in existence than multitudes, whose time is all their own. The time which some men waste in superfluous slumber and idle visits and desultory application, were it all redeemed, would give them wealth and leisure, and enable them to execute undertakings for which they deem a less worried life than theirs essential. When a person says, "I have no time to pray, no time to read the Bible, no time to improve my mind nor do a kind turn to a neighbor," he may be saying what he thinks, but he should not think what he says; for if he has not got the time already, he may get it by redeeming it. [Rev. J. Hamilton.

WOMEN THE BEST NURSES.—Dr. Northall, of Brooklyn, L. I., has lately made a visit to the State Prison at Sing Sing, and has contributed to the Advertiser of his own city a lengthy account of what he saw there. Amongst his personal observations he states, that the sick are attended altogether by males, remarking that in his opinion such arrangements are wrong. "No man," he feelingly says, "we care not how well disposed, can be to the sick like a woman—no hand, however delicate the touch, can smooth the pillow like hers—no voice, however soft, is such music to a sick man's ear—no balm so healing as the soft comfort of her words. When sickness lays its heavy hand upon the convict, his chains should fall from his body—his crime be forgotten in his suffering, for we know not how near he may be to the presence of a Being, all mercy, and we would not have his troubled spirit go laden from earth with the remembrance of neglect and cruelty. We have all enough to answer for, without such testimony as this to plead against us."

While the eloquent Robert Hall was spending an evening at the house of friend, a lady who was on a visit retired, that her little girl might go to rest. She returned in about half an hour and said, "She's gone to sleep. I put on my night-cap and lay down with her, and she very soon dropped off." Mr. Hall hearing the conversation, said, "Excuse me, madam—do you want your child to grow up a liar?" "Oh dear, no sir; I should be shocked at such a thing." "Then bear with me while I say, you must never act a lie before her; children are quick observers, and soon learn that what assumes to be what is not, is a lie, whether acted or spoken."

"I remember," says John Newton, "in going to undertake the care of a congregation, I was reading, as I walked in a green lane, 'Fear not, Paul, I have much people in this city.' But I was soon afterwards disappointed in finding that Paul was not John, and that Corinth was not Warwick."

The teacher's State Convention assembled at Syracuse on Wednesday, 30th ult., at which there were present 100 teachers and members.

General Intelligence.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE—FIFTEEN DAYS LATER.

On Wednesday, July 30, the steamship Cambria reached Boston, with foreign news to the 19th July. There was an improvement in the cotton market, corn trade, and American stocks. Money was plenty, and the market in a healthy state.

Parliament was drawing to a close, and would probably be prorogued on the 5th or 7th of August.

In Ireland, O'Connell was endeavoring to rouse the people against the Irish Colleges Bill. The inquiry into the affray at Ballinghassing was going on slowly. The jury had decided that in the case of one of the men shot by the police, it was justifiable homicide.

France.—The great topic of general interest during the last fortnight has been the question relative to the Jesuits. After the famous appeal of Thiers to the Government to put the laws in force against the followers of Loyola, M. Rossi, was sent to Rome with the mission persuading the Pope to recall the Jesuits from France, and thereby save the Government the shame and scandal of being compelled to expel them by the strong hand. In this mission M. Rossi has completely succeeded—the religious communities of the Jesuits being ordered to be broken up, the greater part of their body to quit the kingdom, their noviciates to be sold, and their houses and property (they are very rich) to be disposed of. This is considered a great triumph over the religious party; and so undoubtedly it is—for, say what people will, the Jesuits are the ablest champions of the Romish Church. The religious newspapers console themselves by asserting that it was not the Pope who consented that the Jesuits should be sent out of France, but the General of the Jesuits himself.

The French papers contain the particulars of an outbreak in Catalonia. Some of the small towns round Barcelona had been called upon to contribute their levy of men to the army.

Italy.—The Pope has kindly given directions that the library of the Vatican shall be henceforth open to the public. It contains only a few printed books, but still it is one of the most valuable libraries in the world. The eruption of Vesuvius has attracted a host of travelers to Naples.

Russia and Circassia.—Letters from Constantinople, published in the London papers, state that, in a recent battle, the Circassians took from the Russians, after hard fighting and severe bloodshed, the castle of Solcha, on the coast of Abascia. Sheikl Shamil had arrived at the head of the river Kouban, with 30,000 men. Many Poles in the Russian army had deserted and joined Shamil. The Russian General offered large bounties for reinforcements, without success. He sent several Mussulman doctors of law from the Crimea to Shamil, to try to negociate for terms of peace. Shamil had three of them put to death. The Russian army has suffered dreadfully from scarcity of provisions. The crops of Circassia are said to be abundant.

Syria.—Letters to the middle of June from Syria, announce the breaking out of a fresh insurrection in Mt. Lebanon. An engagement between the Maronites and the Druses had taken place at Buccah, in the plain between the two Lebanons, which had terminated with a loss on each side of from one to one hundred and fifty men. The roads between Damascus and Jerusalem are no longer safe, and no caravan can travel by that route without a strong escort. The Arabs are from 40,000 to 50,000 strong, and are plundering right and left. An attempt has been made on the life of the French Consul at Damascus, and the whole country was, in fact, in a state of complete disorganization.

Algeria.—The intelligence from Algeria gives an account of the massacre of a thousand Arabs by the French. The cavern of the Dahro, where the Arabs had taken refuge, was the scene of this horrid affair. Here they were hemmed in, faggots were lighted, and the unfortunate wretches were burnt and suffocated in their place of refuge.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.

The weather has been variable of late, and attention continues to be fixed upon the crops. A good deal of rain has fallen, but it has been succeeded by sunshine, without, however, the requisite warmth. Nothing has yet occurred to the crops which cannot be repaired, and the yield may probably fall little short of an average one.

The war brig Rapid had arrived at Plymouth, with part of the crew of a captured slaver, charged with murdering Mr. Palmer, a midshipman, and eight of the crew of the Queen's sloop Wasp. The prisoners are ten in number, eight Portuguese and two Spaniards.

The quarterly meeting of the iron masters has recently been held in Staffordshire. During the last few weeks every description of manufactured iron has been reduced upwards of 20 per cent. The impression at present is, that the market will sink still lower, and some talk is already current about lowering the wages of colliers.

Agents for parties in the United States interested in the extension and success of mineral works there, are now in England, busily engaged in selecting our best workmen, and engaging them for employment in America; no less than forty of the men at the Bishop Wearmouth Iron Works have been tempted to give up their employment in England, and to proceed to the United States, to be employed in a manufactory there.

About ten thousand pounds have been subscribed in London, principally by bankers and merchants, towards the Quebec Fire Fund.

It is believed that upwards of six thousand pounds were brought out by the Cambria, as a portion of the sum subscribed, in London, for the sufferers at Quebec.

Within two days 80,000 Pine Apples had been sold in London, the produce of Nassau, N. P. and the Bahamas. The streets and thoroughfares were thronged with costermongers selling them at a penny a slice.

The Dutch Indianman, John Hendrich, was totally lost, together with 23 lives, on St. Paul's Island, on the 29th May last, while proceeding on a voyage from Amsterdam to Batavia.

The Paris police, detecting one of the secret haunts of high play, found there a lady in man's attire, a lady young, handsome, rich, and of high rank, but on whom the customary pleasures of a frivolous life had palled. She had been all the winter to this resort of sharpers, because there she could satisfy her thirst for high play.

In Pesth, Hungary, where famine is now terrible, children have been sold by their parents for small sums. The entreaties and tears of the little ones were vainly addressed to ears made callous by distress, or perhaps by the feeling that they might suffer less any where than at home. But they have not always ascertained even the name of the buyer. One child clung to his father's feet, promising never again to ask for bread if he might but stay at home. His pleadings were vain; he was sent with the stranger.

Vidocq is in London exhibiting a singular cabinet of curiosities. This consists of the various implements of his first trade as a thief and pick-pocket, and the disguise he made use of in his second, when, as police agent and spy, he found his way unsuspected into the darkest and strangest nooks of Paris. Though 72 years of age, he still possesses the power of shortening his apparent stature by some inches, not only while standing, but while moving and even jumping.

Fire and Loss of Life.—On Sunday afternoon last, a fire broke out in the cook-room attached to the "Ocean House," at Newport, R. I., which spread rapidly until the whole building was enveloped in flame and reduced to a smoking ruin. The building belonged to the "Ocean House Company," was finished last winter, valued at $36,000, and insured for $18,000. The furniture of the house was worth $25,000, of which one-third was burnt, nearly or quite covered by insurance. A correspondent of the Tribune writes as follows:—

"But the saddest portion of this calamity is the death of Samuel Fowler Gardner, Esq. one of the oldest, wealthiest and most estimable citizens of Newport. He owned a large amount of property here, and was the agent and part proprietor of the extensive Newport Steam Mills, and another of which he was exclusive owner. He leaves a wife and ten children. The body of Mr. Gardner was found in the ruins, more than half consumed—a key and a pencil lying on his chest.

"George Burrows and Robert Coxall were on the ladder with Mr. Gardner when the Eastern wing came down, and they fell outward, while he fell inside the burning walls. The two former are seriously injured, and it is doubtful whether Mr. Coxall will survive.

"It is said that there was a gentleman in the 2d story of the East wing, who was lost—but of this nothing is certainly known. Rumor also gives three or four other victims to the flames."

At the time of the fire the Ocean House was full of visitors to overflowing, more than one hundred having been turned away.

Interesting Statistics.—The following statistics of English Thieves residing in Philadelphia and New York, are from the Philadelphia Ledger, which journal vouches for their correctness:—

"Regular pickpockets, 59; regular burglars, 23; total, 82. Of these, twenty are worth $10,000 each, $200,000 in all. Thirty-five are worth $2,000 each, $70,000. Twenty-seven are worth $1,000 each, $27,000. Total, $297,000.

The average number of trips between Philadelphia and New York, made annually by each of these scoundrels, is ten. The amount of fare paid by them to the Railroad Company is, therefore, $6,500 per annum.

The average expense for living by each is 3,000 per annum, making a total of $246,000.

Out of the 82, 76 have been transported from England to Botany Bay, and have either served out their time or have escaped.

They generally assist each other in every emergency when required—but usually operate in squads of from three to eight. They travel at intervals over the United States, attend with regularity all large conventions or assemblies, distinguished springs and watering places, race courses, &c. Some of the number, however, remain for business at home. They may be found daily in Wall-street, watching persons who visit the banks. They may also be seen engaged in the same employment in the vicinity of the banks in Philadelphia. At night they frequent places of amusement of every description. They keep a vigilant eye upon travelers, and particularly upon agents who carry packages between the large cities, especially between Boston and Philadelphia. They are for the most part thoroughly educated to their business, and seem to be peculiarly qualified to delude and subdue the police."

Texan Leaders.—The Union furnishes a table of the members of the Texan Convention, from which we compile the following facts: The number of members is 61. Rusk, the President, is a native of South Carolina. He is a Lawyer. He went from Georgia to Texas in 1835. There is but one native Texan (Navarro of Bache) in the Convention. All the others left the United States recently—cause not mentioned. Of these, only 56 have signed the ordinance assenting to Annexation, and one of these (Bache) voted against it, but afterwards signed it. Their occupations are—Lawyers 23, Farmers 13, Planters 6, Merchants 3, Mechanics 2, Agricultor 1, Inspector 1, Surveror 1, Editor 1, Not given 9.

The oldest member is 64 years of age, (Standifer.) The youngest is J. M. Burroughs, aged 21. The States take the honor of giving them birth as follows: Tennessee 13, Virginia 8, Georgia 6, Kentucky 6, North Carolina 4, South Carolina 3, Pennsylvania 2, Massachusetts 2, Louisiana 2, Alabama 1, Ohio 1, Maine 1, Texas 1, England 1, not given, 10. Thus out of 61 members, New England has only 3; all the free States only 6. [Tribune.

An African Slave Trader.—The London corespondent of the Boston Atlas states that a person named M. Souza is the great chief of the trade at Wydah, where he lives surrounded with Oriental magnificence. He has in his vast seraglio a harem of four hundred women; his dinners are described as being equal to the feasts of Beltshazar, and served in the most luxurious manner; no male person is ever allowed to go beyond his grand dining hall. He is exclusively served by women, six of whom serve him with food, of which he never partakes till they have first tasted of every dish. He trades in slaves to a great extent, and has done so for many years. He is now quite old, and, it is said, he is generous and high-minded in every thing but his dealing in slaves. When advised by the French commander to abandon his wicked traffic in human flesh, and do penance for his sins as a slave dealer, by civilizing his adopted land, he answered that a British commander had already advised him to abandon the slave trade for that of palm oil, but that he despised that trade, as it would not afford him a sufficient profit to enable him to keep up his present profuse style of living.

Intermarriages and Insanity.—The Cincinnati Herald contains an article on this subject, designed to show that intermarriages of blood-relations always tend to deprave the race, and often lead to insanity. It is shown that in Catholic countries, where such intermarriages are interdicted, cases of insanity are very rare, while in Protestant countries they are of frequent occurrence. Thus, in Spain, the proportion of insane is but 1 to 7184, while in the United States they are 1 to 800.

Important—if true.—It is said you may take an old piece of herds-grass, that at present yields less than half a ton to the acre, and at the end of five years, without breaking up, fresh seeding, or manuring in any way whatever, you can raise the crop to 2 1-2 tons per acre, merely by permitting the grass to stand until the seed will just vegetate, before cutting; and further, that the hay will be better than if cut earlier. By mowing the crop sooner than that, the roots bleed and die out; and that is the reason why a second crop does not spring until a long time after. [Mich. Far.

To Prevent Must or Mowburn in Hay.—Take a number of smooth poles, lay butt-ends outside, so that they may be easily pulled out; let the mow or stack settle for a few days; then pull them out; this will leave a passage for the air into the hay, that will insure it aginst must or mowburn, for some distance around the holes.

Peppermint.—In a hurried trip through Lewis County the other day, we observed that many of the enteprising farmers there have turned their attention to the culture of Peppermint, from the oil of which they realize a handsome profit annually. In a certain district we saw more acres of this herb, as we thought, than of corn or other grain, and the plant appeared very thrifty and promising. Upon inquiry, we ascertained that the cost of preparing the ground, and planting the roots, which is done in continuous rows about 20 inches apart, and weeding, does not exceed $35 the acre. Three successive crops are obtained from one planting, when the thickness of the roots, grass, &c., require that newly prepared grounds should be again selected and planted. [Black River Journal.

Mob Spirit at Columbus, Ohio.—A negro boy 13 years of age committed violence, a few days since, on a little white girl 5 years of age, which produced considerable excitement. The boy was arrested, and after a hearing before the Mayor, committed to jail. While the examination was going on, a mob hunted a colored man, guilty of no crime, through High street, amid a shower of clubs and stones, to the cry of "Kill him, kill him," and in the evening the same men marched through the streets unmolested by the police, beating peaceable blacks and stoning their houses.

Cat and Bird Fight.—A friend in the country noticed a very singular contest a few days since. A good-sized cat had caught a little chipping bird, and was rushing off with her prey, when a king-bird, attracted by the cries of the victim, came to the rescue, and gave a loud alarm which was answered by a whole swarm of king-birds and swallows, which attacked the cat with such ferocity that she was soon compelled to drop her victim; but the feathered avengers were not content with this. They pursued the cat, continually pecking at her, until she found shelter under a barn, creeping through a crevice, where her tormentors did not venture to follow her.

An Antidote for Bed-Bugs.—A correspondent of the Express says that the following recipe for extirpating bed-bugs has been long and successfully used in the City Hotel: "Take a quantity of whale oil, and about the same quantity of lard or tallow, simmer them a few minutes together, so that they will mix. Apply the mixture with a feather or fine brush, to the crevices and joints of the bedsteads, and these vermin will not only desert the bed, but leave the room."

SUMMARY.

A new application of Galvanism is ascribed to Dr. Wright, of Pittsburgh—designed to give the wheels of locomotives the necessary degree of adhesion to the rails to enable them to surmount high grades, and thus dispense with some of their enormous weight. Dr. W. proposes to effect this adhesion, by simply, at will, as the occasion may demand, converting by means of galvanism, the periphery of the driving wheel into a powerful magnet. Its application is said to be very simple, and it is calculated that it will give each wheel an adhesive force of two thousand pounds additional to what it has from its weight.

A correspondent of the Cincinnati Gazette writing from Indianapolis says: "The census just taken of the State of Indiana shows a remarkable increase of polls over last year, being now about one hundred and sixty thousand, the returns of last year only numbering one hundred and eighteen thousand. The taxable property will not be less than one hundred and twenty-five millions of dollars. And yet we are told that our people are unable to pay any portion of the interest on our public debt."

Yesterday two bodies were discovered in the whirlpool, 3 miles below Niagara Falls, in the embrace of its everlasting whirls. How long they have been there, or how long they may remain, it is impossible to tell. Who they are, or where they lost their lives, is not known.

The steamboat Big Hatchee, on her trip from St. Louis to Weston, burst her starboard boiler on the 23d ult., as she was shoving out from the landing at Herman, killing five or six and badly scalding twenty or thirty others.

The New York Recorder announces the expected return of Rev. Dr. Judson, Rev. Mr. Abbott, and Rev. Mr. Van Husen, Baptist missionaries, on account of ill health. The two latter are on their way home.

The Pennsylvania State Interest due on the 1st of August, was promptly paid, by which means another stain of the Commonwealth was wiped away.

A colored man named Thomas, employed about the wharf on Peck-Slip, found a gold piece between the planking of the dock—and taking up the plank discovered $3,168 12, all in gold. We are informed that there is no doubt that this is a portion of the $5,000 stolen from Adams & Co. some time ago.

The Louisiana planters below New Orleans have machines by which to drain their marshes which lie below the level of the tides, converting them into the best plowing lands, at the low price of $15 per acre, including the government price of the lands.

We understand that nine fugitive slaves passed through this place to Canada a few days ago.—They were, we are informed, a portion of those seventy-seven it is said in all, who escaped from their pursuers, in the recent movement in Maryland, of which we have before published an account. At Buffalo, July 30, six thousand bushels of Michigan City wheat, afloat, sold at 70 cents, and 650 bbls. Black Rock flour, were taken for shipment at $3 50. Holders of common Western brands freely offer the same at $3 44, with no buyers. Nothing doing in corn, and none of consequence in market. A sale of 500 bushels of oats was made at 32 cents.

A ludicrous mistake happened some time ago at a funeral on Marylebone. The clergyman had gone on with the service, until he came to that part which says, "our deceased brother or sister," without knowing whether the deceased was male or female. He turned to one of the mourners and asked whether it was a brother or sister. The man very innocently replied—"No relation at all, sir, only an acquaintance."

We learn from the Paterson Intelligencer, that more than four hundred persons signed the temperance pledge, on Sunday the 20th inst., in the Roman Catholic Church of that place, immediately after the delivery of a discourse upon the subject by Rev. Mr. Quin.

The Columbia (Pa.) Spy says: There is quite a curiosity at the residence of Mr. Charles N. Wright, near Columbia, in the way of an apple tree, on which are apples as large as a man's fist and a number of blossoms. The blossoms have been coming out, from time to time, since early in the Spring.

Hon. Abbot Lawrence has presented Boston the sum of two thousand dollars, the interest of which is to be expended in prizes, to be awarded to deserving scholars of the Public Latin School of that City. The act is worthy of the head and heart of the donor.

Fruit promises to be abundant (says the Utica Observer) in the region round about that city. Plum trees especially require proping to prevent the limbs from breaking, such is the quantity and weight of the fruit.

The receipts at the New York Post-office during the last month have been only about $6,000—one half the amount received in the preceding month under the law.

At the residence of her daughter, in Hopkinton, R. I., on the 30th of July, of consumption, Widow Sally Berry, aged 66 years. Although called to endure much bodily suffering in her last sickness, yet she bore it with Christian fortitude and resignation, and waited patiently for her appointed time. Her last hours were spent in communion with God, giving another proof how precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints. She was a worthy member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Hopkinton, R. I. H. S. B.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' SEMINARY.

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, Principal, and Professor of Languages.
Ira Sayles, Associate Principal, and Professor of Mathematics,
Gurdon Evans, Professor of Natural Sciences.
J. R. Hartshorn, Professor of Anatomy and Physiology.
O. Stillman, Professor of Vocal and Instrumental Music.
Miss C. B. Maxson. Preceptress, Instructress in French, Italian, Drawing and Painting.
Mrs. M. B. Kenyon, Assistant in the Female Department.

From the very liberal patronage extended to this Institution during the past seven years, the Trustees have been induced to make arrangements for greatly increasing its facilities. The Chemical, Philosophical, Astronomical, and Mathematical apparatus is amply sufficient for a full illustration of the different departments of those Sciences. The apparatus will be farther increased at the commencement of the ensuing Fall Term, by the introduction of whatever may be necessary in other Sciences than those above mentioned, especially, by a MANIKIN of the most approved structure, now being imported from Paris, expressly for this Institution. This will enable the student of Physiology and Anatomy to pursue his studies with advantages nearly equal to those afforded by an actual subject, having this farther advantage of being divested of all those revolting circumstances ever attendant on the dissecting room.

The Teachers' Classes, as usual, will be exercised in practical teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective Instructors. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. Daily Lectures will also be given during the Fall and Winter Terms; and the public may be assured that this department of the Institution shall be conducted upon the principles of the best regulated Normal Schools, in this, or any other country.

Finally, the proprietors pledge themselves, that the reputation of this Institution shall be sustained by the introduction of whatever may be necessary to meet the demands of an intelligent public.

The Institution is liberally endowed and subject to the visitation of the Regents.

Its Library is choice and extensive, and accessible, also, to all the students gratis.

The Academic Year for 1845—6 consists of three Terms, as follows:—The First, commencing Wednesday August 13, 1845, and ending Thursday, November 20. The Second, commencing Wednesday, November 26, and ending Thursday, March 6, 1846. The Third, commencing Wednesday, March 25, and ending Thursday, July 2.

Expenses.—Tuition, per term, from $3 50 to $5 00. Board, per week, $1 00. Piano, (extra,) per term, $10 00. Washing, lights and fuel, per term, from $2 00 to $5 00. The entire expenses for an Academic Year, including board, washing, lights, fuel and tuition, (except on the Piano,) need not exceed $70 00; and may even be reduced much below this, where individuls board themselves, either separately or in clubs. For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense. SAMUEL RUSSELL,
President of the Board of Trustees

Miscellany.

Overdone.

Nothing is more common than for persons of a fruitful imagination, who can command a greater proportion of words than ideas, to seek to be eloquent by overloading their few thoughts with mere verbiage. To give power to an idea or strength to a sentence, they load it with many words, and stretch it out as though to make it strong, they must make it long; and when they attempt to be eloquent, they link a number of these long drawn sentences together. As an illustration of this kind of eloquence, we give the following, which we copy from a document now lying before us. It will be seen that the author is describing the law of slavery.

"The Law stalking upward, raising its merciless arm, lifting its ghastly and haggard countenance, lashing its fiery eyes, opens its yawning mouth, projecting its piercing tongue, straining every sinew, strengthening every nerve, stretches every cord, and calling forth all its strength, with one gigantic blow it strikes deep and cuts off man's humanity!—humanity falls, it sinks, and sinking, sinks under the ponderous and insupportable load of prisons, irons, chains, bolts, bars, manacles, handcuffs, coffles, branding-irons, neck-yokes, tug-irons, whips, cords, ropes, stocks, blood-hounds, tortures, stripes, lacerations, starvations, coercions, separations, robberies, murders, blood, tears, peelings, floggings and scourgings, besides bowie-knives, pistols, magistrates, constables, marshals, Judges, Legislators, Senators, Executives; and as the weight begins to fall from the highest crag of public opinion, on the innocent and defenceless slave, the Church with its Bishops, Diocesan Bishops, General Superintending and controlling Bishops, Sub-Bishops, Elders, Deacons, preachers, Exhorters, Licentiates, and all the lineage of the priesthood, with the moral law and Bible, they step on, down tumbles the mighty avalanche like a stormy tempest, it ruins and buries the symmetrical temple of humanity into mouldering—blackened ruins."

We will not attempt a critical examination of the above to see how many violations of the rules of rhetoric we can find in it. Perhaps the shorter way would be to examine and see if we can find one rule not violated, but we will not even do this. It is enough to say that to express ourselves clearly, and forcibly, we must use right words in their proper sense, and use no more of them than are necessary to make the sense perfect. We will notice a few of the errors in the above, in hopes that our hints may be taken kindly by some one who is about to write his first article; of course we do not presume to teach any but children, and youths at most, for surely we feel that we need to be taught. But to our task.

1. There are too many things, that is, too many different subjects thrown into one sentence. In this respect the sentence is entirely overloaded.

2. The author makes a bad selection of figures, and most unhappily changes them. He personifies the law, and converts it into a monster in the form of a horrible giant, striking a terrible blow at humanity, and cutting it off; then the figure is changed, and the monster, who used the sword a moment ago, becomes a great weight or a load, consisting of almost every thing of which one can conceive, such as prisons, irons, &c. Among these many things which make up the whole weight or load are a number which cannot be personified as a weight; such as bolts, bars, branding-irons, whips, bloodhounds, tortures, stripes, lacerations, starvations, separations, robberies and peelings. Men are never correctly represented as loaded with these, and yet of them it is said, "as the weight begins to fall," &c. But just as the weight begins to fall from the highest crag of public opinion. Here public opinion is transformed into the point of a rock projecting, we suppose, from the side of some mountain! But as this great weight, consisting of "separations, peelings," &c, begins to tumble from this rock of public opinion, the church, with all its officials, jumps on to increase the weight, and the whole is at once changed into a "mighty avalanche like a stormy tempest." It may not be easy to see how an avalanche can be like a stormy tempest, or if it be so, how the whole church, with all the priests of every class could get on to it. It would be difficult to step on to that which is like a stormy tempest. But what is very strange is, this "mighty avalanche," "tumbles down." An avalanche used to slide down, but this one tumbles. And what is still more strange, it "tumbles like a stormy tempest!" To finish this array of rhetorical figures, humanity, which was cut off by the "gigantic blow," is now transformed into a temple, and is buried by this avalanche of "bolts bars, chains, cords, ropes, whips, stripes, starvations, tears, peelings," &c., which "tumbles down like a stormy tempest." What is most strange of all, is, this temple which was cut off a moment ago, is not now buried beneath this "mighty avalanche," but is "buried into mouldering, blackened ruins."

3. Words are used improperly. This is done in two ways. First, by heaping so many words together which, in the connection, mean the same or nearly the same thing, as sinew and cord, as parts of the great giant, must mean the same thing. "Opening its yawning mouth;" yawning and opening mean the same. "Irons, chains, manacles, handcuffs and coffles," all mean nearly the same. "Stripes, lacerations, peelings, floggings and scourgings," all mean the same thing, and one of these words suggests all that is meant by the whole of them together.

Secondly, words are used improperly by being used in relations contrary to their commonly received meaning. We will give a few examples. The great monster is represented as "lashing its fiery eyes." The word "lashing" means either the act of binding fast, or the act of whipping with a lash, and hence, is not applied to any appearance or motion of the eyes. In describing the acts and appearance of the monster a verb is incorrectly thrown in between participles which are wonderfully strung together. "The Law stalking upward, raising its arm, lifting its countenance lashing its eyes, opens its mouth, projecting its tongue." This string of words should have been all verbs or participles to have been correct. The verb opens between participles, as above, is out of place.

Sorrow for the loss of Friends.

Every mental feeling may be made the subject of philosophical investigation. There are different degrees of mental pain which are appropriately distinguished by different terms, as uneasiness, discontent, dissatisfaction, vexation, melancholy, sorrow, and grief. We will speak only of the three last mentioned. Grief and sorrow are always attributable to some known cause, but melancholy may exist without any assignable cause. Men may be melancholy, and often are, they know not why, a sadness, like some mysterious cloud spreads itself over the mind, for which they can assign no cause. Grief is the highest, and melancholy the lowest, of these mental feelings, hence grief softens into sorrow, and sorrow softens into melancholy, and gradually wears off and brightens into cheerfulness.

Such is the progress of the mind, and such its triumph over afflictions when it is well balanced, sufficiently elastic and healthy. When the mind is not well balanced, or when some of its susceptibilities are morbidly excited, the result is often fatally otherwise.

It is a merciful provision of our Creator, that the mind should be the subject of such a complexity of thoughts and feelings, all modifying each other, that it cannot, connected as it is with the material world, through the fine senses, remain unchanged in any one state. Suppose a case; we lose a dear friend; the first emotion is grief. Under the paroxysm of grief, we feel as though we should always feel as we do. Our judgments, having learned from experience, may tell us that we shall not always grieve, but our feelings tell us that we shall always feel just as we do. But as weeks and months pass away, we soon find a change come over us, our grief wears off, until it is all but forgotten. The reason why this change takes place in our feelings is to be found in the fact that every thought and every mental feeling is modified by every other thought and feeling. To-day we are in a paroxysm of grief on account of the loss of a dear friend, and were there nothing to modify our mental state, our grief would remain unchanged, but as we come in contact with the world, and as other events transpire around us, new thoughts and feelings are awakened in the mind, and these combining with the mental state with which we started, that of intense grief, produces a new complex state, partly composed of the feelings of grief and partly of the new feelings. Thus the grief is rendered less intense, and the same process is continued every hour we live, until the feeling of grief has been combined with so many other feelings that it has nearly or quite lost its original character. In this case, when we think directly of the event that produced the sorrow at first, we view it through so many intervening events, every one of which has modified the original feeling, that the thought of the event does not recall the feeling of grief as at first.

This we believe to be the philosophy of a well balanced and healthy mind, but it sometimes appears to be the case that sorrow deepens by age, instead of being modified and finally wearing off. This is unnatural and unphilosophical, and hence, argues a diseased mind. In such case some of the mental susceptibilities are morbidly sensitive, so that an impression is like the sense of touch to the body, when made upon the naked quick. Owing to this diseased sensibility of the mind, the thought of the affliction revives the original feeling of grief in its force; and while one susceptibility is thus unduly excited, connected probably with a slight inflammation of some corresponding portion of the brain, other faculties and susceptibilities of the mind become proportionately inactive, and consequently, the new mental states, or thoughts and feelings which combine with the original feeling of grief to modify it, are less in number, and more feeble in degree. This is our mode of accounting for the mental phenomena above described. [Ibid.

A THRILLING INCIDENT.

In a Love Feast which we attended, says the editor of the True Wesleyan, a brother, in speaking, referred to the circumstances of his conversion, in a manner which awakened our curiosity, and led us to inquire into the particulars, and we obtained the following brief history of the brother's conversion.

He was a professed believer in universal salvation, and was a wicked man, and with all, a hard drinker. He was digging a well, and when he had descended thirty-six feet under ground, the whole caved in upon him and buried him that depth in the bowels of the earth. Every body gave him up for lost, yet they resolved to dig him out as soon as possible. A number assembled, and the work was soon begun, but it was in November, and a very cold and severe rain storm set in and lasted during the whole time of labor. They toiled for six hours in the cold and drenching rain, they then paused, and some listened carefully and fancied that they heard him groan. This gave them new energy, and as many as could work to advantage, exerted themselves to the utmost, and as they were overcome by hard labor and the effects of the storm, their places were taken by fresh hands. They had to send out to other neighborhoods in the night for fresh hands, of which there was no lack as information was given that they were wanted. In this way they labored for twenty-four hours, lacking ten minutes, when the buried man was exhumed.

When they had removed the earth around him, so as to free his body, it was found that one foot was fast beneath the stones that had formed the wall, and which caved in with the earth. Now came the most trying time, for the man's limb could not be freed but by removing some of the bottom stones, when it was expected the whole would start again, and bury up the person who should make the attempt. All fled from the danger; those who had been digging in the bottom left the well when the danger of prying out those stones presented itself. At last one man, a master carpenter, said he would descend and make the trial, and after briefly [illegible] his wife and children to the care and kind sympathies of the neighbors that stood around him, should he not come out again alive, he was let down, and pried out the stones so as to free the man's foot, and not another stone moved. He was again drawn up unharmed. The man who had been so long under ground came to soon after coming to the air, but immediately fainted. He was removed to comfortable apartments, where he soon recovered, and proved not to be seriously injured, and we believe he afterwards finished the well. He had his senses for a time in the well, and heard them digging, and knew what they were doing, but lost all sense long before they reached him. It proved the means of his conversion and a thorough reformation in life.

Dueling.

The following letter from Mr. C. M. Clay, is copied from the New York Tribune. It speaks well for the head and heart of the writer. By it we consider Mr. Clay as having exhibited a greater degree of courage than he would by fighting two duels.

LETTER FROM CASSIUS M. CLAY.

Horace Greeley, Esq.—The deep and heartfelt remonstrances of friends, elicited by my apparent willingness to resort to the duel, displayed in the first number of The True American, notwithstanding the very peculiar and trying circumstanees in which I have been placed, have led me to give this much debated subject my most serious and deliberate reflection. Whilst I shall ever contend for the right of self-defence where the civil power cannot or will not come to my rescue; so where the laws are sufficient for protection and the public sentiment enforces them, there I am willing to confess that the duel cannot be justified. Having fully tested the legal and moral power of my native State, to which I owe inviolate allegiance, I feel that I owe it to her—to our national religion—and to the spirit of the age, that I should subject myself to their sole protection. I therefore formally pledge myself never again to offer or accept a challenge, or in any manner to give dueling my countenance or support. Believing that this annunciation would not only be agreeable to you, but to many friends who have been so kind as to manifest an interest in my humble fortunes, associated in some slight degree with the cause of republicanism and rational liberty, I venture to ask for this note an insertion in your wide-spread columns.

Your friend and ob't serv't,
CASSIUS M. CLAY.

PEACE.—We see it stated that in London, no less than one hundred and ten sermons were preached on the subject of peace, on one Sabbath day. Let this course be pursued and war will cease.

GREAT LABOR ESSENTIAL TO GREAT ACQUIREMENTS.

BY REV. W. B. SPRAGUE, D. D.

No man ever makes great moral attainments without a corresponding degree of labor. There may indeed be great physical courage, and much of good nature and even generosity, without any effort whatever; because these great qualities belong to many a man's original constitution; and to exercise them is not to resist a current, but to fall in with it. But when I speak of moral attainments, I refer especially to the power of self-control, and to its exercise in accordance with the great principles of reason and righteousness; to the reduction of the various passions to their proper places, and the keeping of all our moral powers ready for healthful and vigorous action. And this I venture to say, is what no man ever gained without diligent and untiring efforts. Such a character, for instance, as that of Washington, could have been the result of nothing but the most patient and vigorous self-discipline. Washington, if history has given a fair report, while he was great in all the elements of his nature, was a man of like passions with those who have the strongest; and if he had grown up under the mastery of those passions, and they had been suffered always to tyrannize over him, how much would it have abated our admiration of him, even as a conqueror, that he had enemies in his own bosom that were stronger than he! But it was his foes within that he began to fight first; and the victory which he gained over them was the preparation for other victories;—the great secret of his success and of his glory. He had indeed great physical courage, which was born with him, but he had also moral courage that imparted to his character a yet brighter attraction, of which he was to a great extent himself the author. He was cool and thoughtful in the time of danger. He ventured on no rash experiments. He loved his country better than his life. The shocks of adversity never disheartened him, and the furnace of prosperity singed not the hair of his head. He was the patron of all that was good and useful. He was generous to his race,—great in everything; so that even the nation which he vanquished have erected monuments to his glory. But I repeat, that character, even with the material which the God of nature originally supplied, could have been the result of no superficial effort: it was a silent, but yet a laborious process, by which it rose and towered into such unparalleled magnificence. And what was true of Washington has been true of every other great man: he has been long active in moulding the elements of his own moral nature.

And surely it is no wonder that men must struggle hard for great moral attainments, when we consider the circumstances in which they are to be made. Account for the fact as you may, there is a moral disorder that has seized upon human nature; the effect of which is, that while the conscience points out one way, the passions often draw with tremendous power the other; and there is always reason to fear that the passions will get the better in every conflict. In addition to this, the atmosphere that we breathe is full of noxious ingredients; the theatre in which we move is a mere showbox of temptations; and there are influences without co-operating with the influences within, to impart to us a mean, or sensual, or grovelling character. Is it not obvious, then, that the man who will become morally great, who will rise far towards the perfection of his nature in such adverse circumstances, must make up his mind to labor for it. Is it not a self-evident truth, that no indolent man can be truly great—not great even in goodness?

If nothing great is accomplished without labor, then every one should be particular in respect to the object toward which his labor is directed; for labor is too valuable to be thrown away on unimportant objects. There are those indeed who are industrious in doing positive acknowledged evil; who task their powers, and noble powers too, to the utmost, in endeavoring to poison the fountains of moral influence, and carry a blight to every rising plant of virtue. But there is another class who exhaust their efforts upon objects of an indifferent character; who are always busy, without being busy to any important purpose; and the only chasm which their removal from the world occasions, is to be found in the empty space which their bodies had been accustomed to fill. Let no man, then, think it enough that he is active, unless his activity is directed in a suitable channel. If you will act with the greatest wisdom, you will endeavor to compass the double object of cultivating and exalting your own intellectual and moral nature, and rendering the best service to your generation and to posterity. This is an object that will abundantly reward your labors, both in this world and in the next. But the idea of living merely to amuse your fellow-men, is utterly unworthy of a rational creature. There are multitudes who spend their whole lives in writing books merely for amusement; and their whole object is gained in provoking a vulgar laugh. But I would respect a man just about as much, who should sit at the corners of the streets from morning till night to amuse the passers-by with many songs. Man was made for a nobler service; and he degrades his nature by wasting his energies upon nothing.

If nothing great is accomplished without labor, then every mind should be trained to labor, from the earliest development of its faculties. It is a serious defect in the matter of education, as it is generally conducted, that the training of the mind to a habit of activity is not commenced early enough; and that not unfrequently there is an adverse habit formed during the years of childhood and youth, which, in after life, is never effectually overcome. I would say, let every young man especially, under a high sense of his obligation to answer the great purpose of his existence, resist every temptation to indolence, and look for happiness only in a course of vigorous and well directed activity. Let these be a delightful association formed in his mind with labor—steady and persevering labor. Let him avail himself of all the rational helps which are within his reach, to aid in the culture of his powers, and in the prosecution of all the great and good ends to which he is devoted. I say again, you cannot sufficiently realize the importance of forming this habit early. Indolence in youth is the harbinger of a career marked by ignorance and uselessness, not to say folly and crime. Diligence in youth directed to worthy and important ends, is the pledge of a useful life, a dignified character and honored graves.

There is a class of young men who are engaged in some laborious worldly occupation, upon whom that part of the original curse is literally visited, by which man was doomed to get his bread by the sweat of his brow: and it too often happens, that young men of this description resign themselves to an inexcusable degree of ignorance, from an erroneous impression that their condition in life forbids the extensive culture of their intellectual powers. But in this they offend against their high destiny as rational and immortal beings. Be it so that they must labor with their hands: yet sometimes surely, this kind of labor must be intermitted, and then let the claims of the mind be recognized and met. Some part of every day should be sacred even with the mechanic and the farmer, to high purposes of intellectual improvement; and this, I have no doubt, would always be found practicable in the adoption of systematic arrangement and rigid economy. More than this,—when the mind has once been trained to a habit of reflection, it will be found that the head and the hands can be put in requisition at the same time; and that while the artizan is turning his wheel or blowing his bellows, he can also be framing an argument or solving a problem. And there are many cases in which intellectual and manual labor may go hand in hand; and this is especially true in mechanics; when the principle which the mind revolves, and the work which the hands perform, mutually illustrate and adjust each other. We need cultivated men in every department of life;—cultivated farmers and artizans, as well as lawyers, physicians, and ministers; but it not unfrequently happens that an ardent thirst for knowledge, even when combined with the humblest occupation, gradually elevates the individual to higher and yet higher employments, till he who had passed his childhood in learning to make shoes or set types, occupies, before he comes to his grave, some of the highest stations of dignity and influence. What an example of the effect of early and persevering labors was Lemuel Haynes! though he came into the world with the disadvantage of having a dark skin, and at a period too when dark skin had much fewer attractions that it now has; yet so inextinguishable was his desire for knowledge, that he would gain it though he had no better light than the light of a kitchen fire; and that man's labor had its reward [illegible] and he edified us by his conversation and preaching; and even as an intellectual man, he has left a name that is fragrant throughout the community. Let no young man, then, find an apology, even in the most adverse circumstances, for neglecting the culture of his mind; for there are no obstacles which will not disappear before a vigorous and persevering application.

A GOOD HIT.—The New York Organ says,—"Some of our exclusive moral suasion advocates talk as though they would like to use the law against every one who advocates legal suasion. That is like the man who joined the Peace Society, and then quarrelled with everybody else who would not join it."

The Organ says again,—"One million of dollars is paid for the support of paupers in this State, annually. If the liquor traffic was suppressed, nearly the whole of this burden would be removed. Is not the relieving the people of this enormous tax, a proper subject of legislation?"

POLITICAL MORALITY.—An exchange paper says of certain political letters, "We don't believe these letters are genuine, but there may be some who would believe them, and we therefore give a few."

This is truly characteristic, to publish a false political letter, because it is thought somebody will believe it.

FIVE FACTS.—A firm faith is the best divinity; a good life the best philosophy; a clear conscience the best law; honesty the best policy; and temperance the best medicine.

BOY KILLED.—An unfortunate accident happened on the Niagara Railroad, near Cayuga creek. It seems that a boy, who was a stranger, was discovered on the rear freight car, at Tonamanda, and not having taken passage, was requested to leave. He did not, however, as it appears, but continued on some miles, when he is supposed to have been jolted off. He fell, with his neck on the rail, so that the wheel severed his head from his body.

[Buffalo Commercial Adv.

On the 8th instant a box labelled "This side up with care," marked to "J. Bennett, Louisville, Ky.," and in another place "Crockery Ware," was brought to the wharf at Memphis preparatory to shipping. Soon after the box was landed on the wharf boat a strange noise was heard within, and upon its being opened, a live negro was taken from it. He had almost suffocated in his confinement—hence the alarm. It seems that this negro, who was a slave belonging to a gentleman in the vicinity of Memphis, had paid J. Bennett, a free negro, fifteen dollars to transport him to a free State, and he had, according to contract, boxed him up, and would have set him at liberty if he had been successful. Bennett was seized and sent to jail.

The Sabbath Recorder.

EDITED BY GEORGE B. UTTER. "THE SEVENTH DAY IS THE SABBATH OF THE LORD THY GOD." PUBLISHED AT NO. 9 SPRUCE ST.

VOL. II—NO. 8. NEW YORK, FIFTH-DAY, AUGUST 14, 1845. WHOLE NO. 60.

THOUGHTS ON THE PERPETUITY OF THE SABBATH.

NUMBER TWENTY.

God's Sabbatic Laws never put any unneccssary restrictions upon human comfort.

It is often objected against the observance of the seventh day for the Sabbath, that a strict construc- of the sabbatic laws is incompatible with the circumstances of a large part of the human family, and with the climate of some of the northern latitudes of the earth. Doubtless the traditions of the Jews have contributed not a little to produce and foster this prejudice against the Sabbath of the Lord our God; for their expositions of it are governed by the traditions of their fathers. We follow no such rule, but take those common-sense views of it which lead to such a construction of the law and the testimony, as makes the Sabbath what our infallible Lord and Teacher has said it is—an institution made for man. In the days of our Saviour, the Jews were charged with making the commandments of God of no effect by their traditions; and in no respect was this more apparent than in their traditions respecting the Sabbath law.

The Rabbinical doctors divided works into principal and secondary. Each principal work had a long list of secondary ones under it, the doing of any of which, was a violation of the Sabbath. Thus to grind was a principal work. All dividing of things before united in their nature, came under this head. The rubbing of ears of corn was of course, according to this tradition, a violation of the Sabbath.

Again, they might not carry burdens on the Sabbath day. Accordingly, although they might fill a trough with water, and lead an ox or an ass unto it, they might not carry the water to the beasts. Of course the poor man who was healed and took up his bed to carry it home on the Sabbath day, was a Sabbath-breaker, according to this tradition.

In the view of some of the Rabbins, it was unlawful to heal or minister to the sick on the Sabbath day. Accordingly, when Jesus Christ healed a sick woman of her infirmity on the Sabbath day, they said, This man is a sinner, for he keepeth not the Sabbath day.

Again, they limited traveling on the Sabbath day to a measurement of two thousand cubits; and to travel a greater distance than that, was punishable with beating.

Many other such like traditions had they respecting the Sabbath day. And many persons who ought to know better, reason respecting these things as though they had been divine laws, and refer to our Saviour's disregard of them, as an example of setting aside the Sabbath altogether—than which nothing can be more untrue in itself, nor more subversive of his doctrine and example. Not one of these regulations is, or ever was, of divine authority. Not only so, but they obscure and pervert the original design of the Sabbath day. Hence our Lord Jesus Christ sets his authority against the Jewish doctors. "The Son of man is Lord also of the Sabbath day." As a divine expositor of the law, he affirms that his disciples did not violate the Sabbath by rubbing the ears of corn, and that God loves mercy rather than sacrifice, so that their tradition respecting it was not approved of God. Again, he affirms that it was lawful to heal on the Sabbath day, and to do good to the bodies and souls of men; for this kind of work God the Father, who instituted the Sabbath, had been carrying on by his providence, from the beginning of the world. "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work." Again, it was lawful to save life; for the law allowed them to take an ox out of a pit, that had fallen into it, on the Sabbath day. In a word, all the restrictions they have superadded to the plain letter of the law, were unauthorized and injurious; for "the Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath."

Kindling fires on the Sabbath.

It is sometimes exultingly alledged by those that dislike God's holy Sabbath, that if we pretend to keep the Sabbath, we ought not to make any fire in our dwellings, nor cook any food, which in these northern climates would be perilous to our health.

Exod. 35: 3—"Ye shall kindle no fire throughout your habitations upon the Sabbath day," is the only passage on which the first of these prohibitions is supposed to rest; but with how much fairness, will be seen in the light of the following remarks. There are seven repetitions of the Sabbath law among the statutes given to Israel, besides its pronunciation on Sinai, its being written on the tables of stone, and the repetition of the laws contained in the book of Deuteronomy.

1st. Exod. 23: 10, 12—It was specially enjoined to be kept during the sabbatic year.

2d. Exod. 31: 14, 15—It was commanded to be strictly kept by the builders of the tabernacle; although this was God's work, yet being of a secular nature, they were commanded to keep the Sabbath during the time they were employed thereon.

3d. Exod. 34: 21—It was strictly enjoined during harvest time.

4th. Lev. 19: 3—It was strictly enjoined upon children to regard the parental restraint which required them to keep the Sabbath.

5th. Lev. 19: 30—In connection with sundry laws intended to prevent idolatry and licentiousness.

6th. Lev. 26: 1, 2—In connection with the maintenance and attendance upon public worship.

7th. Exod. 35: 3—It was strictly enjoined upon those who were directed to make vessels and other utensils for the tabernacle; which were to be of gold, and of silver, and of brass. As this service required hot and long-continued fires, it was strictly enjoined upon them that they should light no fires for that service on the Sabbath day. Dr. Clark, who follows Dean Prideaux, reckons that the Israelites, in furnishing the tabernacle, used 4,245 lbs. of gold, 14,602 lbs. of silver, and 10,277 lbs. of brass. For their times and circumstances, this was a great work; and as it was for the use of the tabernacle, if men felt as professing Christians do now, who lay the corner stones of meeting houses on the "Christian Sabbath," no wonder if they were under temptation to light a fire on the Sabbath day; and hence the repetition of the Sabbath law to these smelters, with the annexed prohibition, "Ye shall kindle no fires throughout your habitations on the Sabbath day." But to extend this to a prohibition to lighting fires for common purposes in our habitations, would be as illogical and arbitrary, as the Rabbinical tradition, which made it a sin to pluck an ear of corn and rub it to eat on the Sabbath day, because labor was prohibited by the law. Rabbinical doctors and Christian casuists have found in this prohibition a toleration for fire in the dwelling house if it were lighted before Sabbath begun, but no liberty to kindle a fire after the Sabbath commenced—a distinction favoring the rich, but bearing hard upon the poor.

I respect the judgment of wise and judicious men; but I cannot suspend my own, when I have equal facilities for ascertaining the meaning of any particular passage. I do not believe that prohibition was intended to apply to any other than fires for manufacturing or mechanical purposes; and I assign the following reasons for my opinion:—

1st. The whole narrative shows, that it was addressed to the makers of the tabernacle utensils, and to them only on the occasion when they received directions to make those utensils; and it had no reference to domestic affairs.

2d. The Sabbath law was never intended to interfere with human comfort. But the Sabbath was made for man's good, body and soul.

3d. Fire was used with the sacrifices in the tabernacle; so that there were some natural limits to the law.

4th. There was no divine law which required the Israelites to cook their food for the Sabbath on the day previous. It has sometimes been alledged, that Ex. 16: 23, required this; but all that is required is, that they should gather and prepare for cooking on the morning of the sixth day manna sufficient to last until first day morning. The Passover Sabbaths, so far as labor was concerned, were made to conform to the weekly Sabbath, that being before them in the time of the institution; and of these Moses says, Ex. 12: 16, "No manner of work shall be done in them, save that which every man must eat; that only may be done of you." Even the Pharisees thought it lawful to entertain their friends who visited the synagogue on the Sabbath day. In Luke 14: 1—24, we read that our Lord "Went into the house of one of the chief Pharisees to eat bread on the Sabbath day;" and there were there Lawyers and Pharisees a considerable company. From the nature of our Lord's discourse on that occasion, it is fair to suppose, that there was a sumptuous entertainment, which was not likely to be without some culinary process. If this was done by fires kindled the day before, they must have been replenished to keep them burning, which would be "straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel." It is safe to follow the example of Jesus Christ, who was holy, harmless and separate from sinners. As he partook of that Pharisee's entertainment on the Sabbath day, I conclude it is lawful for Christians to do the same with their friends.

Driving to Meeting on the Sabbath.

Seventh-day Baptists have sometimes been accused of inconsistency, and of violating the Sabbath law, by harnessing their horses and carriages to go to meeting; and as I think, unfairly and unkindly. If the language of the law had been intended to be understood as absolute and unlimited, there had been no occasion for those particular instances of special applications which repeatedly occur in the book of Moses. If it were intended to cover every kind of exercise which can be strained to appear like labor, then, when the disciples plucked corn and rubbed it; and when the man took up his bed and carried it home; and when Jesus spat on the ground and made clay of the spittle, and anointed the eyes of the blind man,—he was in the wrong, and the Parisees were in the right, about his breaking the Sabbath day. But there was no common sense nor reason in putting such a construction upon the law; for the law says, "THY WORK." Moses says repeatedly, "Ye shall do no SERVILE work therein." In the account of the institution, Gen. 1: 31, and 2: 1, and also in the law, we are informed that God finished all the works of creation in six days, but Gen. 2: 2, says, "On the seventh day God ended his work;" i. e. he made and numbered the seventh day, making it a week, and sanctified and blessed it. There was no new creation on the seventh day, but a sacred division of time made, and man taught to keep it holy unto his Creator. Whatever, therefore, is necessary to keeping that day holy unto the Lord, is a work unto the Lord, and not included in the prohibition, or in the requirement, "Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work."

The Sabbath law, like all of God's other laws, requires a heart "right towards the Lord our God," to keep it right. I have no doubt that professing Christians sometimes take advantage of these allowances, and make a visit to their friends, under pretence of going to meeting with them, on the Sabbath day, when they as really violate the Sabbath day by going that journey, as though they did not enter a place of worship during the day. If Christians live at such a distance from any particular place of worship, as to make it a day of servile labor to go to and fro on the Sabbath, when they wish to worship with that congregation they ought to do their journey on some other day. But that any man sins by riding such a distance to a place of worship as is consistent with consecrating as much time to the active worship of God as is ordinarily done by those who live near to the house of God, I do not believe; and that for the following reasons:

1st. Public worship on the Sabbath is of divine appointment; in the nature of things, all cannot live near a place of public worship; and in the weakness unavoidable to sex and infirmity, many could not attend unless they were carried there.

2d. No precise limit was set, by a divine requirement, for journeying to the house of God on the Sabbath day—excepting that which was consistent with sanctifying it unto the Lord; and we know that good men of old did go some distance to the house of God. Our Saviour was accustomed, when he attended the temple by day, to lodge out of the city by night. The author of Psalm 42: 4, says, "I have gone with the multitude; I went with them to the house of God, with the voice of joy and praise, with a multitude that kept holy day." In Ps. 86: 6, "Who, passing through the valley of Baca, make it a well; the rain also filleth the pools. They go from company to company [margin;] every one of them in Zion appeareth before God." Valley of Beca, means the valley of mulberry trees, and is the same as Rephaim, near to Bethlehem, (2 Chron. 11: 15,) in the tribe of Judah, six miles from Jerusalem—a place familiar to the Psalmist David, (2 Samuel 5: 22, 23,) who, driven by the rebellion of Absalom, to the land of the Hermonites, so pathetically laments his former priveleges, and furnishes us with a testimony that the holy men of old did go some considerable distance to appear before God in Zion, on her holy days.

As the distance is not precisely limited, neither is the mode of traveling: True, Ex. 23: 12 says, "That thine ox and thine ass may rest." But rest does not require man or beast to be entirely dormant. To a laboring man, or a laboring beast, it may be a day of rest with a moderate degree of exercise. In the primitive times of Israel, a fashionable mode of traveling was by riding on asses. Judges 12: 14. And in the days of Elisha the man of God, a great and pious woman of Shunam, called unto her husband, and said, "Send me, I pray thee, one of the young men, and one of the asses, that I may run to the man of God, and come again. And he said, Wherefore wilt thou go to him to-day? It is neither new moon nor Sabbath." 2 Kings 4: 23. This incident mentioned of saddling an ass in connection with going to the man of God on the Sabbath, shows that the pious men and women in Israel, and the prophets of the Lord, considered such a matter allowable, and consistent with the law.

On a certain Sabbath mentioned Matt. 13: 12, and Mark 3: 1—12, our Lord, after teaching and healing in the synagogue at Capernaum, withdrew to the sea side; and being followed by great multitudes, spake to his disciples, that a small ship should wait on him, from the deck of which he addressed the people. Had this been a preparation for fishing, all would doubtless have considered it a violation of the law. But as it was for the single purpose of preaching the gospel, who could call it a violation of the Sabbath?

Every view which the Bible gives us of this holy institution, shows that its great moral design is the glory of its Author, and the good, temporal and eternal, of the man that obeys it. And the man who calls it a delight, holy unto the Lord, and honorable, has no insurmountable difficulties in ascertaining and doing what the law requires.

THE SHOEMAKER OF HAGENAU.

The dealers in indulgences had established themselves at Hagenau, 1517. The wife of a shoemaker, profiting by the permission given in the instruction of the commissary general, had procured against her husband's will, a letter of indulgence, and had paid for it a gold florin. Shortly after, she died; and the widower, omitting to have mass said for the repose of her soul, the curate charged him with contempt of religion, and the judge of Hagenau, summoned him to appear before him. The shoemaker put in his pocket his wife's indulgence, and repaired to the place of summons. "Is your wife dead?" asked the judge. "Yes," answered the shoemaker. "What have you done with her?" "I buried her, and commended her soul to God." "But have you had a mass said for the salvation of her soul?" "I have not; it was not necessary; she went to heaven the moment of her death." "How do you know that?" "Here is the evidence of it." The widower drew from his pocket the indulgence, and the judge, in presence of the curate, read in so many words, that, in the moment of death, the woman who had received it would go, not into purgatory, but straight into heaven. "If the curate pretends that a mass is necessary after that," said the shoemaker, "my wife has been cheated by our Holy Father the Pope; but if she has not been cheated, then the curate is deceiving me." There was no reply to this defence, and the accused was acquitted. It was thus that the good sense of the people disposed of these impostures.

DEATH OF JOHN HUSS, A. D. 1415.

BY EMILE DE BONNECHOSE.

Then commenced the afflicting ceremony of degradation. The bishops clothed John Huss in sacerdotal habits, and placed the chalice in his hand, as if he was about to celebrate mass. He said, in taking the alb, "Our Lord Jesus Christ was covered with a white robe, by way of insult, when Herod had him conducted before Pilate." Being thus clad, the prelates again exhorted him to retract, for his salvation and his honor; but he declared aloud, turning towards the people, that he should take good care not to scandalize and lead astray believers by a hypocritical abjuration. "How could I," said he, "after having done so, raise my face to heaven? With what eye could I support the looks of that crowd of men whom I have instructed, should it come to pass, through my fault, that those same things which are now regarded by them as certainties should become matters of doubt—if by my example, I caused confusion and trouble in so many souls, so many consciences, which I have filled with the pure doctrine of Christ's gospel, and which I have strengthened against the snares of the devil? No, no. It shall never be said that I preferred the safety of this miserable body, now destined to death, to their eternal salvation."

The bishops then made him descend from his seat, and took the chalice out of his hand, saying, "O accursed Judas! who, having abandoned the counsels of peace, have taken part in that of the Jews. We take from you this cup filled with the blood of Jesus Christ!"

"I hope by the mercy of God," replied John Huss, "that this very day I shall drink of His cup in His own kingdom; and in one hundred years, you shall answer before God and before me."

His habits were then taken off one after the other, and on each of them the bishops pronounced some malediction. When, last of all, it was necessary to efface the marks of the tonsure, a dispute arose amongst them whether a razor or scissors ought to be employed. "See," said John Huss, turning towards the Emperor, "though they are all equally cruel, yet they can not agree on the manner of exercising their cruelty."

They placed on his head a sort of crown or pyramidal mitre, on which were painted frightful figures of demons, with this inscription, "The Arch-Heretic;" and when he was thus arrayed, the prelates devoted his soul to the devils. John Huss, however, recommended his spirit to God, and said aloud, "I wear with joy this crown of opprobrium, for the love of Him who bore a crown of thorns."

The church then gave up all claim to him—declared him a layman—and, as such, delivered him over to the secular power, to conduct him to the place of punishment. John Huss, by the order of Sigismund, was given up by the Elector Palatine, vicar of the Empire, to the chief magistrate of Constance, who in his turn, abandoned him to the officers of justice. He walked between four town sergeants to the place of execution. The princes followed, with an escort of eight hundred men, strongly armed, and the concourse of people was so prodigious that a bridge was very near breaking down under the multitude. In passing by the Episcopal Palace, Huss beheld a great fire consuming his books, and he smiled at the sight.

The place of punishment was a meadow adjoining the gardens of the city, outside the gate of Gutleben. On arriving there, Huss kneeled down and recited some penitential Psalms. Several of the people, hearing him pray with fervor, said aloud, "We are ignorant of this man's crime; but he offers up to God most excellent prayers."

When he was in front of the pile of wood, which was to consume his body, he was recommended to confess his sins. Huss consented, a priest was brought to him—a man of great learning and high reputation. The priest refused to hear him unless he avowed his errors and retracted. "A heretic," he observed, "could neither give nor receive the sacraments." Huss replied, "I do not feel myself to be guilty of any moral sin; and now that I am on the point of appearing before God, I will not purchase absolution by perjury."

When he wished to address the crowd in German, the Elector Palatine opposed it, and ordered him to be forthwith burned. "Lord Jesus!" cried John Huss, "I shall endeavor to endure with humility this frightful death, which I am awarded for thy holy gospel—pardon all my enemies." Whilst he was praying thus, with his eyes raised up to heaven, the paper crown fell off; he smiled, but the soldiers replaced it on his head, in order, as they declared, that he might be burned with the devils whom he had obeyed.

Having obtained permission to speak to his keepers, he thanked them for the good treatment which he had received at their hands. "My brethren," said he, "learn that I firmly believe in my Saviour; it is in His name that I suffer, and this very day shall I go and reign with him!"

His body was then bound with thongs, with which he was firmly tied to a stake, driven deep into the ground. When he was so affixed, some persons objected to his face being turned to the east, saying that this ought not to be, since he was a heretic. He was then untied and bound again to the stake with his face to the west. His head was held close to the wood by a chain smeared with soot, and the view of which inspired him with pious reflections on the ignominy of our Saviour's sufferings. Faggots were then arranged about and under his feet, and around him was piled up a quantity of wood and straw. When all these preparations were completed, the Elector Palatine, accompanied by Count d'Oppenheim, Marshal of the Empire, came up to him, and for the last time recommended him to retract. But he, looking up to heaven, said with a loud voice, "I call God to witness, that I have never either taught or written what those false witnesses have laid to my charge—my sermons, my books, my writings, have all been done with the sole view of rescuing souls from the tyranny of sin; and, therefore, most joyfully will I confirm with my blood that truth which I have taught, written, and preached, and which is confirmed by the divine law and the holy fathers."

The Elector and Marshal then withdrew, and fire was set to the pile! "Jesus, Son of the living God," cried John Huss, "have pity on me!" He prayed and sung a hymn in the midst of his torments; but soon after, the wind having risen, his voice was drowned by the roaring flames. He was perceived for some time longer moving his head and lips, as if still praying, and then he gave up the spirit. His habits were burned with him, and the executioners tore in pieces the remains of his body, and threw them back into the funeral pile, until the fire had absolutely consumed every thing; the ashes were then collected together and thrown into the Rhine.

THE BLIND AND DEAF GIRL AND HER BIBLE.

Would you know the value of the Bible, let me introduce you to a scene of deep and thrilling interest, which was related by a minister and an eye witness. A young woman completely blind and deaf, was brought before a number of eminent surgeons to see if anything could be done for her. Her sad condition had been suddenly produced by a violent pain in the head.

The only method of communicating with her was by tapping her hand, which signified no, and by squeezing it, which signified yes. The surgeons concluded that her case was incurable, and in reply to her earnest inquiries, she received the unwelcome tap. She immediately burst into tears and wept alone in all the bitterness of anguish. "What," said she, "shall I never see the light of day, or hear a human voice? Must I remain shut up in darkness and silence as long as I live?" and again she wept. It was an affecting sight. If she had been able to see, she might have been pointed to the promises of the Bible; if to hear, they might have been cited for her comfort. At length a friend who was present took up the Bible and placed it to her breast. It was a touching and beautiful act. She placed her hands on it, and asked, is this the Bible? Her hand was squeezed in reply. She immediately clasped the Bible in her hands, and held it to her bosom and exclaimed—"This is the only comfort I have left, I shall never more be able to look upon its blessed pages, but I can think of the blessed promises I have learnt from it," and then began to repeat some of its promises, "Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and he shall sustain thee. Call upon me in the day of trouble and I will deliver thee. My grace is sufficient for thee," &c. She dried her tears, became submissive to the will of God, and was happy.

MEMORY AND CONSCIENCE.

The power of memory and conscience is finely illustrated in the following paragraphs from a discourse by the Rev. Dr. Beecher:

'Connected with conscience is the office of memory. The retrospections of the mind are as rapid as the flash of lightning. More rapid are they than the transmission of ideas by the Telegraph between Washington and Baltimore, or the transmission will be, when, as such may happen, thoughts are carried in a few moments around the earth.

'I knew a man who said that, in falling twenty feet, when he expected to die, the thoughts of a lifetime seemed to pass through his mind. He thought of his business—of his wife—of his children—and of that eternity to which he was going. A life seemed to pass through his mind and nothing is lost. So it will be when memory summons the acts of a life, at the last tribunal. Nothing is lost. Thoughts once impressed, but apparently lost, will come again. A life is written on our memory, as with invisible ink. It is apparently lost to our frail sight while here. But in the judgment light it will be seen enveloped around us, and will be unrolled till every line and letter is made visible. I knew a sailor once, who said that when once in a storm on the giddy mast, while trying to furl sail, and could not, he cursed God. It passed out of his mind for twenty years, but now, in a season of excitement, he said, Now I remember it. I am lost!'

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, August 14, 1845.

WHOSOEVER WILL LET HIM COME.

How rich and free that closing invitation of the Sacred Volume. National lines can not bound it. Outward differences can not restrict it. Age, or profession, or expectation, can not at all affect it. Whosoever will, let him come and take the water of life freely.

Perhaps you have gone the round of earthly pleasures and amusement, and have exhausted your strength in the pursuit of phantoms which vanish as you approach them. Weary and disheartened, you look upon the past without pleasure, and upon the future without hope. To you this invitation is given—Come and take of the water of life freely. Listen then to the voice which inquires, "Wherefore spend your money for that which is not bread, and your labor for that which satisfieth not?" Heed the persuasive admonition; and find by happy experience, that those who hearken diligently shall eat that which is good, and let their souls delight in fatness.

Perhaps you have gone in pursuit of earthly riches, in hope that they would set you free from anxiety and minister to your comfort. But as wealth and luxury have increased around you, the desire for it has grown stronger and stronger, until you have found that to increase possessions is to increase care. Does your mind at times turn away from these unstable objects with a degree of loathing and heaviness? To you the words of the Son of God are addressed, "Lay not up for yourself treasures on earth." To you the Book of Inspiration speaks, "Wisdom is more precious than rubies, and all the things thou canst desire are not to be compared with her." To you the invitation is extended, Come and take of the water of life freely.

Perhaps you have been ambitious of the applause of your fellow men. For a time your efforts to secure it were successful, and you experienced a sort of intoxicating pleasure in the consciousness of being an object of admiration to those around you. At length some trival change turned away from you the eyes of a fickle multitude, and fixed them upon a newer and more dazzling object. How soon did admiration give place to disgust—how soon were your virtues pronounced vices—how soon was the hand which had been stretched forth to help, either withdrawn or exerted for your hurt.—Or, perhaps you continued to be an object of admiration. But how soon did the expressions of admiration become insipid to you. How soon you longed for those who would speak the truth with plainness and affection. In such circumstances, have you sickened at applause, and thirsted for something more substantial? By this means the Spirit of God was teaching you the folly of seeking honor from men, while you neglect that which comes from God alone. By this means he was inviting you to come to the waters of life, and accept the honors and consolations of the Gospel.

Perhaps you are a child of God, and are seeking your joy in the pursuit of heavenly objects. But to you there will come times of heaviness and anxiety—times when your faith can be sustained only by resorting to the invitations and promises of the Bible, and there partaking of the waters of life. Sometimes you will have to mourn the low state of piety in the church, and the absence of the Comforter. How encouraging then the declaration, "The Lord hath sent me to appoint unto them that mourn in Zion, beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, and the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness." Sometimes you will be tried by the violent assaults of indwelling sin. What a satisfaction to know, that finally "the God of peace will bruise satan under your feet." Sometimes a mysterious Providence may take away the acquisitions of your industry, or the friends with whom you have taken sweet counsel. What a support is found in the assurance, that God afflicteth not willingly—that he chastens those whom he loves—that we have in heaven a better and enduring substance. Sometimes reproach, and cruel mockings, and bitter persecutions may come. Think then of the words of the Son of God, "If ye be reproached for the name of Christ, happy are ye, for the spirit of God and of glory resteth upon you." Indeed, there is no circumstance in which you can be placed, for which the words of Scripture are not adapted. Come, then, to this fountain of instruction, and drink here the waters of life freely.

SELF-SUPPORTING MISSIONS.—It is an encouraging feature of the missionary work, that its influence is ever increasing. The labor and money expended in some dark corner of the earth, may bring into the field other laborers, who will carry forward to an incalculable extent the work which has been begun. There are several instances of the kind on record. The mission of the English Baptists in Jamaica has not only become self-supporting, but has excited the Christians of that island to engage in a mission to benighted Africa. A Missionary Society in Maulmain now supports twenty-five native missionaries, although it was thought only twenty years ago, that "the whole of India would not support one missionary." It is thus that bread cast upon the waters returns after many days.

REV. DR. SHARP.—We mentioned some months ago the departure of this venerable Baptist preacher on a visit to the scenes of his childhood in England. He has returned to his church in Boston, where he gave some account of his tour on Sunday, the 3d inst. He expressed his conviction, that far more happiness is enjoyed by the mass of the people in this country than those of England, which he attributed in part to our form of government. He compared the character of the clergy in the different countries, and gave the preference to those on this side of the water, where the facilities for a thorough education are much the best. A great change for the better, he thinks, has taken place in England. The increased freedom of the press, and the improved condition of education among the operatives, he spoke of as very encouraging signs of progress. His whole sermon on the subject is said to have been exceedingly interesting and instructive.

HARVARD COLLEGE.

There has been not a little strife between the Unitarians and the Orthodox about the question which denomination ought to have the controlling influence in Harvard College. The Unitarians have now almost the exclusive control; and both parties have coincided in excluding Baptists from all participation in its government. It appears, however, from statements which we find in the Christian Watchman, that the Baptists have as strong claims upon it as any other denomination. Thomas Hollis, of England, who was foremost among its early pecuniary benefactors, was a decided Baptist; and he made it a condition in endowing the Professorship of Divinity, that it should be filled by "a master of arts in communion with a church of Congregationalists, Presbyterians, or Baptists." The first President of the College, Rev. Henry Demster, was a Baptist, and once "bore public testimony, in a church at Cambridge, against the administration of baptism to any infant whatever"—a doctrine which it was declared came from the Evil One. The second President of the College, Rev. Charles Chauncy, was also "conscientiously wedded to the belief, that immersion in baptism, and the celebration of the Lord's Supper in the evening, were true scriptural doctrines." Both these Presidents were distinguished for piety, talent, learning, and fidelity. Considering these facts in the early history of the College, it is difficult to see what apology can be given for the sectarian and illiberal course which has been pursued towards the Baptists.

A LETTER—SEVERITY—ACCIDENTS.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:

DEAR SIR,—Accident has placed me where I have the opportunity of reading your paper. I call it your paper, for it is sustained principally by your denomination, I suppose. But accident has placed it under the control of very able hands; and one, I trust, who is able under all circumstances to do it justice. But in noticing some pieces in it with regard to the Sabbath, I am constrained to think that accident has placed you in circumstances in which you are most too severe; for if you are right with regard to keeping the Sabbath, it is accident that has made you so, and not anything that appertains to you more than other folks. You did not make yourselves Seventh-day Baptists; it was your predecessors, or accident. Therefore, if accident had placed your lot amongst other denominations, then you would not have been Seventh-day Baptists; then you would have been wrong as well as we. But it is accident that has placed you where you are, as well as us. Think of that when you are writing on the subject of the Sabbath. You may insert this if you are willing.

A STRANGER, BUT A FRIEND.

Remarks.

☞ The foregoing is a most instructive letter. The writer seemes to have commenced it under the promptings of an uneasy conscience, in hope of quieting his uneasiness by finding fault with us. But proving this to be a poor salvo, he settles down upon the very comfortable conclusion, that except for accident "you would have been wrong as well as we." You would have been wrong as well as we! Does not that tell the whole story? Alas that the heart should speak so frankly from its own fullness. It is evident that the writer has never been schooled in jesuitical disputation, or he would not so freely have acknowledged his conviction of a truth from which he endeavors to escape. As it is, there is no occasion for us to argue the question with him. We can simply refer him to the twelfth chapter of Luke, where he will find it written, among other things, "And that servant which knew his Lord's will, and prepared not himself, neither did according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes."

But we are "most too severe," are we? Perhaps we are; indeed we have often had such fears. But how can one help talking plainly—sometimes severely—to those who advance the ever varying and conflicting arguments by which the claims of the first day are professedly supported? One man tells us, that the fourth commandment is moral in its nature, and therefore perpetually binding; and yet in the very next breath he asserts, that the appointment of the seventh day is positive in its nature, and therefore not perpetually binding. Another man tells us, that the fourth commandment only requires one seventh part of time; yet he finds fault with those who keep the seventh day, and denounces as Sabbath-breakers all those who do not keep the first day. A third man tells us, that in this matter of the Sabbath we must follow nothing else than the express word of God; yet in his very next paragraph, perhaps, he attempts to support the first day by an appeal to Church History or the Fathers. Thus they go on heaping up arguments directly contrary to each other, and subversive of the truth. Now, however much we may desire peace, we can not purchase it by talking smooth things to the advocates of all these heterogeneous theories. We must tell them the truth plainly, though we should be accounted their enemy therefor. But we apprehend, that in most cases where the charge of severity is raised, it will be found that the truth itself is more unpalatable than the language in which it is presented. Indeed, we have seldom known an instance in which a falsehood was so dressed up as to be called severe by those whom it concerned.

Respecting the notion that Seventh-day Baptists are made such by accident or the influence of their predecessors, we have a word to say. In the first place, we do not believe that the religious opinions of genuine men are often formed by accident or predecessors. If we did, we would adopt at once that blasphemous old complaint, "The fathers have eaten a sour grape, and the children's teeth are set on edge." But waiving this, there are two or three considerations which may possibly help our correspondent to a better opinion of the influences which make Sabbath-keepers. The first consideration is, that it is a great damper upon worldly prospects, for a man to keep the Sabbath at the present day; hence large numbers of those who are educated in its observance, and are really convinced that it ought to be kept, are induced to adopt the day commonly observed for the sake of convenince. Now it is exceedingly unreasonable to suppose, that those who remain firm, in such circumstances, are kept so merely by accident, or the influence of their predecessors. All your "accidental" men fly off at once when temptation comes, and take their stand in the popular ranks. Those who remain are men rooted and grounded in the truth. The second consideration we wish to present is, that a very large number of those who now keep the Sabbath, were once observers of the first day. Some of them were preachers, who, for conscience's sake, have left pleasant associations and good salaries, to join themselves to a sect every where spoken against. Others were men in business, who have sacrificed many earthly advantages in order to obey the divine commandments. These are not the men to be warped by circumstances, or kept in restraint merely by parental leading strings. They are men of thought and conscience, or they could not be men of such independence and self-denial. We hope our correspondent will take these considerations into account, before he writes again on the subject, and that his opinions will be somewhat modified thereby. Meanwhile we thank him for his kind reproof, and hope he will long continue to cherish towards us the friendly feeling which his signature suggests.

PERPLEXING, TRULY.—In the last number of the Christian Messenger, a Universalist paper published in this city, we find an article more than a column long, in which are gathered up the names and crimes of several Episcopal and Presbyterian ministers, who have been deposed from their offices, and cast out of the pale of the visible church, on the charge of licentious conduct. The writer acknowledges that the case of these men tries his faith in Universalism exceedingly, and tempts him to renounce it. He assures us, however, that "in all cases of this kind there is but one fact that can silence our doubts—the fact that the grace of God is infinite." But he seems not to be exactly satisfied with this, and we have been looking about for some word of encouragement for him. We light upon two passages which may be somewhat consolatory. The first tells us where these men shall not go, as follows, "No whoremonger, nor unclean person, nor covetous man, who is an idolater, hath any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God." The second tells us where they shall go, as follows, "Whoremongers, and sorceres, and idolaters, and all liars, shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone, which is the second death." Now as the writer of the article under consideration evidently expects to escape from "the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone," and to have a place "in the kingdom of Christ and of God," he certainly ought to find consolation in the thought, that those bad men will not go where he goes. But whether this ought to strengthen his faith in Universalism is not for us to say.

WOMEN IN CHINA.—In nothing is the happy tendency of the Gospel more clearly seen, than in the change which it produces in the condition of woman. In China the females do not meet with the males in the public assemblies. But wherever the influence of Christianity is felt, this absurd custom at once passes away. The Chinaman now in this country with the Baptist Missionary, Mr. Dean, was asked what he thought of our mixed assemblies. His reply was, that as women have souls, and will help to form the society of heaven, it seemed to him appropriate that they should unite in worshiping God here on earth.

LIBERALITY OF CITY CHURCHES.—The editor of the Baptist Register has gleaned from the Minutes of the Hudson River Association the fact, that some of the Baptist Churches in the city of New York contribute more each for benevolent purposes than some whole Associations in other parts of the State. The amount of Oliver street church, Rev. E. Tucker pastor, of 633 members, is $4,346. Stanton street, of 579 members, Rev. D. Bellamy pastor, is still more, $4,527—a church too in moderate circumstances. Amity street, of only 254 members, Rev. W. R. Williams pastor, is $3,000. Tabernacle, $2,686, and several others between one and two thousand dollars.

TOLERATION.—There are several European governments in which the ecclesiastical relations of ruler and people are entirely different. The King of Saxony, for instance, it is said, is a Roman Catholic, although the greater part of his subjects are Protestants. The King of Belgium, on the other hand, is a Protestant, while the most of his subjects are Roman Catholics. The King of Greece is a Catholic, yet most of his subjects are of the Greek Church.

THE HESBEIYANS.—We learn from the Day Spring for August, that the Hesbeiyans who seceded from the Greek Church last year, have returned to the communion which they thought they were leaving for ever. They were unable to obtain toleration through the intervention of the Protestant powers of Europe, and saw nothing before them but perpetual persecution. Hence they felt constrained to make peace with their enemies. The Patriarch of the Greek Church is said to be very glad to get them back, and will probably allow them to do very much as they please, if they will only renounce the name of Protestants.

THE MISSIONARY STATION at Phillipolis, South Africa, has been abandoned on account of a sanguinary war between the Boors and Griquas. The whole country was in arms, and the worst atrocities were committed—the prisoners taken by either party from the other being murdered in cold blood. It is only a few years since a mission of the American Board in South-Eastern Africa was broken up under similar circumstances.

MISSIONARY REPORT.—We mentioned some time ago the fact, that the Campbellites, in consideration of the efforts of New England in behalf of the Western States, had determined to send missionaries into the Eastern States. Accordingly a mission was established, and four missionaries have been for some time on the ground. The following is an extract from a report of one of these missionaries. It gives a dark picture of the state of things in "the Land of the Pilgrims":—

"It is a melancholy fact, that, at present, scepticism and downright infidelity in Christianity sit like an incubus upon the moral faculties of that investigating people. The mysticism which has been cast around the simple Gospel, by teaching it in the words of man's wisdom, has at once robbed it of its charms, and produced divisions, contentions, and unholy strife, until thousands, bewildered, disgusted, and overwhelmed in a labyrinth of perplexities, land upon the soul-chilling ground of materialism."

AN ACCIDENT ON THE SABBATH.—The Boston Courier publishes an account of the following distressing accident at Plymouth. If it had occurred on a Sunday instead of the Sabbath, how many long homilies would have been inflicted upon the reading public from this single text. For our part, we believe it proves just as much for the seventh day as other accidents do for the various days on which they occur—and no more.

"On Saturday, 2d inst., while a party were hunting deer in Plymouth woods, Mr. Jerome Purrington was shot by Mr. Augustus Holmes. Mr. Purrington was from Rhode Island, on a visit to his father in Carver, who was one of the party. Soon after they had taken their stations, Mr. Purrington, for some unknown reason, left his, and was approaching that of Mr. Holmes, who, hearing the rustling in the bushes, fired at the first glimpse with fatal effect. As the gun was discharged he perceived his mistake, ran to Mr. Purrington, raised him up, and asked him if he had killed him; he smiled, bowed his head, and died immediately. He was about twenty-six years old. Mr. Holmes' distress is great at this lamentable occurrence, but those who are acquainted with deer-hunting will absolve him from all blame."

THE POWER OF KINDNESS.—Hon. Horace Mann, Secretary of the Board of Education in Massachusetts, is engaged in a controversy with certain pedagogues on the question whether corporeal punishment is either useful or necessary as a means of securing proper discipline in Schools. The Secretary tells the following story, which is a sufficient answer to all that we have ever seen urged in favor of the ferule and switch:—

"In a town not thirty miles from Boston, a young lady, who aimed at the high standard of governing without force, and had determined to live or die by her faith, went into a school which was far below the average, in point of good order. Such were the gentleness and sweetness of her manners and intercourse with her pupils, that for a few days, there was nothing but harmony. Soon, however, some of the older pupils began to fall back into their former habits of inattention and mischief. This relapse she met with tender and earnest remonstrances, and by an increased manifestation of interest in them. But it was soon whispered among the transgressors that she would not punish, and this added at once to their confidence and numbers. The obedient were seduced into disobedience, and the whole school seemed rapidly resolving into anarchy. Near the close of one forenoon, when the state of things was approaching a crisis, the teacher suspended the regular exercises of the school, and made an appeal, individually, to her insubordinate pupils. But, finding no hope-giving response, from their looks or words, she returned to her seat, and bowed her head, and wept bitterly. When her paroxysm of grief had subsided, she dismissed the school for the morning. After intermission she returned, resolving on one more effort, but anticipating, should that fail, the alternative of abandoning the school. She found the pupils all in their seats. Taking her own, she paused for a moment, to gain strength for her final appeal. At this juncture of indescribable pain, several of the ringleaders rose from their seats and approached her. They said to her that they appeared on account of the school, and particularly on their own, to ask pardon for what they had done, to express their sorrow for the pain they had caused her, and to promise, in behalf of all, that her wishes should thereafter be cordially obeyed. Her genuine sorrow had touched a spot in their hearts which no blows could ever reach; and, from that hour, the school went on with a degree of intellectual improvement never known before; and, like the sweet accord of music, when every instrument has been attuned by a master's hand, no jarring note ever afterwards arose to mar its perfect harmony."

The Tribune states that upwards of two thousand persons from the city visited Fort Hamilton last Sunday.

☞ On our first page will be found a valuable article concerning the burdensome restrictions which human tradition has placed upon the Sabbath law. Read it, if you want light on that subject. Indeed, we may go farther, and say, Read all those articles on the "Perpetuity of the Sabbath," unless you are willing to be great losers by overlooking them.

THE GENERAL CONFERENCE.—It will be seen by referance to a notice in another column, that the General Conference meets at Alfred, Allegany Co., N. Y., in less than four weeks from this date. It is high time that those churches intending to send delegates, should have the matter under consideration, and make their appointments.

AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY.—At a meeting of the managers on Thursday last, seven new auxiliaries were recognized; the receipts, as reported for July, $16,930 18, and the number of Bibles and Testaments issued in the same time, 43,327. Interesting accounts were presented from places where local auxiliaries were employing Bible colporteurs and supplying the destitute. Among other letters, one was read from the President, Hon. John Cotton Smith, on the importance of correct orthography according to our Bible standard; one from Rev. Dr. Kollock, accompanying an ancient folio German Bible for the library, with plates of Luther and the German princes who took part in the reformation; one from Mount Lebanon, in Syria, giving a fearful account of the war between the Druses and the Maronites; and one from a member of the board now traveling in Europe.

There are fears of serious difficulty with the Indians in Western Texas. Maj. Ringgold, at Fort McHenry, has received orders to keep his troop of Flying Artillery in readiness to march for Texas at a moment's warning. Capt. Duncan, now at Fort Hamilton, a few miles below this city, has received the same order in regard to his Flying Artillery.

FACTS FOR NOVEL READERS.

The habitual or frequent reading of novels blunts the moral sense. Without stopping to inquire how it does so, I will state a fact or two tending to confirm this position.

In the circle of my acquaintance, is a young lady who has for some years been greatly addicted to novel reading. I have known her from a child. She is the only daughter of pious parents, whose great concern has been to educate this child and render her an ornament to society. They are wealthy, and to effect this great object of their desire, pecuniary expense has never been spared. The daughter well repaid the pains bestowed upon her education. She grew up, respected for her intellectual attainments, beloved for her kind and amiable disposition, and revered for her apparent attachment to the cause of Christ. Thus for years she lived. But in an evil hour, these devoted parents introduced to their fireside the bewitching novel, and allowed it and its satellites to become the companions of the daughter. Mistaken parents! how bitterly did they afterwards repent the step they had taken! The novels they at first placed in the hands of their daughter, were comparatively harmless and unexceptionable. They were in a great measure free from the moral taint of the French school; they were written in elegant, classical language; they inculcated a good moral; "no doubt (thought these parents,) such reading will greatly tend to improve Laura's literary taste—the style is so beautiful and faultless!"

But while Laura's parents were indulging in such dreams, Laura herself, more intent on the matter than the manner of these novels, was making rapid advances in a branch of education which had formed no part of the schedule of these devoted parents. The morbid appetite which these books of fiction engendered, soon demanded other stimulants and condiments. By and by, the appetite became the ruling one that governed her in all her literary selections. Then it was her parents discovered that she was more indifferent to the moral bearing of the books she selected than to their romantic interest. They saw it with pain; yet they gratified her wishes, trusting to her known principle to guard the heart. Laura read on. She became a confirmed novel-reader.

Mark now the result. The indelicacies of the grosser novels, which would once have filled her with disgust and indignation, she can glide over with interest, and even approbation. I was grieved, deeply grieved, in a conversation I had with her a few days since, to perceive the sad change which had been wrought in her feelings and taste. She did not hesitate to apologize for even the worst productions of Bulwer. She could see nothing objectionable on the score of morality in Eugene Aram and Zanoni!

More than this: that once pure-minded girl, who would blush at the bare mention of any thing calculated to bring a stain upon woman's fame, now calmly and unblushingly defended one of the worst novels that ever disgraced any eye—the "Mysteries of Paris,"—a book so foul and poisonous that its author, while preparing it, was arrested by the municipal authorities of the French capital, on the ground that these "mysteries" were too impure even for that community—a book which is regarded as a magazine of moral death by all the best critics in the civilized world! This young lady—the gifted, the refined, the virtuous Laura—could see nothing to condemn, and much to admire, in the embodied experience of one of the most shameless libertines of Paris!

I have no remarks to make upon such a case as this. I only ask, is it not true that novel-reading blunts the moral sense? Are not the purest and holiest chambers of the soul invaded by the genius of a poisoned literature?

But I have not done with the recital of the case of poor Laura, though I would to God there were no more to be told. This leaven, infused into the fountains of the soul, has poisoned the streams that lead from it. My young friend has lost her relish for a purer literature not only, but she has become indifferent in a great measure to all those kindly influences that cluster around the cross of Christ. Her friends have marked this change with pain. Her own parents perceive it, and deeply do they lament it. They see, too, and have admitted with tears, that this disrelish for spiritual things is to be traced to that memorable day when the novel first found a welcome at their fireside. That book kindled an unholy flame in the soul—it has burned the fiercer as new fuel has been contributed—and now it threatens to consume all the gold and precious things that have been garnered there. That novel, that comparatively innocent novel, which a misguided parental indulgence so cheerfully furnished, like the first glass in the case of the poor inebriate, was the cause of all this irreparable mischief. It created an appetite, to gratify which will injure, and may destroy the soul. The Spirit of God cannot dwell in the heart that is burning with a flame fed from the pages of the poisoned novel.

My young friends, there is only one course which you can adopt with safety, in relation to novel-reading—the same which we prescribe to check the ravages of intemperance—entire abstinence from every species of literature that intoxicates.

General Intelligence.

SEVEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The steamship Great Britain reached New York on Sunday last, bringing 43 passengers, and news to the 25th ult. The news is not specially important. Trade was good, particularly in cotton and American produce.

Parliament had not closed. There had been considerable debate about the New Zealand affairs. It was thought the bill to enable Jews to hold certain offices would pass.

In Ireland, O'Connell is still at work. He made a flaming speech at a repeal meeting on the 21st July, and announced that it was determined to hold two monster meetings in different parts of the country each month.

News had been received from Smyrna of another great fire there on the 3d of July, nearly as large as any that ever visited that city. Much loss was the consequence, and it was feared much suffering would follow.

In France a few days ago, says the Perigord, a farmer of St. Cere (Lot,) happening to find his brother in a field collecting roots of herbs for his family for want of bread, said to him—"Go to my wife and tell her to give you something until I send you a sack of flour." The brother delivered the message, but the wife refused to give him any aid. The poor man was so much affected at the refusal, that he threw himself into a well and was drowned. The brother on returning home, hearing of the catastrophe, was so much exasperated, that he seized an axe, and in a fit of fury, split his wife's skull.

The intelligence from Syria represents that country as being in a very disturbed state. The Druses were roving in quest of plunder, and intent upon pillaging all travelers who came within their reach.

The news from China is to the 8th of April. The most remarkable item thereof is an account of an assault by a mob of Chinese on Mr. Montgomery Martin, Mr. Jackson, (the Vice-Consul,) and the Rev. R. Hunter. These gentlemen were, it seems, walking round the walls of Canton, when they were unprovokedly set upon by the people, from whom they escaped with no other injury than the mortification of being buffeted and robbed by a crowd of low blackguards. The Governor of Hong Kong had sent to Keying to demand redress and guarantee for future good conduct, but the result is yet unknown.

The press of India, which has lately suffered so much from casualties and changes, has lately by death lost two of its members, one of them at least a very conspicuous one—Capt. M'Naghten, the proprietor and editor of the Calcutta Englishman, and Dr. Kindy, editor of the Ceylon Herald.

Sir Benjamin Brodie has extracted a Bokhara worm from the wrist of Dr. Wolff. It measured more than three feet in length.

It is said that at the show of the London Horticultural Society, at Chiswick, peaches measuring each nearly a foot in circumference, were exhibited. They were grown at Berleigh, the seat of the Marquis of Exeter.

One hundred female convicts have been put on board the Lloyd, now lying in the Thames for Van Dieman's Land.

Earl Grey, father of the Reform Act, and for four years Prime Minister, died at his residence, Howick Hall, on the 17th, aged 81.

Viscount Canterbury (for seventeen years speaker of the House of Commons as Mr. Manners Sutton,) died on the 20th, aged 66.

THE "GREAT BRITAIN."—This mammoth steamship has excited much interest in England, having been visited in Liverpool alone by 40,000 persons. She is now in New York harbor, and bids fair to create as much interest here. Some idea of her may be gathered from the following description:—

This magnificent vessel is composed entirely of iron, and is the largest ever built since the days of Noah. There are no paddle wheels or boxes, the Archimedian screw being used. Her burthen is 3,600 tons, being 2,000 tons more than that of the Great Western. She is propelled by engines of 1000 horse power combined.

The following are her dimensions:—Length from figure head to taffrail, 322 feet; length of keel, 289 feet, extreme width, 50 feet 6 inches; she has four decks, the upper deck is flush, and is 308 feet long; the second deck consists of two promenade saloons, the aft or first 110 feet 6 inches by 22 feet, and the forward, or second class, 67 feet by 21 feet 9 inches. The third deck consists of dining saloons, the grand saloon measuring 96 feet 6 inches, by 30 feet, and the second class 61 feet by 21 feet 9 inches. The whole of the saloons are 8 feet 3 inches high, and surrounded by sleeping berths, of which there are 26 with single beds, and 113 containing two, giving 252 berths. This large number is exclusive of the accommodation which could be prepared on the numerous sofas. The fourth deck is appropriated for the reception of cargo, of which 1,200 will be carried in addition to 1,000 tons of coal. The forecastle is intended for the officers' and sailors' mess rooms and sleeping berths, with the sail-rooms underneath. The engines and boilers occupy a space of 80 feet in the middle portion of the vessel. The engine-room and cooking establishment are situated in this part of the ship. There are three boilers; these are heated by twenty-four fires, and will contain 200 tons of water.

There are four engines of 250 horse power each, the cylinders of which are 7 feet 4 inches in diameter. The chimney is 30 feet high, and 8 feet in diameter. She is fitted with six masts, the highest of which is 74 feet above deck.

The quantity of canvass carried is about 1700 square yards; she is fitted with the patent wire rigging; the hull is divided into four water-tight compartments, and the quantity of coal consumed is about 60 tons per day; upwards of 1,500 tons of iron have been used in her construction and that of the engines and boilers; the draught of water when laden is 16 feet, and the displacement about 3,200 tons; the plates of the keel are from one inch to three-quarters of an inch thick, and the other plates are about half an inch thick; she is double riveted throughout; the ribs are formed of angle iron 6 in. by 3 1-2 in. by 1-2 an in. at the bottom of the vessel, and 7-16th thick at the top; the mean distance of the ribs are 14 in. from centre to centre. The ship is fitted with very powerful pumps, which can throw off 7,000 gallons of water per minute.

ANTI-RENT OUTRAGE AND DEATH.—Delaware County has again been the scene of an anti-rent outrage, which terminated in the death of a Deputy Sheriff. The following account of the affair is from an Extra of the Delaware Express, dated August 8:

The Sheriff a few days since endeavored to sell some property belonging to Moses Earle, of Andes, which he had levied upon by virtue of a distress warrant. Not being able to obtain bidders, (owing to the threats, &c. of the anti-renters,) he adjourned the sale till yesterday, when he proceeded to Earle's, accompanied by Deputy Sheriff O. N. Steele, P. P. Wright, Esq. and Constable E. S. Edgerton. Upon arriving on the ground, at about ten o'clock in the morning, there were several spectators there. The Sheriff endeavored to have the matter settled without a sale, but Earle said he would not settle it, but would fight it at the hardest. In about half an hour Indians began to appear, armed with rifles; and at about half past twelve they commenced marching out of the woods. There were about one hundred and fifty. The Indians formed a hollow square around the cattle, and placed a platoon at the bars, forbidding the citizens entering the field. Mr. Wright requested the Sheriff to drive the property into the road where the bidders were, or adjourn the sale.—The Sheriff endeavored to get the property to the road, and while doing so, Mr. Wright forced a passage through the file of Indians into the lot, and was followed by Steele and Edgerton. The 'chief' ordered the Indians to 'shoot the horses'—the cry was taken up by the Indians, 'shoot the horses—shoot him—shoot him.' Edgerton spoke at the top of his voice, and commanded the peace, calling on all persons to assist him in preserving the peace. A volley was discharged by the Indians, and Edgerton's horse was shot in the breast. Immediately a second volley was fired, when Steele fell, mortally wounded. His horse expired in a few minutes; Edgerton's was killed instantly. Steele was taken to the house, when it was found that three balls had taken effect, one in the chest, another in the bowels, and the third in the right arm. He survived till about eight o'clock, being in excruciating agony all the time, when he expired.

QUAKER WEDDING.—A marriage was "accomplished" on Thursday last, at the Quaker meeting house in Orchard Street, New York, of which a writer for the Tribune gives the following account:—

"About 3 o'clock P. M. the senior portion of the audience took their places one after another on the 'high seats,' while the juniors were scattered in different parts of the house. The fathers looked so grave that a stranger would have been likely to suspect that they had assembled for a funeral rather than a wedding. Soon, however, the bride and bridegroom came in with their friends and took a seat facing the assembly. The mother of the bride sat beside her daughter, while the bridegroom was supported by a member of the matrimonial committee. After a silence which lasted some twenty minutes, the aged Friend at the head of the meeting arose and said:—"I would not interfere improperly in the matter for which we have come together, but I apprehend this to be a suitable time for our young friends to proceed." The bridegroom and bride now drew their white kids, and taking each other by the hand, stood up before the audience. The bridegroom then said in a calm voice, but with evident emotion, "In the presence of the Lord and these witnesses, I take ——— to be my wife, promising by divine assistance to be unto her a faithful and affectionate husband until separated by death." The bride, in tones that bespoke the deep affection of her heart, then made the same declaration in respect to him on whom she had bestowed her hand. The twain having been made one, resumed their seats. The marriage covenant was than placed before them, when they proceeded to ratify their union by affixing their signatures. The friends of the newly married pair appended their names to the document as witnesses, and thus ended the Quaker Wedding."

A SENSIBLE HORSE.—One of the truck horses of Mr. Hands, was unloosed for a minute or two, from the trucks, a few days since, in this city, when, on the driver's looking round for him, behold he was missing. It was an hour or two before his driver could discover his whereabouts. It was very mysterious, being a steady beast, and not subject to flights of fancy. It was, also, before the Fakir arrived in the city. He, therefore, had no hand in spiriting him away. However, he was at last found in the smith's shop, where he was wont to have his shoes repaired. The smith said the horse entered and took the usual stand for shoeing. Upon examining his feet he found one shoe off, which he supplied. That horse is a sensible beast. [Portsmouth (Me.) Argus.

TEXAS.—We have information, from various parts of the West, that the country is now full of persons looking for land. They are, generally, said to be of a highly respectable class, and are ready to make full or part payment in cash.

Galveston (Texas) News, July 15.

Amid the stories of starvation at Pesth, the following is even more pathetic than the rest. A nobleman of rank and wealth, who had just been giving audience to a petitioner, missed his gold snuff-box. He had the visitor brought back, but seeing how well he was dressed, felt reluctant to search him. But at the mere mention of such a thing, the man turned so pale, that it was taken as a sign of guilt, and the examination was made. But then, the cause of this paleness was found to be, that he had only an old ragged shirt on beneath his good clothes, and that the poor gentleman had hired or borrowed the suit, leaving his family starving in a cellar while he pleaded the suit that might, perchance, bring them bread. The snuff-box had fallen behind the sofa-pillow.

The stable of Mr. Honeysett Baker at Albany, was burned on Wednesday. The Eve. Journal says: "A spirited and sagacious dog, that has attached herself to Engine No. 9, was seen, while the company was giving down nobly, as nobly endeavoring to prevent the waste of water from the hose, sometimes by placing her mouth and then her paws upon the leak! These sagacious efforts were witnessed by hundreds."

They expected to be thirty or forty days more in crossing to the Missouri. They travel only about fourteen miles a day. The thermometer at 98. In crossing the streams they sometimes had to unload the wagon two or three times a day, and lift it over by hand. Some have enjoyed the luxury of sleeping over night in wet clothes, from standing in the mud and water waist deep to lift out the wagon. This, however, they regard as only one of the varieties of prairie life.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' SEMINARY.

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, Principal, and Professor of Languages.
IRA SAYLES, Associate Principal, and Professor of Mathematics.
GURDON EVANS, Professor of Natural Sciences.
J. R. HARTSHORN, Professor of Anatomy and Physiology.
O. STILLMAN, Professor of Vocal and Instrumental Music.
Miss C. B. MAXSON, Preceptress, Instructress in French, Italian, Drawing and Painting.
Mrs. M. B. KENYON, Assistant in the Female Department.

From the very liberal patronage extended to this Institution during the past seven years, the Trustees have been induced to make arrangements for greatly increasing its facilities. The Chemical, Philosophical, Astronomical, and Mathematical apparatus is amply sufficient for a full illustration of the different departments of those Sciences. The apparatus will be farther increased at the commencement of the ensuing Fall Term, by the introduction of whatever may be necessary in other Sciences than those above mentioned, especially, by a MANIKIN of the most approved structure, now being imported from Paris, expressly for this Institution. This will enable the student of Physiology and Anatomy to pursue his studies with advantages nearly equal to those afforded by an actual subject, having this farther advantage of being divested of all those revolting circumstances ever attendant on the dissecting room.

THE TEACHERS' CLASSES, as usual, will be exercised in practical teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective Instructors. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. Daily Lectures will also be given during the Fall and Winter Terms; and the public may be assured that this department of the Institution shall be conducted upon the principles of the best regulated Normal Schools, in this, or any other country.

Finally, the proprietors pledge themselves, that the reputation of this Institution shall be sustained by the introduction of whatever may be necessary to meet the demands of an intelligent public.

The Institution is liberally endowed and subject to the visitation of the Regents.

Its Library is choice and extensive, and accessible, also, to all the students gratis.

THE ACADEMIC YEAR for 1845—6 consists of three Terms, as follows:—The First, commencing Wednesday August 13, 1845, and ending Thursday, November 20. The Second, commencing Wednesday, November 26, and ending Thursday, March 6, 1846. The Third, commencing Wednesday, March 25, and ending Thursday, July 2.

EXPENSES.—Tuition, per term, from $3 50 to $5 00. Board, per week, $1 00. Piano, (extra,) per term, $10 00. Washing, lights and fuel, per term, from $2 00 to $5 00. The entire expenses for an Academic Year, including board, washing, lights, fuel and tuition, (except on the Piano,) need not exceed $70 00; and may even be reduced much below this, where individuls board themselves, either separately or in clubs. For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

President of the Board of Trustees

"THERE'S NO SUCH WORD AS FAIL!"

BY ALICE C. LEE.

The proudest motto for the young—
  Write it in words of gold,
Upon thy heart and in thy mind
  The stirring words unfold,
And in misfortune's dreary hour,
  Or fortune's prosperous gale,
'Twill have a holy, charming power—
  "There's no such word as Fail!"

The sailor on the stormy sea,
  May sigh for distant land;
And free and fearless though he be,
  Wish he were near the strand;
But when the storm with angry breath,
  Brings lightning, sleet and hail,
He climbs the slippery mast, and sings,
  "There's no such word as Fail!"

The weary student bending o'er
  The tomes of other days,
And dwelling on their magic lore,
  For inspiration prays;
And though with toil his brain is weak,
  His brow is deadly pale,
The language of his heart will speak,
  "There's no such word as Fail!"

The wily statesman bows his knee
  Before Fame's glittering shrine,
And would a humble suppliant be
  To genius so divine;
Yet though his progress is full slow,
  And enemies may rail,
He thinks at last the world to show,
  "There's no such word as Fail!"

The soldier on the battle plain,
  When thirsting to be free,
And throw aside a galling chain,
  Says, 'O for liberty!'
Our household and our native land—
  We must—we will prevail;
With breast to breast, and hand to hand,
  "There's no such word as Fail!"

The child of God, though oft beset
  By foes without—within—
These precious words will ne'er forget,
  Amid their dreadful din;
But upward looks with eyes of faith,
  Armed with the Christian's mail;
And in the hottest conflict saith,
  "THERE'S NO SUCH WORD AS FAIL!"

"Whoever teaches woman's mind to rise,
Aim at true excellence in thought and act,
Deserves a monument surpassing art—
A lasting meed of gratitude and praise."

From the Edinburgh Review.

FEMALE EDUCATION.

* * * * A great deal has been said of the original difference of capacity between men and women; as if women were more quick, and men more judicious; as if women were more remarkable for delicacy of association, and men for stronger powers of attention. All this, we confess, appears to us very fanciful. That there is a difference in the understandings of the men and the women we every day meet with, every body, we suppose, must perceive; but there is none surely which may not be accounted for by the difference of circumstances in which they have been placed, without referring to any conjectural difference of original conformation of mind. As long as boys and girls run about in the dirt, and trundle hoops together, they are both precisely alike. If you catch up one half of these creatures, and train them to a particular set of actions and opinions, and the other half to a perfectly opposite set, of course their understandings will differ, as one or the other sort of occupations has called this or that talent into action. There is surely no occasion to go into any deeper or more abstruse reasoning, in order to explain so very simple a phenomenon. Taking it, then, for granted, that nature has been as bountiful of understanding to one sex as the other, it is incumbent on us to consider what are the principal objections commonly made against the communication of a greater share of knowledge to women than commonly falls to their lot at present; for though it may be doubted whether women should learn all that men learn, the immense disparity which now exists between their knowledge we would hardly think could admit of any rational defence. It is not easy to imagine that there should be any just cause why a woman of forty should be more ignorant than a boy of twelve years of age. If there be any good at all in female ignorance, this (to use a very colloquial phrase) is surely too much of a good thing. * * *

It is said, that the effect of knowledge is to make women pedantic and affected; and that nothing can be more offensive than to see a woman stepping out of the natural modesty of her sex to make an ostentatious display of her literary attainments. This may be true enough; but the answer is so trite and obvious that we are almost ashamed to make it. All affectation and display proceed from the supposition of possessing something better than the rest of the world possesses. Nobody is vain of possessing two legs and two arms, because that is the precise quantity of either sort of limb which every body possesses. Who ever heard a lady boast that she understood French?—for no other reason, that we know of, but because every body in these days does understand French; and though there may be some disgrace in being ignorant of that language, there is little or no merit in its acquisition. Diffuse knowledge generally among women, and you will at once cure the conceit which knowledge occasions while it is rare. Vanity and conceit we shall of course meet in men and women as long as the world endures; but by multiplying the attainments upon which these feelings are founded, you increase the difficulty of indulging them, and render them much more tolerable, by making them the proofs of much higher merit. When learning ceases to be uncommon among women, learned women will cease to be affected.

A great many of the lesser and more obscure duties of life necessarily devolve upon the female sex. The arrangement of all household matters, and the care of children in their early infancy, must of course depend upon them. Now, there is a very general notion, that the moment you put the education of women upon a better footing than it is at present, at that moment there will be an end of all domestic economy; and that if you once suffer women to eat of the tree of knowledge, the rest of the family will very soon be reduced to the same kind of aerial and unsatisfactory diet. These, and all such opinions, are referable to one great and common cause of error—that man does every thing, and that nature does nothing; and that every thing we see is referable to positive institution rather than to original feeling. Can any thing, for example, be more perfectly absurd than to suppose that the care and perpetual solicitude which a mother feels for her children, depends upon her ignorance of Greek and mathematics; and that she would desert an infant for a quadratic equation? We seem to imagine that we can break in pieces the solemn institution of nature, by the little laws of a boarding-school; and that the existence of the human race depends upon teaching women a little more, or a little less; that Cimmerian ignorance can aid paternal affection, or the circle of arts and sciences produce its destruction. In the same manner, we forget the principles upon which the love of order, arrangement, and all the arts of economy depend. They depend not upon ignorance nor idleness, but upon the poverty, confusion, and ruin which would ensue from neglecting them. Add to these principles the love of what is beautiful and magnificent, and the vanity of display—and there can surely be no reasonable doubt but that the order and economy of private life is amply secured from the perilous inroads of knowledge.

We would fain know, too, if knowledge is to produce such baneful effects upon the material and household virtues, why this influence has not already been felt? Women are much better educated now than they were a century ago; but they are by no means less remarkable for attention to the arrangement of their household, or less inclined to discharge the offices of parental affection. It would be very easy to show that the same objection has been made at all times to every improvement in the education of both sexes and all ranks—and been as uniformly and completely refuted by experience.

A great part of the objections made to the education of women, are rather objections made to human nature than to the female sex; for it is surely true that knowledge, where it produces any bad effects at all, does as much mischief to one sex as to the other, and gives birth to fully as much arrogance, inattention to common affairs, and eccentricity, among men, as it does among women. But it by no means follows that you get rid of vanity and self-conceit, because you get rid of learning. Self-complacency can never want an excuse; and the best way to make it more tolerable, and more useful, is to give to it as high and as dignified an object as possible. But, at all events, it is unfair to bring forward against a part of the world an objection which is equally powerful against the whole.—When foolish women think they have any distinction, they are apt to be proud of it—so are foolish men. But we appeal to any one who has lived with cultivated persons of either sex, whether he has not witnessed as much pedantry, as much wrongheadedness, as much arrogance, and certainly a great deal more rudeness, produced by learning in men, than in women; therefore, we should make the accusation general, or dismiss it altogether. * * *

Some persons are apt to contrast the acquisition of important knowledge with what they call simple pleasures; and deem it more becoming that a woman should educate flowers, make friendships with birds, and pick up plants, than enter into more difficult and fatiguing studies. If a woman has no taste and genius for higher occupations, let her engage in these, to be sure, rather than remain destitute of any pursuit. But why are we necessarily to doom a girl, whatever be her taste or her capacity, to one unvaried line of petty and frivolous occupation? If she is full of strong sense and elevated curiosity, can there be any reason why she should be diluted and enfeebled down to a mere culler of simples and fancier of birds? why books of history and reasoning are to be torn out of her hands, and why she is to be sent, like a butterfly, to hover over the idle flowers of the field? Such amusements are innocent to those whom they can occupy; but they are not innocent to those who have too powerful understandings to be occupied by them. Light broths and fruits are innocent food only to weak or infant stomachs; but they are poison to that organ in its perfect and mature state. But the great charm seems to be in the word simplicity—simple pleasures! If by a simple pleasure is meant an innocent pleasure, the observation is best answered by showing, that the pleasure which results from the acquisition of important knowledge is quite as innocent as any pleasure whatever; but if by a simple pleasure is meant one, the cause of which can be easily analyzed, or which does not last long, or which in itself is very faint, then simple pleasures seem to be very nearly synonymous with small pleasures; and if the simplicity were to be a little increased, the pleasure would vanish altogether. * * *

There is in either sex a strong and permanent disposition to appear agreeable to the other; and this is the fair answer to those who are fond of supposing, that a higher degree of knowledge would make women rather the rivals than the companions of men. Presupposing such a desire to please, it seems much more probable, that a common pursuit should be a fresh source of interest than a cause of contention. Indeed, to suppose that any mode of education can create a general jealousy and rivalry between the sexes, is so very ridiculous, that it requires only to be stated in order to be refuted. The same desire of pleasing secures all that delicacy and reserve which are of such inestimable value to women. We are quite astonished, in hearing men converse on such subjects, to find them attributing such beautiful effects to ignorance. It would appear, from the tenor of such objections, that ignorance had been the great civilizer of the world. Women are delicate and refined, only because they are ignorant; they manage their household, only because they are ignorant; they attend to their children, only because they know no better.

Now, we must really confess, we have all our lives been so ignorant as not to know the value of ignorance.—We have always attributed the modesty and refined manners of women, to their being well taught in moral and religious duty—to the hazardous situation in which they are placed—to that perpetual vigilance which it is their duty to exercise over thought, and word, and action—and to that cultivation of the mild virtues, which those who cultivate the stern and magnanimous virtues expect at their hands.

After all, let it be remembered, we are not saying there are no objections to the diffusion of knowledge among the female sex. We would not hazard such a proposition respecting any thing; but we are saying, that upon the whole, it is the best method of employing time; and that there are fewer objections to it than to any other method. There are, perhaps, 50,000 females in Great Britain who are exempted by circumstances from all necessary labor; but every human being must do something with their existence; and the pursuit of knowledge is, upon the whole, the most innocent, the most dignified, and the most useful method of filling up that idleness, of which there is always so large a portion in nations far advanced in civilization. Let any man reflect, too, upon the solitary situation in which women are placed—the ill treatment to which they are sometimes exposed, and which they must endure in silence, and without the power of complaining,—and he must feel convinced that the happiness of a woman will be materially increased in proportion as education has given her the habit and the means of drawing her resources from herself.

There are a few common phrases in circulation, respecting the duties of women, to which we wish to pay some degree of attention, because they are rather inimical to those opinions which we have advanced on this subject. Indeed, independently of this, there is nothing which requires more vigilance than the current phrases of the day, of which there are always some resorted to in every dispute, and from the sovereign authority of which it is often vain to make any appeal. 'The true theatre for a woman is the sick chamber'—'Nothing so honorable to a woman as not to be spoken of at all.' These two phrases, the delight of Noodledom, are grown into common-places upon the subject; and are not unfrequently employed to extinguish that love of knowledge in women which, in our humble opinion, it is of so much importance to cherish. Nothing, certainly, is so ornamental and delightful in women as the benevolent affections; but time cannot be filled up, and life employed, with high and impassioned virtues. Some of these feelings are of rare occurrence—all of short duration—or nature would sink under them. A scene of distress and anguish is an occasion where the finest qualities of the female mind may be displayed; but it is a monstrous exaggeration to tell women that they are born only for scenes of distress and anguish. Nurse father, mother, sister, and brother, if they want it; it would be a violation of the plainest duties to neglect them. But, when we are talking of the common occupations of life, do not let us mistake the accidents for the occupations—when we are arguing how the twenty-three hours of the day are to be filled up, it is idle to tell us of those feelings and agitations above the level of common existence, which may employ the remaining hour. Compassion, and every other virtue, are the great objects we all ought to have in view,—but no man (and no woman,) can fill up the twenty-four hours by acts of virtue. But one is a lawyer, and the other a ploughman, and the third a merchant; and then, acts of goodness and intervals of compassion, and fine feeling, are scattered up and down the common occupations of life. We know women are to be compassionate—but they cannot be compassionate from eight o'clock in the morning till twelve at night—and what are they to do in the interval? This is the only question we have been putting all along, and is all that can be meant by literary education. * * *

Their exemption from all the necessary business of life is one of the most powerful motives for the improvement of education in women. Lawyers and physicians have in their professions a constant motive to exertion; if you neglect their education, they must in a certain degree educate themselves by their commerce with the world: they must learn caution, accuracy, and judgment, because they must incur responsibility. But if you neglect to educate the mind of a woman, by the speculative difficulties which occur in literature, it can never be educated at all: if you do not effectually rouse it by education, it must remain for ever languid. Uneducated men may escape intellectual degradation—uneducated women cannot. They have nothing to do, and if they come untaught from the schools of education, they will never be instructed in the school of events.

Women have not their livelihood to gain by knowledge—and that is one motive for relaxing all those efforts which are made in the education of men. They certainly have not, but they have happiness to gain, to which knowledge leads as probably as it does to profit, and that is a reason against mistaken indulgence. Besides, we conceive the labor and fatigue of accomplishments to be quite equal to the labor and fatigue of knowledge, and that it takes quite as many years to be charming as it does to be learned.

Another difference of the sexes is, that women are attended to, and men attend. All acts of courtesy and politeness originate from the one sex, and are received by the other. We can see no sort of reason, in this diversity of condition, for giving to women a trifling and insignificant education; but we see in it a very powerful reason for strengthening their judgment, and inspiring them with the habit of employing time usefully. We admit many striking differences in the situation of the two sexes, and many striking differences of understanding, proceeding from the different circumstances in which they are placed—but there is not a single difference of this kind which does not afford a new argument for making the education of women better than it is. They have nothing serious to do—is that a reason why they should be brought up to do nothing but what is trifling? They are exposed to great dangers—is that a reason why their faculties are to be purposely and industriously weakened? They are to form the characters of future men—is that a cause why their own characters are to be broken and frittered down as they now are? In short, there is not a single trait in that diversity of circumstances, in which the two sexes are placed, that does not decidedly prove the magnitude of the error we commit in neglecting (as we do neglect) the education of women.

If the objections against the better education of women could be overruled, one of the great advantages that would ensue would be the extinction of innumerable follies. A decided and prevailing taste for one or another mode of education there must be. A century past, it was for housewifery—now it is for accomplishments. The object now is, to make women artists—to give them an excellence in drawing, music, painting, and dancing—of which, persons who make these pursuits the occupation of their lives, and derive from them their subsistence, need not be ashamed.

Now, one great evil of all this is, that it does not last.—If the whole of life were an Olympic game—if we could go on feasting and dancing to the end—this might do, but it is in truth merely a provision for the little interval between coming into life, and settling in it—while it leaves a long and dreary expanse behind, devoid both of dignity and cheerfulness. No mother, no woman who has passed over the few first years of life, sings, or dances, or draws, or plays upon musical instruments! These are merely means for displaying the grace and vivacity of youth, which every woman gives up as she gives up the dress and manners of eighteen—she has no wish to retain them, or if she has, she is driven out of them by diameter and derision. The system of female education, as it now stands, aims only at embellishing a few years of life which are in themselves so full of grace and happiness, that they hardly want it, and then leave the rest of existence a prey to idle insignificance. No woman of understanding and reflection can possibly conceive she is doing justice to her children by such kind of education. The object is, to give to children resources that will endure as long as life endures—habits that time will ameliorate, not destroy—occupations that will render sickness tolerable, solitude pleasant, age venerable, life more dignified and useful, and therefore death less terrible; and the compensation which is offered for the omission of all this, is a short-lived blaze—a little temporary effect, which has no other consequence than to deprive the remainder of life of all taste and relish. There may be women who have a taste for the fine arts, and who evince a decided talent for drawing or for music. In that case, there can be no objection to the cultivation of these arts; but the error is, to make such things the grand and universal object—to insist upon it that every woman is to sing, and draw, and dance—with nature, or against nature—to bind her apprentice to some accomplishment, and if she cannot succeed in oil or water-colors, to prefer gilding, varnishing, burnishing, box making, to real solid improvement in taste, knowledge, and understanding.

A great deal is said in favor of the social nature of the fine arts. Music gives pleasure to others. Drawing is an art, the amusement of which does not centre in him who exercises it, but is diffused among the rest of the world. This is true; but there is nothing, after all, so social as a cultivated mind. We do not mean to speak slightingly of the fine arts, or to depreciate the good humor with which they are sometimes exhibited; but we appeal to any man, whether a little spirited and sensible conversation—displaying, modestly, useful acquirements, and evincing rational curiosity, is not well worth the highest exertions of musical or graphical skill. A woman of accomplishments may entertain those who have the pleasure of knowing her for half an hour with great brilliancy; but a mind full of ideas, and with that elastic spring which the love of knowledge only can convey, is a perpetual source of exhilaration and amusement to all that come within its reach; not collecting its force into single and insulated achievements, like the effort made in the fine arts, but diffusing equally over the whole of existence, a calm pleasure, better loved as it is longer felt, and suitable to every variety and every period of life. Therefore, instead of hanging the understanding of a woman upon walls, or hearing it vibrate upon strings—instead of seeing it in clouds, or hearing it in the wind, we would make it the first spring and ornament of society, by enriching it with attainments upon which alone such power depends.

If the education of women were improved, the education of men would be improved also. Let any one consider, (in order to bring the matter more home by an individual instance) of what immense importance to society it is, whether a nobleman of first-rate fortune and distinction is well or ill brought up; what a taste and fashion he may inspire for private and for political vice! and what misery and mischief he may produce to the thousand human beings who are dependent on him! A country contains no such curse within its bosom. Youth, wealth, high rank, and vice, form a combination which baffles all remonstrance and beats down all opposition. A man of high rank who combines these qualifications for corruption, is almost the master of the manners of the age, and has the public happiness within his grasp. But the most beautiful possession which a country can have is a noble and rich man, who loves virtue and knowledge; who without being feeble or fanatical, is pious; and who without being factious, is firm and independent; who, in his political life, is an equitable mediator between king and people; and, in his civil life, a firm promoter of all which can shed a lustre upon his country, or promote the peace and order of the world. But if these objects are of the importance which we attribute to them, the education of women must be important, as the formation of character for the first seven or eight years of life seems to depend almost entirely upon them. It is certainly in the power of a sensible and well-educated mother to inspire within that period, such tastes and propensities as shall nearly decide the destiny of the future man: and this is done, not only by the intentional exertions of the mother, but by the gradual and insensible imitation of the child; for there is something extremely contagious in greatness and rectitude of thinking, even at that age; and the character of the mother with whom he passes his early infancy, is always an event of the utmost importance to the child. A merely accomplished woman cannot infuse her tastes into the minds of her sons, and if she could, nothing could be more unfortunate than her success. Besides, when her accomplishments are given up, she has nothing left for it but to amuse herself in the best way she can; and becoming entirely frivolous, either declines altogether the fatigues of attending to her children, or, attending to them, has neither talents nor knowledge to succeed; and therefore, here is a plain and fair answer to those who ask so triumphantly, why should a woman dedicate herself to this branch of knowledge? or why should she be attached to such science? Because, by having gained information on these points, she may inspire her son with valuable tastes, which may abide by him through life, and carry him up to all the sublimities of knowledge; because she cannot lay the foundation of a great character, if she is absorbed in frivolous amusements, nor inspire her child with noble desires, when a long course of trifling has destroyed the little talents which were left by a bad education.

[To be concluded.]

TO PARENTS.

Your children are men in miniature. A few seasons come and go, and those who are in the nursery, or in the glee of childhood, are treading the theatre of the world, and mingling in the solemn and changing drama of life's eventful scenes! As the child passes through these flying periods, you are most generally able to see the future man. In conformity to the early impressions, and the bias which the mind takes, so will the forming future character of the man grow and fix itself. This great law is found in the moral government of God, and its results proclaimed in terrible language by evil parentage, training and government. It is utterly impossible to prevent your children from being moulded in exact conformity to the bias and impressions you give them. These will govern, they will be masters. You cannot counteract their shaping moral power. If you imprint the lovely image of virtue, and the sweeter and lovelier impress of piety in childhood, so as to give the balancing power to character, you will see the same image, bold, beautiful, distinct, in the man. If you deform the character in childhood by vicious principles, and their results, you are able to determine, even in childhood, the full-grown man, his habits fixed, his character stereotyped, his destiny decided. Such is usually the power of first principles in giving bias and formation to the ultimate man. Washington is an eminent and lovely illustration of this great principle. In childhood his teachings and impressions were of the right stamp, and they moulded his character and decided his destiny. And what a sublime one it was! Napoleon, the terror of all Europe, is a terrible example of the opposite result. By the power of early impressions and associations, the destiny of that great captain and warrior was decided.

THE WELCOME BACK.

Sweet is the hour that brings us home,
  Where all will spring to meet us;
Where hands are striving as we come,
  To be the first to greet us.
When the world hath spent its frowns and wrath,
  And care had been sorely pressing,
'Tis sweet to turn from our roving path,
  And find a fireside blessing.
Oh, joyfully dear is the homeward track,
  If we are but sure of a welcome back.

What do we reck on the dreary way,
  Though lonely and benighted,
If we know there are lips to chide our stay,
  And eyes that will beam love lighted?
What is the worth of a diamond ray,
  To the glance that flashes pleasure;
When the winds that welcome back, betray,
  We form a heart's chief treasure?
Oh, joyfully dear is our homeward track,
  If we are but sure of a welcome back.

INFLUENCE OF THE GOSPEL.

The gospel, indeed, has its commands and its prohibitions; but these are not designed to act directly upon the human will. They suppose that will already subdued to the purpose of obedience, waiting for guidance, asking the way of duty; and these precepts are designed, not to force the unwilling, but to direct the willing soul. With the ancients, manners and morals were coincident (as the very etymology of our word morals indicates); virtue was outward and mechanical; and whatever goodness of heart a man acquired he was supposed to gain by the sedulous practice of prescribed routines of right conduct. Christian virtue, on the other hand, has its seat in the heart, and thence gradually subdues and governs every department of the outward life. The first and great commandment is, 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart'; and the second, of love to our neighbor, is simply a corollary from the first. Piety and charity are the one tree of life. We call it piety, as it strikes its roots deep into the cleft of the Rock of ages; charity, as it spreads wide its healing branches, to bless all whom its shade can shelter, or its fruits nourish.

Christian ethics, consisting thus of the various modifications of a great principle, have received but slender services from those who have attached themselves to single portions of the gospel law, considered as a formal code, and have labored solely to carry into effect isolated commands or prohibitions. Movements of this kind, whether by individuals or combinations of men, when most promising at the outset, have spent themselves after a little season, and have been followed by a decided reaction, sufficient to counterbalance the seeming good that they had wrought. Meanwhile, as fast as men have become Christianized, abuses, wrongs, and evils, as old as time, and seemingly incapable of decay, have crumbled and fallen without hands; and the temple-walls have risen upon their ruins without sound of axe or hammer. There is wrapped up in the great principles of the gospel, in its scattered and informal illustrations of duty, and, above all, in the godlike traits of its Founder's life and character, an infinite weath of ethical truth, motive, and energy, which developes itself from age to age, as fast as men are able to receive, use, embody, and establish it, and no faster. In the same Scriptures we read more than our fathers did; our posterity will read more than we.

The way in which Christianity reforms the world may be illustrated by specifying some of the more striking evils and vices, which it found deep seated in the very heart of humanity, and refined and adorned by all the charms which wealth, wit, and learning could throw around them. We might take for our first illustration the abounding licentiousness of the Roman empire, at the age when the gospel was first promulgated. The reader of Horace Juvenal has become familiar with forms of pollution so gross and vile, as to be now banished from the very speech of men, which were then practiced and defended by persons of unimpeachable social standing, nay, by the very priests at the altar—which formed the theme of song in circles of the highest culture and most fastidious taste—which have their memory perpetuated in verse that cannot die, by minds not destitute of lofty sentiments and impulses. Purity and chastity were unknown virtues. Cato, the severe, inflexible Cato, commends a young man [illegible] in defending M. Coelius, says: "Si quis est, qui etiam meretriciis amoribus interdictum juventuti putet, est ille quidem valde severus, negare non possum; sed abhorret non modo ab hujus seculi licentia, verum etiam a majorum consuetudine atique concessis." The marriage bond was but a rope of sand; and scandalous divorces, on no pretence but that of lust, stained the most honored patrician families in Rome. The Roman woman, though not, as in the East, an imprisoned slave, was yet worse, alternately the tyrant and the victim; never, almost never, the chaste spouse of one husband, and the faithful mother of an unmixed progeny. In the Roman empire there was scarcely a pure house, around which could be grouped any of the numberless associations of fidelity, love, helpfulness and permanent union, which go to make up the meaning of that most complex of all words, home. The excavated cities of Italy, which have embalmed for our own times the domestic forms and manners of the old world, show us the houses of the most wealthy absolutely destitute of what could be called family apartments, where the relations of a pure and virtuous household could be preserved inviolate. The guest-room, the banqueting-hall, the courts sub dio, are ample and splendid; the lodging-rooms, the private apartments, are less commodious, less carefully sheltered, than the berths and state-rooms of a modern steamboat.

Now, to meet this depraved condition of domestic and social life, the first advocates of Christianity went forth and taught men and women everywhere, that they had within them souls, the image and the temple of God, that an omniscient eye was upon them. They unfolded the beauty of holiness, the worth of inward peace and purity, the blessedness of a conscience void of offence. They shed over the hearts of men a sense of divine and infinite love, and awakened reciprocal sentiments of gratitude and devotion. They thus diffused through the proud capital, and among the remotest provinces of the great empire, an atmosphere in which the contagion of degrading vice could not spread, and its deadly wounds were healed. Licentiousness and the love of God were at opposite poles of the moral universe. As fast as worthy notions of man's spiritual and immortal nature gained ground, the reign of impurity was checked, and maxims and habits of self-restraint and self-respect obtained currency. Home, Christianity's best earthly godsend, grew into being. The connubial relation was made sacred and enduring. Forms of vicious indulgence, which had sought no concealment, shunned the light, and were branded with shame and guilt. Woman rose from her age-long degradation, and for the meretricious robes of a tenant at will in her husband's house, clothed herself in the modest graces of a Christian wife and mother, and took her place at the domestic and public altar, as man's honored peer and partner. Vicious elements, that seemed thoroughly kneaded into the whole mass of society, have thus been purged away by the silent gradual working of Christian ideas and principles; and in place of a social condition, characterized by high culture and elaborate refinement, yet presenting no one healthy feature, we have a new civilization, which, though incidentally embodying much that is wrong and evil, in its basis and its essential laws can neither need change, nor admit of improvement.

EVIL COMPANIONS.—Society is the atmosphere of souls; and we necessarily imbibe from it something which is either infectious or salubrious. The society of virtuous persons is enjoyed beyond their company, while vice carries a sting into solitude. The society or the company you keep, is both the indication of your character, and the former of it. In company, when the pores of the mind are opened, there requires more caution than usual, because the mind is passive. Either vicious company will please you or it will not; if it does not please you, the end of going will be defeated. In such society you will feel your reverence for the dictates of conscience wear off, and that name at which angels bow and devils tremble, you will hear contemned and abused. The Bible will supply materials for unmeaning jests or impious buffoonery; the consequence of this will be a practical deviation from virtue, the principles will become snapped, and the fences of conscience broken down; and when debauchery has corrupted the character, a total inversion will take place, they will glory in their shame.

THE MOTHER.—Those very feelings of the mother which men call female weakness, act upon the incipient intellect like the volatile oils and the rainbow colors of the blossom on the embryo fruit, distilling and refining the dews of heaven, and reflecting and softening the rays of light, until it swells into strength and vigor, to be matured by the redundant showers of summer, and ripened in the powerful beams of the sun. The stern philosophy of the father smiles at the sleepless vigilance and thrilling anxiety with which the mother watches the sleeping infant, and her distracted wildness when its toppling foot steps carry it beyond her sight; yet the actions of the mother under these circumstances make an impression on the infant mind never to be erased, by time, or change of circumstances; and by an association of ideas, too mysterious to be explained, but too palpable to be denied, the moral lessons inculcated under these circumstances can never be forgotten, and many a heartless rake has been reformed, and many a reckless renegade reclaimed, by the recollection of a mother's precepts after she had gone to her grave. This powerful influence is happily illustrated in one of those speeches of John Randolph, in which that eccentric orator was wont to wander over the whole universe. 'In denouncing a certain quality of atheists for the mischief they had done, "Once," said he, "they had well-nigh robbed me of my religion; but when the last spark was nearly extinguished, I remember that when a child my good old mother taught me to say, 'Our Father who art in Heaven.'"

THE SAILOR'S GRAVE.

On the south side of Key West is a fine beach, of considerable extent. I derived great pleasure from strolling along this beach, and whilst I collected the shells and marine substances which the sea had cast ashore, indulged in solitary reflection. Often has my imagination recalled the events of other times, and conjured up scenes or circumstances calculated to give life and interest to the prospect. Here lay concealed the wily Buccaneer, watching with intense anxiety for his prey, or endeavoring to entice him within his grasp. How often has the shore been strewed with materials plundered from some unfortunate vessel. Behold yon blazing wreck in the distance, whilst the air resounds with the oaths and imprecations of the pirate crew, or the prayers and supplications of the hopeless captive. Alas how many hands have been uplifted, and how many voices exerted in vain entreaties for mercy! Cold blooded murderers. They were steeled against every visiting of compassionate feeling. What a contrast to the exciting picture which my fancy had drawn is offered by the tranquility which now reigns around. Nought is heard but the roaring of the ocean, or the occasional note of some solitary bird, startled by the footsteps of man. Around me lay wrecked and ruined, the dearest hope of humanity. The bones of that husband for whose return the anxious wife has looked in vain, lie bleaching here. Who can calculate the amount of misery inflicted upon humanity, and the crimes perpetrated! What tongue shall tell the anguish of that mother's heart, who after long and prayerful hope, gave up her child, believing that in the ocean's bosom he had found a grave. She little dreams that his mortal remains lie buried in yon barren bank of sand. The pirate and his murdered victim have passed away from this scene of action. We cannot pretend to lift the veil of futurity, but we may presume that whilst the latter sleeps in the sweet hope of happiness hereafter, the former shall awake to a tremendous retribution.

Indulging such thoughts as these, I one day reached the spot which had been appropriated by Commodore Porter as a burial place for his officers and men, who died whilst cruising against the pirates of the West Indies. It is about a mile from the light house, situated on a sand hill within one hundred yards of the sea. Most of the tombs were in a state of decay. The wind had blown the sand from around some, others had tumbled to the ground, whilst one or two which were of marble, could still be deciphered. Here rest the ashes of those brave generous men who, relinquishing the comforts and endearments of society went forth into distant seas to fight the battles of humanity. The benefit of their exertions is daily felt in the security given to commerce, and the lives of their fellow men; but nothing remains to mark the scene of their suffering and their triumph, but a few frail perishing memorials, which the hand of friendship has erected. Where is the boasted gratitude of man, and why has not a column been erected to their memories?

Apart from the rest stood one solitary grave. No stone indicated the name of its tenant, but woman's love had consecrated the spot. The soil being such as would not support vegetation, a tub containing rich earth had been sunk into the grave, in which a flowering tree had been planted. This tree after a lapse of eight or ten years, still continued to bloom, and shed its odors around. Happy, cried I, that warrior, upon whose dying couch woman's tear had been shed, and upon whose neglected grave she had planted a memorial of her affection. Long may the kindly dews and showers descend upon and nourish thy token, and hallow thy affection, woman. Rest, spirit of the brave! beauty hath consecrated thy memory, and the waves of ocean, sighing on the sea-beat shore, shall sing thy requiem.

Rest, sailor rest! affection's hand
Hath planted in that sterile strand,
And hallowed in that blooming tree,
A precious tribute, worthy thee.

The roaring surge the foaming wave,
May dash their spray upon thy grave;
But sweetest birds from distant bowers,
Shall warble 'mong those fragrant flowers.

Their plaintive notes the wave's wild moan
Shall tell of joys for ever flown;
And evening's soft and dewy tear,
Shall steal in perfume o'er thy bier.

DON'T GET CRUSTY.

Good nature is a gem which always shines brightly in whatever ground it is set. It cheers the darkness of misfortune, and warms the heart that is callous and cold. In social life, who has not seen and felt its influences? If you want to be happy yourself and make every one else happy, be good-natured. Don't let little matters ruffle you. Nobody gains anything by being cross and crabbed. A friend has injured you; the world goes hard; you want employment, but can't get it; or you can't get your honest dues, or fire has consumed, or the waters has swallowed up the fruit of many year's hard toil; or your faults are magnified; or enemies have traduced, or friends deceived. Never mind; don't get mad with any body; don't abuse the world or any of its creatures; keep good natured, and our word for it, all will come right. The soft south wind and the genial sun, are not more effectual in clothing the earth with verdure and sweet flowers of spring, than is good nature in adorning the hearts of men and women with blossoms of kindness, happiness and affection, and those flowers, the fragrance of which ascend to heaven. By the way, and aside, we would whisper a word in the ear of the sovereign people who are interested in political matters, as well as those who belong to the church, of the importance and beauty of good nature. The church ever has its trials to contend with, but the professor should bear patiently with the scoffer and the sceptic, and the many stumbling blocks thrown into his path; the greater his amiability and victory. In exciting contests, we would suggest to whigs and democrats, nothing will be gained by either party by manifestations of ill-will or quarrelling with each other. Most men are honest, some are no better than they ought to be, and some are a good deal worse. Well we must take them as we find them, better or worse, but don't show any ugly temper—keep cool—keep good natured. Fight this and all other battles of the sort, manfully and pleasantly. Smiles are more powerful than frowns; a friendly, good natured conversation—a kind, honest expression of opinion will do more towards achieving a conquest, or reclaim those who have gone astray, than all the harsh epithets or irritating expressions that were ever resorted to. To be good natured it is not necessary to submit to imposition or insult; but it will generally be found that a man who will resort to such means is a coward and not worth noticing in any way, unless it be to laugh at his inconsistencies. The good natured man is generally grave, generous, loves his fellow man, loves his country, and protects and provides for his own household.

MISS SOPHIA STURGE.—The last arrivals from England, bring intelligence of the death of this excellent and worthy sister of Joseph Sturge. We sympathize most deeply with her afflicted brother; and concur most heartily in the following just tribute, by Mr. Leavitt, to the memory of the departed sister. "Blessed are the dead, that die in the Lord." [Anti-Slavery Reporter.

This excellent woman occupied and worthily filled a most important station as the colleague, counsellor, and ever-ready helper of her distinguished brother, in all his vast designs of beneficence. She not only presided in his family, and relieved him of domestic cares, but she entered with earnest and enlightened interest into all his views, and by her intelligence and method, greatly aided him in keeping himself informed of the progress of events in all their detail. Her sound judgement and Christian wisdom were as a staff on which he could lean with assured confidence. We were impressed with these great traits in her character, no less than with the kindness of her hospitality and humble spirituality of her Christian character. To Joseph Sturge, her loss is irreparable, and yet we trust that the same grace which enabled his beloved sister to go down to the grave with the calm faith of a believer, has also enabled him to say from the heart,—"It is well—it is the Lord—let him do what seemeth him good." EDITED BY GEORGE B. UTTER. "THE SEVENTH DAY IS THE SABBATH OF THE LORD THY GOD." PUBLISHED AT NO. 9 SPRUCE ST.

VOL. II—NO. 9. NEW YORK, FIFTH-DAY, AUGUST 21, 1845. WHOLE NO. 61.

The Sabbath Recorder.

For the Sabbath Recorder.

ON THE CHANGE OF THE SABBATH FROM THE SEVENTH TO THE FIRST DAY OF THE WEEK BY APOSTOLIC EXAMPLE.

Under this heading, we find in the Biblical Repository for April, and also in the Sabbath Recorder for July 3, an attempted criticism of tracts published by the American Sabbath Tract Society, by Rev. R. Weiser, of the Lutheran Church.

Had the writer of that article treated his subject candidly, and pointed out the errors of which he so bitterly complains, in the spirit of Christianity, we should, to say the least, have received his effort as an act of fraternal kindness. But instead of this, he begins his article by representing the Seventh-day Baptists as charging all with sinning most grievously against the Lord of heaven who do not sabbatize on the seventh day. It would have been more becoming a Christian minister, had he requested his readers to peruse the tracts for themselves. If they are as grossly defective as he represents them, surely he could have no reason to fear from their being read by every Christian in the land. And we would ask Mr. Weiser, what good he can do by pouncing upon any of his brethren in his arrogant and dogmatic manner? In his remarks upon the subject embraced in those tracts, he has betrayed a criminal ignorance, or what is still worse, a design to impose upon the credulity of his more illiterate readers. It is not a little singular, however, that such a cluster of absurdities should be an obstacle to the movements of the whole Christian church for the better observance of "the Sabbath of the land." Strange that such a man as Mr. Weiser would stoop to notice them at all!

But what seems to have disturbed his equanimity most, is the criticism on the translation of some passages of Scripture, contained in the second number of THE SABBATH VINDICATOR, although quite unimportant in the discussion of the Sabbath question. Upon these, Mr. W. seems to have lost all his patience, and shows, beyond a doubt, his blind attachment to the prescriptions of his creed. It would be derogatory to the character, and dangerous to the spirit, of a Christian, to enter upon a discussion of the merits of those criticisms, with a man who entertains so exalted a sense of his philological powers. It is sufficient to say, that his review of those criticisms is a mere display of angry words. The man that can stoop to a sarcastic notice of the misprint of a letter, and who finds it inconvenient to cite the language of his author correctly, would be likely to assert or deny whatever he may suppose would promote or prejudice his favorite opinions or practice.

Mr. W. seems quite dissatisfied with the true signification of en de tee mia toon Sabbatoon, because he cannot, without violence, make the phrase signify "and on the first day of the week." He knows, if he has but a superficial knowledge of the Greek, that it literally and grammatically signifies, and on one (or a certain day) of the sabbaths; and that this is a form of expression common with the author of the Acts of the Apostles to signify a Sabbath day. He says, "If this does not mean the first day of the week in the New Testament, then there is no evidence in the New Testament that Jesus rose on the first day." This sense must, therefore, be wrung out of this phrase, in order to furnish proof that it was the day of the resurrection; although he admits that it is not the most natural and easy construction of it. According to this rule of interpretation, we may make a text of Scripture signify what we wish it should, in order to prove any thing we may wish to establish, and then contend for its correctness upon the ground that it is all we have to prove our position true. Admitting that the day of the resurrection be not proved by the true sense of mia ton Sabbaton, what then? Why, the day on which it occurred must be identified by some other evidence, or it must remain somewhat hypothetical, we admit; but not more so than is the apostolic example for sanctifying the day. No man, we believe, has ever had any thing better than conjecture for either. Again, Mr. W. begs the question when he asserts, that it was the Apostles' design to state that Jesus rose on the first day of the week. They make no direct assertion to this effect, and this sense can only be gathered from unnecessary construction put upon their words, and is therefore a matter of opinion only, and not a matter of fact proved. And it is gratuitously begging the question to assert, as Mr. W. has done, that all reasonable men must admit that Jesus did arise on the first day of the week. A reasonable man will admit whatever is asserted in the Scriptures, and whatever is fairly deduced from them; but he can be under no obligation to admit a supposed fact, as this evidently is.

Mr. W. has shown gross unfairness in his remarks upon how a Seventh-day Baptist must understand Mark 16: 9. We can account for them only upon the ground that he had never read the article he was attempting to criticise. Had he read it, with the other publications of the Sabbath Tract Society, which he boasted of having before him, he might have saved himself from the blunders into which he has precipitated himself. The article he had before him gives a very different understanding of that text from the one he has suggested.

His remarks upon eis, mia, en, (which he says is one of the strong holds of the Sabbatarians,) are really remarkable. Hear him:—"That eis generally means one, we will not deny; but that it is sometimes used as an ordinal, we will now attempt to prove." And how does he prove it? By saying, Stockius has cited Polibius, who used the cardinal one in the sense of the ordinal first, in the phrase, "In the one-and-twentieth book," instead of saying, In the twenty-first book. We could have helped him to a more plausible argument than this. But will Mr. W. admit, that twenty-one has sometimes the sense of twenty-first? He must, in order to be consistent with himself. It is indeed ridiculous, if not dishonest, to cite such a use of the word as explanatory of one when used as a simple numeral.

For further evidence of Mr. W.'s limited knowledge of this subject, we refer to his assertion, "that Sabbaton, both in the singular and plural, means not only Sabbaths and the Sabbath, but also a week, or a period of seven days." And he refers us to the lexicons for his authority. The lexicons refer us to certain passages in the New Testament which are so rendered by our English translators, for their authority for this latter sense of the word. And what authority had the translators for so rendering the Greek word Sabbaton? Not from the sense of the contexts in which the word occurs; for they will admit of the word being rendered in its true and only proper sense, Sabbath or Sabbaths. Nor did they derive it from any lexicons then in use; but merely from their own custom in observing the first day of the week. Mr. W. therefore assumes that Sabbaton sometimes has this meaning, because it is sometimes so translated.

But waiving all further remarks upon Mr. W.'s criticisms on the Greek, we will just give a passing notice to some of his assertions. He says, that "if Jesus rose on the first day of the week, then it follows that the apostles met on the same day for religious worship." How does this follow? It is a matter of doubt, to say the least, as to the assembling here referred to being on the day of the resurrection. Nor is it even probable, that they were together for social worship. Their assembling was not on account of the resurrection, nor were they engage in any act of worship, when Jesus appeared to them. They were assembled for fear of the Jews; John 20: 19. And were sitting at the time he appeared to them, "and upbraided them for not believing them who had seen him after he was risen." Mark 16: 14.

Again, he asserts from John 20: 26, what the text does not assert, nor warrant. He would have been ashamed to cite the text correctly in proof of his assertion, viz. that "they met eight days afterwards." This he claims to have been the next first day of the week. This is a necessary link in his chain of evidence for apostolic practice of keeping the first day. It is useless to reason with a man who will, for the purpose of carrying a point, quote the Scripture incorrectly. We fear that he must be either stupid or stubborn to contend that the phrase "after eight days," was intended by St. John for the next first day of the week.

Again, Mr. W. says, "The Corinthians were in the habit of meeting on the first day of the week"—that "they kept the first day at the instigation of the apostles"—and that "human tradition is here out of the question." But how does he learn all this? Why, from 1 Cor. 16: 2. Hear him quote it, "Upon the first day of the week—that there be no gathering when I come." This, according to his logic, is proof positive, without the aid of human tradition, that the Corinthians were in the habit of meeting on the first day of the week at the instigation of the apostles! And having thus proved the custom of the apostles, their practice is made to modify the sense of the text, so that it shall prove this apostolic practice! Thus he first begs the question, and then argues in a circle to prove his position.

In regard to the practice of the early Christians relative to the first day of the week, Mr. W. has referred us to quite a catalogue of human authorities. And should we admit that his authors wrote all that is ascribed to them, (concerning which, however, there is something stronger than improbability;) and that they and their associates hallowed in some sort the first day of the week; and admit farther, that their custom is authoritative as an example to all others who shall succeed them, as Mr. W. will have it—then it will follow, that all their other religious observances are binding also; and so we shall have holy days, saints' days, days sacred to the memory of the martyrs, feast days, and fast days, in abundance—enough in all reason to satisfy even the most scrupulous observers of ecclesiastical traditions. Is Mr. W. willing to put his neck under the yoke? If he is not, why does he plead their practice as authority in regard to the first day?

And what do all these authorities prove against the apostolic example contended for in the Sabbath Tracts? Just nothing at all. A longer list of authors, and quite as respectable for intelligence and veracity, might be, and has been adduced, which prove as clearly as human testimony can prove, that the apostles, and the churches generally for some centuries after their time, observed the ancient Sabbath. From these testimonies, and also from those cited by Mr. W., and others who have attempted to sustain an inspired example for the change of the Sabbath, it is undeniable, that whatever regard was had for the first day, it was at best regarded only as a festival, having no reference whatever to the fourth commandment. Nor can it be maintained, that the earlier observers of the first day pretended to have any inspired authority for their custom, or ever once intimated that in this they were imitating an apostolic example. Even admitting that the Christians of Judea observed the ancient Sabbath, as all readily do, is virtually admitting that the early Gentile churches also observed it. For we have the authority of inspiration, that the Thessalonian churches were followers, that is imitators, of the churches in Judea—1 Thess. 2: 14. And by following the examples of Christ and the apostles, they were examples to all that believed in Macedonia and Achaia. Chap. 1: 6, 7.

The testimony of Eusebius, that the Sabbath was the principal day in the church until the time of Constantine; of Socrates, that in the fifth century, the church in almost every part of the world regarded the ancient Sabbath; of Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria, that "we assemble on Saturday, to worship Jesus the Lord of the Sabbath;" and among the moderns, of Dr. Dwight, President of Yale College, that Christians generally observed the seventh day in the fifth century—prove beyond reasonable doubt, that the early Christians generally observed the seventh day, whatever may have been said respecting the observance of the first day festival. The inconsistency of modern religionists, who attempt to make the Sabbath of the fourth commandment into the first day of the week, finds its parallel only among the Romanists, who pretend to make of a little common bread into the body and blood of the Lord Jesus.

In regard to the Tracts, we believe they present the truth relative to the Sabbath of Jehovah, and the duty of the Christian world respecting it. We wish them God speed; and we sincerely desire that they may be the means of disturbing the mind of every superstitious and bigoted violator of the Lord's Sabbath in the land, and may find their way to every one who has an honest desire to know the truth concerning this important Christian duty.

RELIGIOUS SENTIMENTS OF NAPOLEON.

In a conversation related by Count de Montholon, the faithful friend and companion in exile of Napoleon, and published in European journals, the fallen chieftain is represented as saying:

"I know men, and I tell you that Jesus is not a man! The religion of Christ is a mystery which subsists by its own force, and proceeds from a mind which is not a human mind. We find in it a marked individuality, which originated a train of words and actions unknown before. Jesus borrowed nothing from our knowledge.

He exhibited himself a perfect example in his precepts. Jesus is not a philosopher, for his proofs are miracles; and from the first, his disciples adored him. In fact, learning and philosophy are of no use for salvation, and Jesus came into the world to reveal the mysteries of Heaven, and the laws of the Spirit.

Alexander, Cesar, Charlemagne, and myself, founded empires; but on what foundation did we rest our genius? Upon force. Jesus Christ alone founded his empire upon love; and at this hour, millions of men would die for him.

It was not a day, or a battle, that achieved the triumph of the Christian religion in the world. No—it was a long war, a contest of three centuries, begun by the apostles, then continued by the flood of Christian generations. In this war, all the kings and potentates of the earth were on one side, on the other I see no army, but a mysterious force—some men scattered here in all parts of the world, and who have no other rallying point than a common faith in the mysteries of the cross.

I die before my time, and my body will be given back to the earth, to become food for worms. Such is the fate of him who has been called the great Napoleon. What an abyss between my deep mysteries and the eternal kingdom of Christ, which is proclaimed, loved, and adored, and is extending over the whole earth!"

Did ever Napoleon, in the height of his imperial glory, agitating nations and disposing of thrones, appear so truly great, as in thus freely acknowledging the infinite superiority of Christ's empire of love, and corroborating the testimony of millions to his supremacy? The sentiments are such as would naturally be expressed by any person of peculiarly enlarged, comprehensive, and honest mind, on soberly contrasting the desolating march of earthly conquerors, with the more triumphant though peaceful march of Christianity over the nations. And may not many of the rich, mighty, and noble of this generation, seeing how earthly objects vanish like smoke, be persuaded to share liberally in that kingdom which endureth forever?

THE FIRST SABBATH.

The sixth day of creation drew near its close. The sun had finished his course, and the gloom of evening began to spread over the earth. The first-born son of earth stood upon a hill in Eden, near Eloah, his guardian angel and guide.

It grew darker and darker about the hill. Twilight rushed to the embrace of night, and threw her dewy roses over hill and valley. The songs of the birds and the noises of the beasts were hushed, and even the air seemed to sleep.

"What is all this?" said the man with a soft and low voice to his heavenly guide. "Will the young creation disappear, and sink down into chaos?"

Eloah smiled, and said—"It is the repose of Earth."

Now appeared the heavenly lights—the moon arose, and the starry hosts followed in splendor.

Man looked upward with sweet surprise, and the angel of the Lord looked with pleasure upon the gazing son of Earth. The night was still, and the song of the nightingale floated in the air.

Eloah touched the man with his staff. He lay down on the hillock and slept. His first dream came over him, and Jehovah made him his companion.

When the morning twilight opened, Eloah touched the slumbering one. He awoke and felt new power and life streaming through him. The hills and valleys rose out of the gloom, the young light came glittering down upon the fountains of the river of Eden, and the sun arose, bringing the day. Man looked upon his new formed wife, the mother of all living. Surprise and delight filled his heart.

"See," said Eloah, "the divine is made out of rest. Therefore shalt thou consecrate this day to rest and devotion."

MINISTERIAL SUPPORT.

Matthew Wilks, of London, having been desired by a vacant church, to send them a young man as a supply for three months, selected one of the senior students from Hoxton, and directed his course to the place. After his engagement expired, the Evangelist returned to London, and called upon Mr. Wilks, when the ensuing conversation, in substance, followed. Having given a brief narrative of his labors, Mr. Wilks inquired, 'How do you like the people there?' 'Very well, they appear to be a worthy body of Christians.'

Mr. W.—'How did the people like you?'

'They said and showed, that they were much attached to me.'

Mr. W.—Then I suppose that you will return and settle with them as their preacher.'

'Not at all.'

Mr. W.—'Why?'

'They said that they should delight in that event, but they are too poor to maintain a stated ministry.'

Mr. W.—'Too poor! If that is all, we will soon know.'

Almost immediately after, Mr. Wilks took his young 'Timothy' with him, and visited the town. After some intercourse with one of the deacons, he obtained a list of the members of the church, and the other pewholders, and proceeded upon his peregrination. The first person that he called upon, was a superannuated female Christian, who was the living exemplar of the apostle's portrait, 'poor of this world, rich in faith'—living by knitting hose, or any similar employment, when able to stir, and when bed-ridden, sustained by her fellow Christians, who were amply repaid for their earthly trifles, by her spiritual communications. She was at that time in unusual energy and liveliness, when Matthew Wilks entered her lowly hovel; and after his kind salutation, they thus discussed the object of his interview.

Mr. W.—'I have called to have a little talk with you about your church affairs—my name is Matthew Wilks, that you have heard of.'

'Thanks be to God!' replied the old Anna-like disciple, 'I have often heard talk of you, but who could have thought that you would come to see me?'

Mr. W.—'I come to inquire about the state of your church, and as you are the oldest member, nobody was so fit to make me acquainted with it. But I want to know first how you like the young man I sent to preach to you for the last three months?'

It should be remarked, that the aged disciple was always at the house of prayer, when she was not absolutely incapacitated by bodily affliction; to her, the communion of saints was the pearl of great price, and the means of grace were her meat and drink, the bread of life and the water of salvation.

'Blessed man of God!' answered the woman, 'many times did I get a feast when he was a preaching and praying, and talking with me in my poor cot.'

Mr. W.—'Then I suppose that you will have him away from London to become your preacher.'

'I wish we could, but the deacons say that the people are not able to maintain a preacher.'

Mr. W.—'Well now; suppose that the young man had been walking about for hours, visiting the sick, or catechising the children, or scattering religious tracts, or carrying about Bibles, and were to call upon you, when you were drinking your tea, would you not give him a cup of tea to refresh him?'

'Indeed! if it were to come to that, I would never drink any more tea, if we could only have the preaching on the Lord's day, and the communion, and the evening meetings in the week.'

Mr. W.—'Suppose, then, I put you down for one penny a week towards the minister's salary; and then I will go on, and see if I cannot get pennies enough to keep your souls from starvation.'

The self-denying, half-paralytic, most heartily assented to the proposition made by Matthew Wilks, that she, as the senior professing Christian in the church, should be the first on the list of subscribers, at one penny a week, to support the gospel in that community; and, having prayed with his delighted sister in the gospel, he proceeded in his "active faith and laborious love." Having added a few more weekly pennies to his evangelical fund, he advanced to the higher class of two "pennies," and then three "pennies," and four "pennies." There he paused, and returned to the astonished deacon, with a much larger sum deposited in his "Bank of Faith," than the deacon had assured him all the congregation combined could collect—and as the deacon said—"Mr. Wilks, every 'penny' of it is just as sure as if it were in your own hands; for there is not a man or a woman among them, who will not go without their daily bread, rather than not pay the amount every week."

Mr. Wilks and the deacon then started off among the six "penny" and twelve "penny" depositors, who were absolutly astounded; and in their delight could scarcely believe in the self-evident success of the "little, old-fashioned Puritan's drollery;" but who all united together forthwith, while he, according to his custom, "disturbed public worship," by giving them sound evangelical advice, and invoking upon them all, the divine blessing and benediction—"The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Spirit." I believe he left his junior brother at the deacon's house, and returned to London. It is probable that the minister still remains in that place as a proof of Matthew Wilks' "drollery" in settling a minister of the gospel upon the faith of an afflicted old Christian woman's penny-a-week; which, it is proper to add, as the crowning testimony of the "little, old-fashioned Puritan's drollery," Matthew Wilks himself paid!

HONORABLE CONCESSION.

Col. Ethan Allen, the hero of Ticonderoga though a brave and honored patriot, was an avowed deist. He wrote several works against Christianity, one of which, profanely entitled "Allen's Bible," has caused the ruin of many a young man, impatient of religious restraint.

While seated in his quiet home, glorying in the independence he had so bravely contributed to procure, and exulting still more in his imagined triumphs over religion, he was suddenly called to the death-bed of a tenderly beloved child. She had been well instructed by her mother, in the principles and duties of Revealed Religion; and at this trying hour it afforded her, not merely consolation, but triumphant joy.

When her father, whom she ever regarded with respect and warm affection, arrived, and was bending over her couch, she threw her arms around his neck, and with a look of unutterable kindness said,—"Father, I am dying;—tell me—shall I go into eternity believing your sentiments, or what my mother has taught me?"

The veteran, whom no argument had ever shaken, who had stood unmoved in the battle-field, surprised by her heavenly serenity and confidence, tremblingly replied,—"My daughter, my dying daughter, believe what your mother has taught you."

How utterly worthless, at that moment, must have appeared all his boasted reasoning against a religion, which could thus give victory in death, by bringing life and immortality to light! And who, in such circumstances, would not say, "Let me die the death of the righteous?"

INFLUENCE.—This world is a world of influence, where every one like the mould is giving impressions, and every one like wax receiving them.—Ages may have passed since the departed dead were gathered to the tomb, and yet through the stillness of all those ages they are speaking to us; by tradition or history, or biography, for all the purposes of influence, the dead are still with us; a Bonaparte rousing the hero to conquest; a Newton firing the scholar in his study; a Milton inspiring the poet; a Brainard or a Martyn animating the missionary in his work. Every page that we read leaves its influence. Every letter that we have received, every friend that we have met, every accident that has occurred to us, each has left its stamp, indelible and eternal, on the soul.

The single charge from Patrick Henry to a child, "Remember that every man is the maker of his own standing and destiny," made that child one of the most distinguished men of his country. And the remark of a popular preacher, that "resolution was omnipotent," has modified the character of many who heard it, for all eternity.

[Youth's Cabinet.

PAYING LIKE A SINNER.—Several years ago, in North Carolina, where it is not customary for the tavern keepers to charge the ministers anything for lodging and refreshments, a preacher presumingly stopped at a tavern one evening, made himself comfortable during the night, and in the morning entered the stage without offering to pay for his accommodations. The landlord soon came running up to the stage, and said, "there was some one in there who had not settled his bill;" the passengers all said they had, except the preacher, who said he had understood he never charged ministers anything. "What! you a minister of the gospel—a man of God!" cried the inn-keeper. "You came to my house last night—you sat down at the table without asking a blessing—I lit you up to your room, and you went to bed without praying to your Maker—(for I staid there until you had undressed;)—you rose and washed without prayer, ate your breakfast without saying grace; and, as you came to my house like a sinner, and ate and drank like a sinner, you have got to pay like a sinner."

THE DEATH THREATENED AGAINST ADAM.

MR. EDITOR,—I find difficulty in explaining Genesis 2: 17—"For in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." Will you, or some of your correspondents, give us an article on the nature of that death?

INQUIRER.

In considering the consequences of the first transgression, it is a question of some importance, What was the penalty threatened against Adam? At the same time, the conflicting theories of able and sincere divines, warn us that the question has its difficulties. Genuine orthodox men, we believe, think it perfectly clear, that the penalty threatened was "death, temporal, spiritual, and eternal."—Others, however, think it equally clear, that the total annihilation of soul and body was threatened, with the consequent extinction of the human race. There are others still, who think that the seeds of mortality were planted in Adam from the first, and that temporal death was no part of the penalty, but a natural consequence of his being taken from the earth, earthy. Looking at their different theories, one would think these men must differ very widely from each other. Yet it is quite possible, that if we could look through some window in their hearts, we should find their views in many respects similar, and their practices in view of the penalty exactly the same. They probably look upon the matter in these cases from different stand-points, and hence see different phases of the same thing. Without following either of their theories, let us look about somewhat for an answer to this question, What was the penalty threatened against Adam?

The first point of observation should be one from which we can see the original condition of Adam. To us it seems quite probable, that when he was threatened with death in case of transgression, he had not the most indistinct idea of temporal death. He had seen nothing to intimate the possibility of such a thing. Indeed, the life and activity of all around him, would be likely to shut out from his mind any thought of the kind, and to create an impression that existence would be lasting. He was living as it were spontaneously, happy in the consciousness of perfect innocence. Now what would be the natural effect of speaking to such a being of a punishment by death? It would lead him to consider a condition exactly opposite to that in which he was then placed—a condition in which what was then a source of joy would become an occasion of pain. This would be in no way so fully brought upon him as by leaving him in a state of confirmed wickedness and misery. And we have no intimation, that more or less than this was understood or feared by our first parents.

But the understanding which they had of the matter will not satisfy us as to the meaning of the death threatened. Let us look, then, at the nature of their transgression, and see if we can derive any light from that as to their appropriate punishment. Every transgression of the law of God, the Bible teaches us to regard as infinitely evil. The justice of this must be apparent to any one who will consider the character of the law-giver, and his claim upon the obedience of his creatures. It is equally apparent, if we consider the influence of transgression in encouraging the disobedience others, and bringing the authority of the law-giver into contempt. This is true of every transgression. But in the case of Adam it was emphatically true. We see him standing as the representative of a race capable of comprehending and obeying the law of God—surrounded by whatever was necessary to his happiness—enjoying the favor of God, and under the restraining influence of His presence—with everything, in short, to encourage obedience and deter from transgression;—and yet breaking away from all these restraints, with no other inducement than mere personal and temporary gratification. What circumstances can be conceived to aggravate the crime? Now if it be true that every transgression is so great an evil as has been represented, what shall we say of this, which opened the way for all the sin which has followed? We cannot think of its nature and effects without believing, that the mere separation of soul and body would be no adequate punishment for it—that nothing less than death eternal could satisfy the demands of Divine Justice.

This view would be confirmed by considering some passages of Scripture which speak of the appropriate punishment of sin. In one passage we are told that "the wages of sin is death." What kind of death is here meant, may be inferred from the remainder of the passage, which says, "the gift of God is eternal life." "Wages of sin" is here contrasted with "the gift of God;" and if the gift of God be eternal life, the wages of sin must be eternal death. Indeed, the Bible never speaks of death and dying, in the sense of a separation of the soul from the body, as an appropriate punishment for sin. On the contrary, it gives us the means of knowing, that in all such cases death eternal must be understood. There is another class of passages, which speak of the righteous as having eternal life and never seeing death—as never meeting with that, in other words, which can properly be called death; in contrast with eternal life. Take these two classes of Scripture texts together, and they furnish a substantial foundation for the belief, that not only temporal death, but also separation from all natural good, and exposure to eternal death, were included in that threatning against Adam, "In the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die."

EFFECTS OF BAVARIAN INTOLERANCE.—The Voice of Jacob says, that a letter from Mayence, dated 16th May, mentions the embarkation of two hundred more Bavarian Jews, in the preceding week, for America. They gave a grievous account of the treatment which the Jews of that country are subjected to, and which leaves no alternative but abject endurance or expatriation. One of the emigrants was asked whether he would not be desirous to return to his native country again, if successful in America; to which he replied, "Not until America becomes Bavarian." Persecution must be severe, which will not only drive men from the land of their birth, but impel them to speak thus of their early home. Among the forms of oppression, it will be remembered, that only the eldest son of a Jewish subject of the King of Bavaria, is permitted to marry; the juniors having to conform to a compulsory celibacy. An edict has just been promulgated at Munich, forbidding Jews to deal in cattle, either by sale or barter! Can it be the nineteenth century in Bavaria; or have we erred in our reckoning?

UNION FOR THE SAKE OF JUDAISM.

Two or three articles under this heading have appeared of late in the "Occident and American Jewish Advocate." They are prefatory to a plan for a Central Religious Council, to which shall be referred all cases of religious inquiry and ecclesiastical polity among the Jews of this country. The writer thinks a great improvement has taken place within a few years in the character and qualifications of Jewish teachers, and that they are now prepared for such an organization as he proposes. Hitherto there has been no religious authority among them higher than the local ministers, who were men chosen by each congregation independently, for no other qualification than their ability to read the service. Of course such men could hardly be expected wisely to direct the ecclesiastical affairs of so numerous a people, and to pursue that even yet faithful course which would secure general harmony and good feeling. The whole tenor of the Jewish religion requires that its leaders should be men qualified to give forth "the word of judgment," and disposed to engage in the actual hard service of instructing the masses. The editor of the Occident thinks the appointment of ministers in the way they have been accustomed to appoint them, is the very worst method to insure the selection of such men as are needed, and that the best remedy for the evil is to have an ecclesiastical Board to inquire into the moral fitness and literary qualifications of the candidates. We agree with him in this opinion, whether it respects his own or any other people; and we heartily wish him success in his efforts to carry out a plan for improving the character of religious teachers.

THE HOLY TUNIC AT TREVES.

Much interest has been felt in the history of this relic, since the reform movement in Germany which grew out of its exhibition. It is claimed, that when the Empress Helen, the mother of Constantine, made a pilgrimage to the holy land, less than three centuries after the crucifixion, she brought back many relics, and among others this holy tunic. Treves was at that period the most flourishing city in Europe; and being the birth-place of Helen, she presented it with the relic which was then prized above all others. But troublous times came; Treves was four times sacked and depopulated; and the tunic, having been concealed by its keepers in some spot known only to a few, was at length altogether forgotten. After many years had elapsed, however, and peace was restored, the long-concealed relic was again discovered in 1196, and exhibited to the people. The exhibition was repeated in 1512, 1531, 1545, 1553, 1585, and 1655. During the eighteenth century it was twice exhibited at the fortress of Ehrenbreitstein, where it had been deposited for greater security. At length it was restored to Treves, and was there exhibited to the people in 1810, when 250,000 pilgrims visited that city for the sake of looking upon it. Since then it had not been exhibited until last year, when it was again shown in the Cathedral at Treves by order of the bishop of the diocese. The spectacle commenced on the 18th of August, and continued fifty-six days, during which time it was visited by not less than one million of pilgrims, many of whom had come from far distant places—archbishops and bishops, learned men and nobles, mingling with the poorest and most ignorant in their anxiety to obtain a sight at this venerated relic.

It was during this last exhibition, that the spirit of John Ronge was stirred within him when he saw the whole city given up to the worship of relics. He immediately wrote an eloquent letter, denouncing the exhibition of the holy tunic as a scheme for perpetuating the spiritual tyranny of the Roman hierarchy—imposing upon the credulity of the ignorant—and extorting money from the poor; and closing with an exhortation to his readers to discountenance the exhibition, and to unite with him in achieving the freedom of their German Fatherland. This letter, which was extensively circulated, has been followed by other letters addressed to different orders of the Catholic clergy, and to believers in general. They have together produced a religious movement in Germany equal in importance to any which has taken place since the Great Reformation.

WAR IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.—It is hardly possible to find on the bloody pages of martial history, the record of a more horrible massacre than that lately committed by the French troops in Africa. It seems, that a tribe of Arabs, called the Ouled Rialis, amounting to about eight hundred men, women, and children, took refuge in a large cave which had served them for an asylum. There they were found by a French corps, under command of Col. Pellissier; and after some parleying, which did not result in a satisfactory arrangement for their surrender, the troops proceeded to suffocate and roast alive these eight hundred defenceless people who were crowded together in the cave. Such a circumstance, occurring on the 19th of June, 1845, shows to what depths of degradation and cruelty modern warriors may sink. We are glad to notice, that this brutal transaction is condemned in the strongest language by the English and French press.

VERY MODEST.—It is amusing to read the remarks of some southern Baptist editors in regard to the division between northern and southern Baptists. They seem to think, that they of the South are "the people," and that all enterprise will "die with them"—or at any rate, that those who have not their sympathy must soon drop off. The Editor of the Baptist Banner, for instance, speaking of the action of the Mission Board, modestly suggests, that fraternal intercourse between the North and South can not be restored, "unless the wise and discreet members and ministers of the northern churches organize themselves distinct from, and as opposed to, abolitionism." Only think of it—a missionary organization to put down abolitionism and uphold slavery! We are afraid the editor of the Baptist Banner will not live to see peace restored, if that is the best condition he has to offer.

MINISTERS IN TEXAS.—A gentleman who traved in Texas in 1841, has given an instructive account of some of the customs which prevail there. Among others, he states that the ministers of the country, who are mostly itinerant, have to ride on horseback, and carry fire-arms in their pockets to protect themselves from the Indians. On one occasion, he expressed his surprise to a minister at seeing him "going about preaching the Gospel of peace, and at the same time carrying the weapons of war." The reply was, "Yes, it is true, but necessary, not for the sake of my life, but for the cause of Christ."

NEW SYNAGOGUES.—We published some months ago an account of difficulties among the worshipers at the Elm Street Synagogue in this city, which were carried so far that one party took the liberty to close the synagogue against the other party, whereupon that other party took the liberty to break it open again and hold possession by actual force. We are glad to learn, that these difficulties have been reconciled by a compromise, and that a portion of the congregation, having seceded, are now building a new synagogue in a very superior style.

We learn farther, from the "Occident," that the Israelites of New Haven, Ct., contemplate erecting a synagogue. At Syracuse, N. Y., and at Wilkesbarre and Lancaster, Pa., the Jews have lately commenced holding religious meetings; and there is a prospect that permanent congregations will be formed in each of those places before long. These new congregations are the natural result of the increase of emigration from Germany.

ABNER KNEELAND CELEBRATION.—On Sunday last, August 17, as we learn from the Boston Investigator, the Infidel Relief Society of Boston, was to celebrate "the seventh anniversary of the liberation of Mr. Kneeland from Boston Jail, where he had been confined sixty days for the indefinable crime of blasphemy." A steamboat was chartered for the occasion, to convey those who might wish to attend the celebration to Phillip's Beach. Fare each way 25 cents. What will become of the Sunday, when infidels select it as the day to commemorate the sufferings of their saints?

RATHER HARD.—In Williamstown, Vt., a young man by the name of Plymon Seaver has been for some time in prison in consequence of being found at work in his field on a Sunday. It seems that he was fined $2 for the crime, and imprisoned because he could not or would not pay the fine. The editor of the Herald of Freedom thinks this circumstance shows a strange comparative estimate of God and the State of Vermont. He says—"For trampling God's Holy Day under foot, Vermont fines a man two round dollars. For not paying said State a two dollar debt, Vermont shuts him up for life. And the old Green Mountain corporation never would let him out alive if he didn't pay.

DEATH OF A POET.—John Augustus Shea, author of several poems which will eventually give him an honorable name in the republic of letters, is no more. He was a native of Ireland, and of highly respectable connections. Only the week preceding his death, he visited Connecticut, where he was engaged to deliver a poem. He returned sick, and died at his residence in New York on Friday the 15th inst.

A RECIPE FOR EDITORS.—If a cotemporary should ever review an article you have written, showing the unsoundness of your positions and the inconclusiveness of your reasoning, just charge him with impeaching your veracity and writing under the influence of passion. By this means you will not only escape the necessity of defending your positions, but may also secure the credit of great coolness and a high regard for the truth.

MAXSON vs. ANNAS.

Letter from Mr. Maxson.

DERUYTER, August 10, 1845.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Several weeks since, and immediately after the the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Maxson, vs. Annas, I noticed a few remarks in the Recorder, giving a statement of the case, with its principal features. The denomination have therefore been apprised of the result; and as for a considerable time I was left without any thing more than the general knowledge of the fact, I deemed it unimportant to add any thing to what had been stated. I had intended, when the court should have sent us their opinion on which the case was decided, to communicate it forthwith, that the ecclesiastical meetings of our denomination might have all the information that could be imparted. But so much time elapsed after our application to the Court for their opinion before the receipt of it, that our Associations have met and acted on the subject without it. It may now be proper to say, that we have received the opinion, and herewith transmit you a copy.

You will discover from this decision, that the naked question of the sufficiency of the law to protect Sabbath-keepers has been before the court, and on that they have made their decision. Had this document come to hand prior to the meetings of the Associations, they would have been saved some perplexity respecting the ground of the decision, and would have seen, that it was not from any mismanagement of the case, informality, or improper movements, that the cause was jeopardized; and had they possessed the knowledge desired, they might with much propriety have settled the question of carrying it to the Court of Errors. As it is, nothing can appear plainer, than that the decision is made under the influence of that prejudice which generally attends the advocates of popular errors against the rights and privileges those they oppose. Even the best and most evident intentions of the law, are but a poor security against the oppressor, when the law is administered by those whose interests incline them to favor the oppressor. The law reads as follows:—

§ 1. "No writ, process, warrant, order, judgment, decree, or other proceedings, of any court, or office of justice of the peace, which shall be served, or executed, on the seventh day of the week, commonly called Saturday, by or upon any person whose religious faith and practice is to keep the seventh as a day set apart by divine command as the Sabbath of rest from labor, and dedicated to the worship of God, shall be valid, except in cases of breach of the peace, or apprehension of persons charged with crime or misdemeanor. The service of any such proceedings, in all other cases, shall be utterly void."

With such a law before them, the courts have in effect decided, that though no service of ANY process in law is valid against the person of a Seventh-day Baptist, yet any process or proceeding against his property is valid. So that a summons may be issued on the seventh day, requiring him to appear on the seventh day, and if not served on that day the cause may proceed to judgment, execution may be issued, levy made, and property sold, on the Sabbath, and he has no redress by appeal. By this decision, he is saved, it is true, the pain of having a summons read in his presence on the Sabbath, which would take one minute, and require no action on his part, but he may be required to attend court at a distant town, amid the toil and anxiety of a court room, or allow judgment to be taken in default. Had the Legislature no higher or more liberal motive in passing the above law, they could not have perpetrated a greater imposition on Sabbath-keepers. But such we believe was not the case. We petitioned not merely to be relieved from hearing a summons, but from being compelled to be parties to answer in courts of law on the Sabbath, to which petition the Legislature responded, and ordered a bill drawn agreeably to the prayer of the petitioners, which was supposed to have been done, and it was passed accordingly. Such has been the confidence felt in the security of this law, that no danger was apprehended on the part of any in relying upon it in the first instance. As it has terminated, the results of an expensive course of suits at law, have fallen on me, yet the consciousness of having done for the cause of truth a service, which no other one could do, for want of corresponding circumstances, sustains me in adding to former sacrifices the responsibilities of this onerous trust which Providence seems to have imposed upon me.

In making the foregoing remarks, you will observe that I have departed a little from the former course marked out for myself, and which my close business habits have rather imposed upon me, of retiring from expressing my views through the medium of the public press, on matters which, however interesting to me, have now numerous and abler advocates.

Believe me, dear brother, yours affectionately,

JOHN MAXSON.

Opinion of the Court.

Supreme Court. { MAXSON vs. ANNAS. } Bronson, Chief Justice.

The plaintiff insists that the judgment under which the defendant purchased the property is void, because it was rendered on Saturday; and he relies on the Statute "in relation to the Seventh-day Baptists." This badly-drawn law provides, in substance, that no writ, process, warrant, order, judgment, decree or other proceedings of any Court, shall be served or executed on the seventh day of the week, commonly called Saturday, upon any person who keeps that day as the Sabbath. Cases of breaches of the peace and the apprehension of persons charged with crimes and misdemeanors are excepted. "The service of any such process in all other cases shall be utterly void." (Stat. 1839, p. 335.) This Statute (except as to the day) is much like the one which provides that no writ, process, &c., shall be served or executed on Sunday; (1 R. S. 675, §69) and both should receive the same construction. But I am unable to read the law so that it will touch the plaintiff's case. His complaint is that the judgment was rendered—not that it was "served or executed"—on Saturday. The rendition is a very different thing from the execution of a judgment. We have been referred to two classes of cases; one relating to ministerial and the other to judicial acts. The first class arose under the Sunday Statute; the second had nothing to do with it. In Butler vs. Kelsey, (15 John. 177) which belongs to the first class, it was held that a writ of inquiry of damages could not be executed on Sunday. It was a plain case, falling within the very words of the Statute. In Field vs. Park, (20 John. 140) it was held that a notice of motion is in effect a summons to appear in Court and defend against a motion to be applied for—and cannot therefore be served on Sunday. Van Vechten vs. Paddock, (12 John. 1781) decides that delivering process to an officer on Sunday is not a good commencement of an action on that day. The cases of the other class hold that at the Common Law Sunday is dies non juridicus—that a judgment cannot be rendered, or an award be made on that day. (Hotaling vs. Osborn, 15 John. 119; Story vs. Elliott, 8 Cow. 27.) We have now a Statute declaring that "no Court shall be opened on Sunday," unless it be for the purpose of receiving a verdict or discharging a jury. (2 R. S. 675, §7.) We have no such Statute in relation to Saturday—nor has the common law decided that Saturday is not a judicial day. No act is void because it was done on the Sabbath unless it has been prohibited by the Common Law or by Statute. (Sayles vs. Smith, 12 Wend. 57.) The same doctrine must apply to all the other days in the week.

If the plaintiff had the process made returnable at a time when he knew the defendant could not conscientiously attend to make his defence, he is worthy of the severest censure. But still, the judgment is not void. There are many social duties which are not enforced, and many wicked deeds which are not punished, by human laws. New trial denied.

[A copy.] N. DENIO, State Reporter.

☞ The foregoing Letter and Opinion present this case of Maxson vs. Annas in a very clear manner, and show exactly its present position. One of two things must be evident to every reader; either Judge Bronson has entirely misconstrued the law for the protection of Sabbath-keepers, or else the Legislature of the State of New York has altogether failed to do what it intended in passing that law. In either case, the subject ought to be investigated. If the Judge has misconstrued the law, then the question ought to brought before the Court of Errors, so that the decision of that Court may prevent similar misconstructions in future. But if the law is really defective, then application should at once be made to the Legislature to perfect that which it has begun. We are not prepared at present to express an opinion as to where the error lies, and shall therefore only throw the facts before our readers, leaving comments for a future occasion. Meanwhile, we will say, that Bro. Maxson's claim for assistance in this case—(which he studiously avoids mentioning himself,)—is a just one, and ought to receive prompt attention. He has carried this suit up from court to court by the advice of his brethren, and for their benefit as well as his own. Encouragement has been given him from various places, that he should be assisted to meet the necessarily heavy expenses attendant upon such a course. We trust those who have given this encouragement will not now disappoint the expectations they have raised.

LECTURES ON CLAIRMATIVENESS, or Human Magnetism, by Rev. GIBSON SMITH. New York: printed by Searing & Prall—1845.

This is a pamphlet of forty pages, giving an account of the revelations made by one Jackson Davis, of Poughkeepsie, a young man about eighteen years of age. It tells some things very hard to believe, and about as hard, under the circumstances, to doubt.

A MISSIONARY.—There is a missionary in India who not only bears his own expenses, but supports twenty other missionaries. Once he was wealthy; now he has consecrated himself and his income to the Lord. Should not such examples shame our wavering, inefficient efforts? How many men of property amongst us, although the professed followers of Christ, give comparatively nothing for the advancement of his kingdom! Brethren, wake up—your prayers and your contributions are needed now.

Some portion of his ease, his blood, his wealth,
For others' good, is a poor frozen churl."

General Intelligence.

WAR WITH MEXICO.

It is now beyond dispute that we are on the brink of a war with Mexico. The iniquitous scheme of Annexation is to be consummated in blood, and all for the sake of "enlarging the area of freedom." One can hardly think of it without indignation and shame. But it is now too late to arrest the issue. United States troops have been hurrying from every quarter towards Texas for some time past; and now we have received from Mexico sufficiently distinct intimations that war is soon to commence. The following circular from the Mexican War Department, with other documents which accompany it, cannot be mistaken:—

OFFICE OF WAR AND MARINE.

SECTION OF OPERATIONS.

Circular.—The United States have consummated the perfidy against Mexico, by sanctioning the decree which declares the Annexation of the department of Texas to that Republic. The injustice of that usurpation is apparent, and Mexico cannot tolerate such a grave injury without making an effort to prove to the United States the possibility of her ability to cause her rights to be respected. With this object the Supreme Government has resolved upon a declaration of war against that power, seeing that our forbearance, instead of being received as a proof of our friendly disposition, has been interpreted into an acknowledged impossibility on our part to carry on a successful war.

Such an error on the part of the United States will be advantageous to Mexico, because, suddenly abandoning its pacific attitude, it will tomorrow communicate to Congress the declaration of war, and excite the patriotism of its citizens to sustain the dignity of the nation and the integrity of its territory, now treacherously attacked, in utter disregard of all guaranties recognized in this enlightened age.

You will readily appreciate the importance of this subject, and the necessity of preparing the troops under your command to march toward any point which may require protection against these most unjust aggressions. I am directed by the Provincial President to enjoin upon you, as General-in-Chief of your Division, and as a citizen of this Republic, to hold yourself in readiness to repel those who seek the ruin of Mexico. The Government is occupied in covering the different points on the frontiers, and in collecting the necessary means, so that nothing may be wanting to those whose glory it will be to defend the sacred rights of their country.

I have the honor to communicate for your intelligence and to direct your conduct.

FOREIGN NEWS—TEN DAYS LATER.

The steamship Hibernia reached Boston on Sunday at half past twelve o'clock, in less than twelve days from Liverpool.

The weather of the week has increased rather than diminished the fears entertained as to the harvest.

In Parliament the business has been of a miscellaneous character. The week has been passed in the Lords in enacting wholesale the measures sent up by the Commons; and been spent by the Commons in patiently waiting for the Lords to overtake them in legislation.

Mr. M'Lane, the newly appointed minister from the United States of America to this Court, has arrived at Thomas' Hotel, Berkley square.

The annexation of Texas to the United States has excited no surprise.

The news of the second fire at Quebec has spread a wide and deep sensation. Every thing that can be done for the alleviation of the sufferers will be accomplished. The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved a vote of £20,000 in aid of the suffering colonists.

The wife of George Catlin, Esq., the celebrated painter and delineator of Indian customs, died in Paris on the 30th ult.

From the Continent the principal news is of preparations making to receive with due honor Queen Victoria on her progress to Saxe Gotha.

FRANCE.—The celebration of the Revolution of 1830 began in Paris on Monday, with religious observances in honor of those who perished. Tuesday was the day of rejoicing. There was a kind of fair on the Champs Elysees and at the Barriere du Trone; a concert in the garden of the Tuilleries, and at night an illumination with fireworks.

INDIA AND CHINA.—Cholera, we regret to say, has been very prevalent both at Bombay and Poonah.

The only important item of intelligence from Cabool is, that the long-designed attack of Peshawur has been finally abandoned both by Dost Mahomed and his son.

COLLISION OF STEAMERS—135 LIVES LOST.—A most dreadful catastrophe occurred on the Black sea, about 40 miles east of the Bosphorus, on the 11th of July. Two Turkish steamers, the one coming from, and the other going to Trebizond, came in collision, and one of them went down with the greater part of the crew and passengers.—About seventy persons threw themselves from the sinking steamer and were picked up by the boats of the other. Probably about 130 lost their lives. The scene is described as awful. As the Scutari approached th wreck she keeled over, (the people on deck, like wild maniacs, were visible in moonlight,) and as the sea sucked her down—as the vortex of water she formed in sinking, almost spin round with the motion—there rose a scream of utter horror—a last scream!—which those who heard will never forget.

EMANCIPATION IN MARYLAND.—An eminent physician formerly of Baltimore, who relinquished his profession to take charge of a plantation in Ann Arundell county, Md., of which, with one hundred and fifty slaves, he became the owner on the death of an uncle, has come out with a strong argument and appeal in favor of emancipation. He has published and urged his views with great power, in the Saturday Visitor, of Baltimore, whose editor represents him as connected with some of the first families in the State, and as having no small stakes in the movement he so strongly recommends. "When such men," says the Visitor, "with such an interest in all that concerns the welfare and fame of Maryland, take the field as open advocates of emancipation, there is surely room to hope that something will ere long be done to rid us of an evil so stupendous and crushing to the moral and physical energies of our beloved State." Heaven speed the day!

STEAMER SUNK AND LOSS OF LIFE ON LAKE ERIE.—The Detroit Advertiser publishes the following:—

"At half past 3 A. M., Tuesday 12th inst, below Point au Pellee on the Lake Erie, the 'London' steamer from Buffalo, and the 'Kent' on her downward passage, came in contact with a dreadful crash, and the result of the concussion was the loss of the latter boat, and, we grieve to add, several lives.

I have no heart to dwell upon the scene we witnessed. For some minutes we supposed we had broken the machinery of the London, and were going to the bottom; and were only relieven from the apprehension of a watery grave by the sight of the Kent, rapidly sinking at our bows. Every effort was made to save her passengers, and all who were in sight were saved, several of those from the cabin being transferred to our boat without even their clothes. But, sad to say, a number were lost, being unable to gain the upper deck in time. Among these we reckon Rev. James E. Quaw, Redford, Michigan; Mr. Charles Osborn, Genesee Co. N. Y.; Mr. Seth Deming, Berlin, Conn.; Master Bruce Deming, Galena, W. T.; James Lowding, Ypsilanti, Michigan.

Two young ladies and a boy from Ypsilanti, names not known.

All the officers and hands of the boat and 79 passengers, including 10 children, were saved.

SALTPETRE WILL NOT EXPLODE!—The Committee of the Common Council appointed to investigate the cause of the explosion at Crocker and Warren's store, Broad street, which was the principal cause of the late disastrous conflagration, repaired to Mottville, on the Westchester Co. side of the bridge yesterday, accompanied by several eminent professors and other gentlemen, to test the question whether or not saltpetre will explode. Three experiments were tried, the result of which was an unanimous opinion, we understand, that saltpetre will not explode. The first test was a quantity of saltpetre in a bag to which fire was applied. The saltpetre and bag burned fiercely, but there was no explosion. The second experiment was a hogshead full of saltpetre slightly intermixed with bagging and other combustible matter known to have been in the store of C. & W. The hogshead was partially on the ground and shavings and other combustibles placed around it and set fire to. The result was the same as the first. The third was with a large boiler over a furnace heated exceedingly hot, and containing a large quantity of red-hot melted saltpetre. Into this cauldron of melted saltpetre three bags of saltpetre and slight combustible material were thrown. The heat was exceedingly great, but still no explosion. This seems to settle the question.

We may add that in each instance a hard substance was left by the burning saltpetre, resembling potash in appearance and having an extraordinary strong salt taste. [Tribune.

SLAVERY IN MISSISSIPPI.—Under the Constitution of Mississippi, the introduction of slaves is prohibited after the present year. The provision has given rise to much dissatisfaction, as it not only puts a stop to the introduction of slaves as merchandise, but settlers within the State cannot import them for their own individual use. The inconvenience that was anticipated in consequence of this prohibition, has induced the Legislature of Mississippi, at its last session, to authorize the people to record their votes at the polls, held this fall, for or against an amendment of the anti-slavery clause in the Constitution. The amendment that is now before the people proposes to vest in the Legislature entire control of the subject, in the passage of such laws as to that body may seem to be most expedient and judicious. The question is one which promises to be the most prominent in the canvass that is now going forward.

SHOCKING FATE.—The following is an extract of a letter from an officer of the U. S. sloop-of-war Falmouth, at Pensacola: "About two weeks since, one of our crew, an old man, who was at the time unwell, fell overboard during the night unobserved by any one—he was not missed until the morning. About a week afterward a shark was caught on board the Saratoga, and on opening him, (horrible to relate,) the head of the old man was found; it was sent on board our ship and recognised. His name was James Griffin, quartermaster.

THE PRESS IN GERMANY.—To show the sort of "Liberty of the Press" enjoyed in Berlin, it is stated in a recent French paper that a celebrated advocate, a man of profound legal learning and spotless reputation, has been condemned to four months' imprisonment and a fine of four hundred thalers, for the high crime and misdemeanor of writing an article in a periodical work, recommending the opening of the courts and the public administration of justice! But there is another case which really outstrips it. A newspaper, with a circulation of 5000, producing a large incom to its proprietors, has been suppressed by the government, on the ground that its writers gave the censors too much trouble in correcting their articles!

HYDROPHOBIA.—The Glasgow Argus mentions a remedy for the bite of rabid animals, applied by Dr. David Burnes (brother of the traveler Sir Alexander) in the case of two ladies of that city. They were in the parlor of a hotel, when a large dog entered, bit them both severely and ran off. Dr. Burnes was in the hotel, having been on a tour in the Highlands with Lord and Lady Panmure. Dr. Burnes on learning the nature of the accident, instantly cauterized, cupped, and excised the wounds, and had also recourse to the singular method of making the patients suck their wounds. This course the Doctor recommended ten years ago in the 'Lancet,' and he says that no danger whatever is to be feared from it, if the mouth and lips are free from sores or chaps."

M. Argo, the eminent French philosopher, lately stated at the Academy of Paris, that if a flash of lightning be seeu by a person the danger is over, the electric fluid traveling more rapidthan the light occasioned by the discharge.

In England, upwards of £300,000 are distributed annually by the Odd Fellows, whose funds amount to the gross sum of $3,500,000. This immense amount, says the correspondent of the Boston Atlas, has been got together by weekly contributions of two-pence from each member. The number of Odd Fellows in England is stated to be two hundred and sixty thousand.

An iron house has been imported from England into St. John's, New Brunswick. Iron boats and houses are getitng plentiful, and in one or two churches on this continent, we understand there are iron pulpits.

A New Jersey paper, in commending horticulture to its readers, rather grandiloquently says—"When God made man, he placed in his hand the spade and the pruning-hook." The United States Gazette says—"We have looked into a copy of the Good Book, which treats of the time and circumstances of man's creation, and find nothing said about the matter."

The Youths' State Temperance Society held their fourth Annual Convention at Troy on Wednesday. Four or five hundred delegates mere present, who formed a procession and marched to Mr. Beman's church, accompanied by troops of children of both sexes, with a large number of beautiful banners inscribed with temperance precepts, floral garlands, chaplets, &c.

One thousand distilleries have been enumerated as wealth in a recent statistical volume in Pennsylvania! Wealth, truly!—10,000,000 gallons of alcohol annually! How much such wealth as this would it require to make the people of these United States happy? How much of riches like this to steep a nation in the very dregs of poverty and crime?

The daily papers relate a most dreadful occurrance at the country residence of "one of our New York merchants." He had recently returned from Europe, and having suspected a guilty intercourse between a friend and his wife, finding them together at his dwelling, stabbed them both in the region of the heart, and fell senseless on the floor. He soon, however, revived, and is now a raving maniac. It is supposed his wife may recover, but the life of the man is doubtful.

An explosion took place at the United States Arsenal, Washington, Thursday afternoon about half past 4 o'clock. A man named Albert E. Irving was killed while preparing percussion powder for small arms. The building was shattered to pieces. It is stated that the man was engaged to be married to a lady in Baltimore.

Virginia and Tennessee contain over fifty-eight thousand persons, over twenty-one years of age, who can not read or write. Where is the school master?

In the year 1843 the people of Great Britain and Ireland, expended more than $40,000,000 for tobacco alone. A contemporary says: If the weed had been worked into pigtail, rather more than an inch thick, it would have formed a line 99,470 miles long, enough to go nearly five times round the world.

Within the year, ending June, there were shipped from Cincinnati by one house, to New Orleans, New York, and Baltimore, 4,280 barrels of eggs. The number brought to that market, is computed at 26,115,966 dozen.

Ice has become quite an article of export. It is shipped from Boston in blocks weighing from two to four cwt. deposited in saw-dust in the ships' hold, and sent to London, arriving in a very perfect state and with very little loss of weight. The first individual who engaged in the ice trade, a Mr. Tudor, of Boston, has accumulated in a few years a vast fortune by it.

One thousand buildings, it is said, will be erected in St. Louis this season. The population is now more than forty thousand.

The St. Joseph Gazette, published in Missouri, has news from the Oregon emigrants. Another company is lost, which contains fifteen men and thirty-five women. They were about 800 miles above Council Bluffs, on the Missouri river; they had despaired of getting on this season, and are planting buckwheat with the expectation of obtaining provisions on which they may resume their journey next spring.

At Norwalk, Ct., recently, Charles Rogers was bound for his appearance before the County Court on a charge of seducing Hannah E. Aiken, under a promise of marraige, and then abandoning her and her child, of which he is the father. The bail required for ruining the character of a confiding girl was $300. Is that the estimate which is placed upon the worth of female virtue in Norwalk?

The name of the persons arrested and as participators in the Delaware murder, we learn from the Delhi Express, are Henry D. Wickham, Zera Preston, and Isaac Burhans, of Roxbury, and Richard Davis, of Colchester. Sheriff Moore has offered a reward of $300 for the apprehension out of the county, of Warren W. Scudder, of Roxbury, who is charged with having been concerned in the murder, and who, it is supposed, has absconded.

Unless there should be a speedy arrival, the poor Turks Islanders would actually starve. Three boats went out in chase of a passing vessel, hoping to get a supply, but could not overtake her.

Several more anti-renters have been arrested in Delaware County. It is now said, that since the murder was committed it has been clearly as certained that it was premeditated, and that large numbers went to the sale on purpose to "see the fun."

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' SEMINARY.

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, Principal, and Professor of Languages.
IRA SAYLES, Associate Principal, and Professor of Mathematics.
GURDON EVANS, Professor of Natural Sciences.
J. R. HARTSHORN, Professor of Anatomy and Physiology.
O. STILLMAN, Professor of Vocal and Instrumental Music.
Miss C. B. MAXSON, Preceptress, Instructress in French, Italian, Drawing and Painting.
Mrs. M. B. KENYON, Assistant in the Female Department.

From the very liberal patronage extended to this Institution during the past seven years, the Trustees have been induced to make arrangements for greatly increasing its facilities. The Chemical, Philosophical, Astronomical, and Mathematical apparatus is amply sufficient for a full illustration of the different departments of those Sciences. The apparatus will be farther increased at the commencement of the ensuing Fall Term, by the introduction of whatever may be necessary in other Sciences than those above mentioned, especially, by a MANIKIN of the most approved structure, now being imported from Paris, expressly for this Institution. This will enable the student of Physiology and Anatomy to pursue his studies with advantages nearly equal to those afforded by an actual subject, having this farther advantage of being divested of all those revolting circumstances ever attendant on the dissecting room.

THE TEACHERS' CLASSES, as usual, will be exercised in practical teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective Instructors. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. Daily Lectures will also be given during the Fall and Winter Terms; and the public may be assured that this department of the Institution shall be conducted upon the principles of the best regulated Normal Schools, in this, or any other country.

Finally, the proprietors pledge themselves, that the reputation of this Institution shall be sustained by the introduction of whatever may be necessary to meet the demands of an intelligent public.

The Institution is liberally endowed and subject to the visitation of the Regents.

Its Library is choice and extensive, and accessible, also, to all the students gratis.

Evening Hymn for a good Boy.

How sweet to lay my weary head
Upon my quiet little bed,
And feel assured that all day long
I have not knowingly done wrong.

How sweet to hear my mother say,
"You have been very good to day!"
How sweet to see my father's joy,
When he can say, "My dear good boy!"

How sweet it is my thoughts to send
To many a dear beloved friend,
And think if they my heart could see,
How very happy they would be.

How sweet to think that He who loves,
Made all the shining worlds above.
My pure and happy heart can see,
And loves a little boy like me.

The Fortunate Disappointment.

It was a pleasant afternoon in summer, that the village school at Cloudville was dismissed, and the boys rushed forth, some to play, and others to return quietly to their homes. The next day was to be a holiday, and various plans of amusement were to be planned for the occasion.

Some of the boys might be seen sauntering arm in arm, with their satchels swung over their shoulders, while others were collected in small groups, and listening to the earnest address of some youthful speaker.

"Now, school fellows," said William Ray, as he mounted the decayed stump of a tree, "what shall we do to-morrow? Shall we go into the woods after berries, or shall we play at foot ball, or shall we have a sail on the pond? For my own part I am willing that you should do what you like,—but I neither care for the berries, nor the foot ball."

"We will have a sail on the pond," exclaimed half a dozen voices at once, "hurrah for a sail on the pond!" And it was decided by most of the boys, that such should be their amusement for the morrow.

Among those who anticipated with most delight the coming holiday, was a young and bright-eyed boy, named Edmund. As soon as he heard of the projected sail he ran home in the greatest haste, in order that he might obtain the consent of his parents to go with the other boys. His mother told him, that perhaps she would permit him to go, if she found out that any older person was going in the boat, and if the weather should be fair and favorable.

Edmund hardly stopped to listen to the last part of her reply. He jumped about the room, clapped his hands, and ran to tell his sister Marian of his expected pleasure. "I shall sail upon the pond," he exclaimed, "and perhaps William Ray will let me catch some trout with his hook and line. And then we shall go on shore, and kindle a fire, and cook the fish, and—"

"Stop, Edmund," said Marian; "what if something should happen to prevent your going?"

"Oh, I am not afraid of that," replied Edmund. "We shall have a delightful sail; don't you wish, Marian, that you were going?"

"I would rather walk in the garden," was the reply.

Edmund continued to talk the whole evening about the next day's sail on the pond. And even when he was snug in his bed, it occupied his thoughts. Once in the course of the night, he arose, and looked out of the window, to see if there was a promise of fair weather in the sky. The stars shone bright, and the moon was unshaded by clouds, and, closing the window, he returned to his repose, and was soon after in a sound sleep.

The first beams had not brightened the east, before he was up and dressed. He impatiently waited till breakfast was ready, and then rushed into the parlor, and took his seat at the table.

"Well Edmund, what is your hurry?" said his father.

"Oh, I must be upon the green by eight o'clock," was the reply; "and it is seven now. I would not be too late for the sail for twenty breakfasts."

"Too late for the sail," said his father: "what sail do you mean?"

"What! have you not heard about the sail that we are going to have to-day upon the pond? Almost all the boys, whom I know, are going."

"Then, Edmund, they must go without you."

If the pond had been dried up before his eyes, Edmund could not have been more mournfully surprised than he was by this reply. He looked steadfastly in his father's face for a moment, and then while his eyes were filling with tears, he inquired in a broken whisper, "Are you serious?"

"Most certainly," answered his father. "The weather looks uncertain: the pond is deep: the boat is small, and will be filled with boys. It would be unwise for me to let you go. Besides you have just recovered from a severe cold, which may be renewed by your going upon the water."

This was a most painful disappointment to poor Edmund, and he could not help expressing his sorrow and regret. His sister Marian produced all her playthings, and tried to soothe him, but she could not win from him a single smile. He stood at the window, looking silently out upon the road, and in a few moments, the party of boys, which he expected to have joined, passed by the house. Some carried baskets on their arms, and others bore fishing lines, while others were running before, and shouting with joy. William Ray, as he passed, beckoned to Edmund, who hung down his head to conceal his tears. As soon as the boys passed out of sight, he turned away in hopeless discontent.

Let us follow the boys in their excursion upon the pond. When they arrived at the water's edge, they found that the boat was about a mile distant from the place where they expected to find it. They kept on, however, over rather a disagreeable road, till they came to the boat; and then, after spending about an hour in bailing out the water, they put on board their baskets of provisions, and their fishing lines, and all embarked. A sail was soon hoisted, and a light breeze soon carried them into the middle of the pond, and they stopped to fish.

The hooks were soon baited and cast into the water and the young anglers patiently waited for the fish to bite. But though the trout seemed to nibble gloriously, they appeared singularly indifferent about swallowing the bait. Two tedious hours passed away, and not one was caught.

The boys were so intently occupied in their vocation as fishermen, that they did not notice the approach of a shower, which was blackening over their heads. A flash of lightning first made known to them the unpleasantness of their situation. At this signal they drew in their lines, and in some agitation tried to hoist the sail. But they found that the wind was too violent to permit them to do this. They had but one oar, and taking it in his hand, William Ray undertook to scull the boat ashore, but he had not went far, when a flash of lightning almost blinded his eyes and a peal of thunder rolling over head, seemed to shake the very hills. In his dismay, William unfortunately permitted the oar to slip from its place, by which accident he was, with it, pitched into the water. All the boys rose from their seats, when they beheld him fall, and in rising they jolted the boat so violently, that it was upset.

Now all was terror and confusion. Those who could swim were pulled down by those who could not. Some managed to cling hold of the boat, while others seized a log, which was fortunately floating by, and thus kept themselves from sinking. Some workmen on the opposite shore had witnessed their misfortune, and obtaining another boat, now came to their assistance. The boys were all saved from drowning, but there were some who had sunk three times, and in whom life was not far from being extinct. These were carried to a house near the shore, where they soon recovered. The other boys thought that they had better make the best of their way home. And a melancholy return it was. The rain was pouring in torrents, but this they did not mind much, after the drenching in the pond.

Now let us return to little Edmund, whom we left downcast and disconsolate, because he could not go with Billy Ray upon the pond. He wandered about the house for a long while, uttering his complaints to every one who would listen. At last it commenced raining, and the idea occurred to him it must be far more unpleasant on the pond than in the cheerful looking parlor, where he was sitting. This reflection consoled him, and he began to consider that his father was in the right. Just at that moment the clouds broke away, and the sun looked forth upon the refreshed earth with dazzling splendor. The trees tossed from their leaves the silvery drops. The little birds ventured forth, and welcomed the returning brightness with a song of delight.

Edmund opened the door and stood upon the steps, opposite to the road. Who can these boys be, whom he sees straggling along in that mournful and wo-begone plight? Their clothes are dripping with water. Some are without shoes, and some without hats. Their appearance is both melancholy and ludicrous.

'Can that be Bill Ray?' exclaimed Edmunds, as he ran down towards the road. "It is him, sure enough." And he addressed his forlorn friend in terms of condolence and inquiry.

"You look wet, William," said he; "the shower must have been pretty heavy where you were. Did you catch many fish? Come in, boys, and dry yourselves. There is a good fire on the kitchen hearth."

"No," replied William; "we had better return home as soon as possible. We were up—up—up—set in the boat, and the fish would'nt—bite—and—good bye."

The boys passed on, and Edmund stood looking after them with sincere pity and regret. He felt glad that he had escaped their misfortune, but sympathised with the downfall of their hopes, and the disastrous issue of their excursion. The circumstance did not pass off without leaving on his mind a healthful impression. He afterwards was inclined to look upon his disappointments as happening for his benefit, rather than for his injury, and whatever event might occur, console himself with the belief that it was "all for the best."

Avoid Bad Company.

Little S—— had never been known by his mother to tell a lie, or to take what did not belong to him. One afternoon in summer, as the school did not keep, his mother left him at home to play in the yard, and locking the door of the house went away for an hour or two to make some calls. While little S—— was playing by himself, a larger boy came to see him, and they played together awhile very pleasantly. At length the playmate of S—— offered to make him a kite, if he would get some paste. But this little S. said he could not do, as his mother was gone.

'What difference does that make?' said the boy.

'Why,' said little S——, 'how can I get it, if mother does not give it me?'

'Don't you know where the flour barrel is?'

'O yes, but I am afraid that she will not like it!'

'Nonsense! she won't care just for a little flour.'

'But what if she should?'

'Why, she will never know it. You can go in and get the flour, and then come right out again.'

'But what if she asks me if I have been in the house, what shall I say?'

'Tell her you played in the yard all the time she was gone.'

Now little S—— was soon over-persuaded by this bad boy, and he started off for the flour. But here was another difficulty—the door was locked. The mischievous boy, however, who had set him on at first, soon remedied the difficulty, by opening the window and boosting him in. Trembling, the little fellow went to the barrel, with his cup scooped up the flour, and hurried away without looking behind him—in his haste scattering some of it on the floor. They then went busily to work upon the kite. Before he went away, this bad playmate of little S—— told him over again what he should say, if his mother asked him any thing about the paste. It was all false, but little S—— had not learned how wicked it was to tell that which was untrue. Mrs. S—— came home and was surprised to find the floor all sprinkled with flour, and could hardily believe her little boy to have been so wicked as to have taken any thing when she was away, without liberty. She called him in. He came looking ashamed and guilty, as little boys always do when they have done wrong.

'Has my little boy,' said she, 'been into the house since I went away;'

'No,' answered he sulkily, and hung his head. O, how was his poor mother's heart grieved to hear this! Her little son had not only taken the flour without leave, but had now denied it.

'Where did you get your paste then?' said his mother.

Little S—— told the foolish and wicked story that bad boy had taught him.

'Come here, my little boy,' said Mrs. S. and she led him to the pantry, and showed him the flour that had been spilled on the floor. 'Now I know that you have been here,' said she. 'How could you tell me that you had not?'

'Henry, (the larger boy's name) told me to,' said little S——; and he now frankly related to his mother the whole scene, weeping more to see his mother so much grieved, than because he understood the wickedness of the act.

His good mother then set down and told him of the dreadful sins he had committed against God, first in disobeying his mother, then in taking what did not belong to him—and finally in telling a lie about it. After this, the little boy being now very penitent, she kneeled and prayed with him that God would forgive him and help him to do so no more.

Learn from this account of S——, children, to avoid bad companions—and expect if you do wrong, your sins will find you out; and finally remember that one fault or sin almost always makes another necessary. A little thief will generally be a little liar.

A Prayer for a Little Sunday School Child.

Saviour! assist a feeble child,
That he may gentle be and mild:
Teach him to strive, and watch, and pray;
So he may shun each evil way.
Save him from sin and Satan's power,
And guard him in temptation's hour,
Help him to keep that holy vow
Thy cross has sealed upon his brow;
So he may claim thy promise given
A bright inheritance in heaven!

The little Chimney Sweep.

One cold frosty morning, a little sweep with shivering limbs almost benumbed with cold, was seen passing from door to door asking to be admitted to a warm fire, and to be fed as he was very hungry. The cold hearted turned him away, and after being rejected at several doors, he sat down upon the steps to weep; the large tears rolled down his cheeks, and yet those who passed by cared not for his grief. It was in vain that he cast a wishful look through the mist of his tears to those who hastened along the street, in vain did he implore relief of such unfeeling strangers. While he was in that sorrowful condition, a young lady, as she was passing by, was moved to pity, and resolved on relieving him. Regardless of the sneers which her compassion called forth from the rude and hard hearted, she led him away to a place of comfort. She brought him to the fire and warmed his almost frost-bitten limbs, she gave him food to satisfy his hunger. Was not this a kind girl? Yes you will all say. Well, children, it is always best to do right, and be kind, and help such as want help. It was so in this case. She no doubt thought that if it was her brother in such circumstances, she would like to have somebody feed and warm him, and so she would do it for somebody else's brother. When he had got a little warm and satisfied his hunger, on applying the water and flesh brush to remove the black soot from his face and limbs, she was almost overcome to find that he was her own brother that had been lost. It was her turn to weep, but she wept tears of joy over him.

A Throne of Grace.—One day, while the teacher of an infant school was speaking to the children about the woman of Samaria, a gentleman present asked the following questions:

"Where shall we go to worship God?"

A little boy answered, "To a throne of grace."

"And where is a throne of grace?"

"Any where," answered the boy; "for when we kneel down to pray to God with our hearts, we are then at a throne of grace."

In the U. S. District Court, sitting at Baltimore, on Monday last, Judge Heath passed sentence upon Jason L. Pendleton, captain, and Robert Baker, first mate, of the brig Montevideo, who were indicted, tried, and convicted of a misdemeanor, as officers of said brig, in being concerned in the slave-trade on the coast of Africa. The learned Judge, upon passing sentence upon the prisoners, prefaced it with an address of great feeling, in which he reviewed all the evidence given upon the trial, and depicting in vivid colors the horrors of the slave-trade. He stated that the extent of punishment allowed by the law was two years' imprisonment in the common jail and a fine of $2,000, but in consideration of his having been already in jail six months, and the jury's recommendation to mercy the Court would only adjudge him to be confined in the common jail for a period of twelve months and to pay a fine of $1,000, and to remain imprisoned until the fine and costs be paid. The mate, Baker, was sentenced to be imprisoned six months, and to pay a fine of $500, and to remain imprisoned until the fine and costs be paid.

Animals at Peace.

"The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf, and the young lion, and fatling together, and a little child shall lead them. And the cow and the bear shall feed; their young ones shall lie down together: and the lion shall eat straw like the ox. And the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice's den. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain; for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea."

Some think that the above words, which we have quoted from the Prophet Isaiah, speak of what is called Millennium, and that there will then, not only be no war among men, but that the different animals will cease to war upon man and each other, and live together in peace without killing and eating each other as they now do. We do not know certainly how this will be, but believe a time will come when men will not fight, if dogs and cats do. The picture at the head of this article represent a fact, of animals which devour each other, having been so educated as to live together in perfect peace. The animals are kept together in a cage in London, and are seen daily by hundreds of persons.

The keeper of the collection, John Austin, states that he has employed seventeen years in this business of training creatures of opposite natures to live together in content and affection. And those years have not been unprofitably employed! It is not too much to believe, that many a person who has given his halfpenny to look upon this show, may have had his mind awakened to the extraordinary effect of habit and of gentle discipline, when he has thus seen the cat, the rat, the mouse, the hawk, the rabbit, the guinea-pig, the owl, the pigeon, the starling, and the sparrow, each enjoying, as far as can be enjoyed in confinement, its respective modes of life, in the company of the others,—the weak without fear, and the strong without the desire to injure. It is imposible to imagine any prettier exhibition of kindness than is here shown. The rabbit and the pigeon playfully contend for a lock of hay to make up their nests; the sparrow sometimes perched on the head of the cat, and sometimes on that of the owl, each its natural enemy; and the mice playing about with perfect indifference to the presence either of cat, or hawk, or owl.

We will add only a word to our young readers. If cats, and owls, and mice, can be so trained as to live together in peace, surely children should not quarrel, and especially little brothers and sisters. If you are ever tempted to quarrel again, think how it must look for you to quarrel when those animals live together in peace. And if children should not quarrel and fight, surely men should not, for they know more than children, and are stronger and will be more likely to hurt each other.

Happy Deaths of Greenland Converts.

Greenland is a bitter cold country, on the Eastern coast of North America. The Moravians are the only Christians who send missionaries to the Greenlanders. It was their first missionary station, and they have kept it through many trials and difficulties for one hundred and ten years.

Late accounts from the missionaries in Greenland state that the people have been visited by a most painful disease, unknown there before, and of which many of the people died. Those who were seized by it were in great pain; their hands swelled and then broke out in ulcers.

The missionaries could not find out any medicine to do them any good. Two of those who died, died very happily. One of them was asked if he should rejoice to see his Saviour. He answered, "I have more need to be ashamed before him, because of my unworthiness; but I do rejoice, for I know he loves me." The other, just as he was dying, raised himself up in his bed, and smiling with joy, exclaimed, "They are come: the angels have come to fetch away my soul! Gently, gently, that I, a poor creature, may be able to follow you!" and then breathed his last.

[Youth's Missionary Rec.

Planting a Man.—The State of Maryland has buried a living man, that has in him the life-producing principles of liberty. They thought thereby to make both him and his principle rot in oblivion. How they came out you may see in the following article, from the Port Tobacco Times, of last week:—

"Last Saturday night, or early Sunday morning, some seventy or eighty, and perhaps more, as it is impossible to ascertain the correct number, negroes absconded from this vicinity. They went off without any provocation, and on the part of their owners, the least suspicion. There is, from what we learn, not the least doubt but this move has been some time brewing, and it appears up to the time of some of them leaving their masters' premises on Saturday afternoon—their usual holiday—they had not the remotest idea of running away at the time they did. A gentleman residing about six miles from this village had every negro on his place except two of the gang. This is the second gang that has left this county within a few weeks, and we fear if some mode is not fallen upon to put a stop to it, our planters will have a beggarly number to gather their crops. There seems to be a strange and singular spirit come over this portion of our population of late."

They "went off without any provocation"—and "there seems to be a strange and singular spirit come over this portion" of the people of Maryland—and there is even a serious apprehension that the planters "will have a beggarly number" of laborers left to "gather their crops."

This is very remarkable! But we can explain it all—it is only Torrey going to seed!

Their papers, in abusing Torrey and the abolitionists, have told what Torrey is imprisoned for, and that he is punished as the agent of others whom they can't catch. All the negroes understand this. There is the whole story.

Pretty Names.—The women of Seneca tribe have some pleasant and really poetical names—as Rose-on-the-bush, Soft air, Welcome home, Summer-bud, Bird at night, Sweet-valley-bush, Wind-on-wings, Young-fawn, Lark-in-the-morning, Maple-bud, &c.

Industry.

The picture above, is a representation of industry. When persons work as constantly and as fast as they can consistently with their strenth and health, they are said to be industrious. We say that the picture is a representation of industry because all in it are represented as doing something. There is a woman spinning at her little wheel, a man at work with some sort of machinery, another in the corner at work with a hammer; perhaps he is a young blacksmith; another at work at the bottom of the picture, who we think must be making baskets, for we cannot tell what else he is doing. Now children, you may examine, and see if you can find out what they are all doing. Certain it is they are all doing something.

We will conclude this little article by giving a receipe for the cure of those children who are inclined to be lazy.

RECEIPE.

A little less indulgence in the bed,
A little more contrivance in the head,
A little more devotion in the mind,
Will cure the boy to laziness inclined.

Anecdote of a Canary Bird.—A gentleman in Harrisburg, (Pa.), had a canary bird, and it was a fine singer. A parrot, in a cage, was brought by some one into the same room; but as soon as Poll struck up her harsh notes, the other bird ceased to sing, and continued silent for a considerable time, and even until it was removed to a part of the house where the parrot could not be heard. After a while, it began to sing again. The parrot was then brought in the room; but, as before, when she uttered her cry, the canary ceased; and was never heard to sing from that time to its death, which occurred in two or three months afterwards. Let noisy children remember this. [Penny Gazette.

Christian Courage.—When Valens, the emperor, sent messengers to win Eusebius to heresy, by fair words and large promises, he answered. "Alas, sir! these speeches are fit to catch little children." When the emperor threatened to confiscate his goods, to torment, to banish, or to kill him, he answered, "He needs not fear confiscation who has nothing to lose; nor banishment, to whom heaven alone is his country; nor torments, when his body will be destroyed at one blow; nor death, which is the only way to set him at liberty from sin and sorrow."

An Albany barber, having a very intemperate man to shave on the Sabbath, begged him to keep his mouth shut, as it was a punishable offence to keep open a rum hole on the Sabbath.

Forgiveness.—A man who had been insulted by another, asked his friend, if he thought it would be manly to resent it. "Yes," said his friend, "it would be manly to resent and revenge it, but it would be God-like to forgive it."

The Sabbath Recorder.

EDITED BY GEORGE B. UTTER. "THE SEVENTH DAY IS THE SABBATH OF THE LORD THY GOD." PUBLISHED AT NO. 9 SPRUCE ST.

VOL. II—NO. 10. NEW YORK, FIFTH-DAY, AUGUST 28, 1845. WHOLE NO. 62.

The Sabbath Recorder.

THE WRONGS OF AFRICA.

The following address was written by HENRY HIGHLAND GARNET, of Troy, N. Y., a colored man, and an able and zealous defender of his down-trodden race. Who can read it without having his spirit stirred within him—without resolving to exert himself to the utmost for the redress of Africa's many wrongs?

Fellow Citizens of the United States:

The Father of Mercies has given us an inheritance in a goodly land, and has scattered unnumbered blessings around us. He has given us a pleasant sky, and caused our fields to yield their fruits in abundance. The character of our institutions is such, that intelligence is disseminated among the majority of the people. The Bible is placed in the hands of the free, and by an almost unanimous consent it is used as a school book. That sacred volume declares that "God is no respector of persons," and that "He has made of one blood all people." In this land there are but a few who are unacquainted with the Declaration of American Independence, a paper which, in point of just sentiments, is held in respect next to the Bible, because it draws its leading principles from that book.

Here in this favored land, are thousands of ministers professing to be disciples of Him whose advent was to bring peace on earth and good will to men. From every valley I hear the voice of prayer, and songs of Zion ascending. There are a million of hearts among us that sympathize with the oppressed of every class in foreign lands. Uncounted treasures heve been properly expended for the evangelization of the heathen abroad. When modern Greece stirred up her quenchless fires on the fields which had witnessed the exploits of her sons, when her name was potent, the American people hailed the event with joy. When Poland raised her arms against her oppressors, every heart wished her success, and when she could no longer contend against an unequal foe, you welcomed her exiled sons to your freer and more peaceful shores. You can point to the fields that have witnessed the most victorious achievements of our armies in the revolution. In the bosom of this soil rest the ashes of Patrick Henry and Thomas Jefferson, and here are the tombs of Franklin, Adams, and Washington. So certain are we that we have a superiority over all other people, that we have thrown aside a becoming modesty and declared ourselves the freest nation of the earth.

But, fellow citizens, look at the truth. In the name of my brethren I entreat you not to turn from it with scorn, but view it calmly and fairly, however humiliating it may be to your national pride.

There are at this moment three millions of slaves in the United States. Merciful God, what a vast number is this! Our proud New England does not contain more inhabitants. Besides this number in actual slavery, there are more than a half million of people of color in the non-slave-holding States, who are, in one way or other proscribed by law or abused by prejudice. Thus this government has placed its feet upon the neck of three and a half millions of Africa-Americans. Where there has been one tear shed in consequence of the oppression of our mother country, or the perils of the revolution, there have been a thousand shed on account of the bitterness of that slavery which you tolerate. And for every drop of blood poured out in defence of American liberty, you can be pointed to streams drawn from the lacerated bodies of the descendants of Africa.

During these three hundred and twenty-five years, we have been doomed to suffer in this land all the cruelties common to a system of oppression, which in regard to wickedness, is not equalled by any in the world.

In consequence of this condition, a mighty overwhelming current of prejudice has set against us.

My brethren, many of whom are members of the Church of Christ, are sold like beasts in the shambles, and every tie of relationship is ruthlessly torn assunder.

Sons have been compelled to behold the mothers who bore them, withering beneath the lash; aye, and more, they have sometimes been forced to apply the scourge on the labor-broken frames of their aged parents.

Our sisters, daughters, and wives have been driven into prostitution and concubinage, and their unhappy offspring have been sold by their unfeeling fathers; and in order to prevent these children from pleading the privileges of their Anglo-Saxon blood, the American slave laws declare that the child shall follow the condition of its mother!

The Holy Bible is a sealed book to all the enslaved, with a few exceptions. Hence they are the most unfortunate of all heathens. They sit in darkness while light surrounds them. They die of thirst while streams of salvation are flowing through the land.

In some parts of the country the most systematic efforts have been made to keep us in intellectual darkness; and the reason urged in favor of this course is, that knowledge would reveal our condition to us more plainly, and would therefore make us discontented.

Slaveholders and their apologists, say that we are ignorant and unprepared for freedom, and still they punish with imprisonment and death every attempt to prepare!

Our children who are born from day to day, and who might have as fair opportunity as any others to fill the most useful spheres in life, are thrown into the same ocean of degradation in which their father's rights have been engulfed.

The vast amount of mind which is crushed by the slavery maintained in this country, is the most fearful part of the system. It has deprived the land of at least two thousand educated ministers.

It has robbed us of our due proportion of professional men—physicians, lawyers, legislators, merchants, poets and philosophers.

It has kept from the heathen three hundred missionaries.

It has given rise to prejudice, which proscribes us in church and in state.

All these iniquities are sanctioned by many of the professing Christians, and by many of the ministers of the land.

The government of the country is likewise against us, and the degration of this class of American citizens is considered by our national law makers to be an object of their highest ambition.

We complain that members of the church and ministers thereof, many of whom are slaveholders, and dealers, and slavebreeders—are held in fellowship by the non-slaveholding portion of the church notwithstanding it is generally acknowledged that their deeds are evil.

We complain that this connection with sin hinders the growth of pure and undefiled religion, and exposes the church to the ridicule of infidels.

We complain that those who sit in Moses' seat do not rebuke this sin in the spirit of Jesus Christ—but rather cry Peace, peace, where there is no peace.

We complain that the course of a large portion of the church furnishes the state with an excuse for the wrongs which it inflicts upon us.

We complain that we are subjected to all these misfortunes and oppressions, without any crime whatever. Yes, we are hated without a cause!

In the name of humanity—for the sake of justice—in view of an approaching judgment—and in the name of an eternal God, we demand redress for these wrongs.

From the N. Y. Evangelist.

THE MISSIONARY—A SAILOR STORY.

BY REV. JOHN S. C. ABBOTT.

The following story a seaman recently related to the writer. Many years ago, when New Zealand was a land of uninterrupted heathenism, the ship in which I was a common sailor dropped anchor at a cautious distance from the shore, in one of the harbors of that island. We had been months upon the ocean, without seeing any land. And when the sublime mountains and luxuriant vallies of that magnificent isle rose from the wide waste of waters before us, it was difficult to realize that we were not approaching some region of fairy enchantment. We soon, however, found that we were still in this world of sin and wo, for it so happened that there was a terrible fight between two war parties of the natives raging at the very hour which we entered the lovely bay.—From the deck of our ship we witnessed with awe the whole revolting scene, the fierce assault, the bloody carnage, the infuriated shrieks, the demoniac attitudes of those maddened savages as they fell upon each other with a degree of fury which seemed worse than human. Often we saw the heavy club of the New Zealand savage fall upon the head of his antagonist, and as he fell lifeless to the ground, his head was beaten by reiterated blows, till exhaustion satiated fury. This awful scene of savage life as beheld from the deck of our ship, impressed even us unthinking sailors with emotions of deepest melancholy.

In consequence of the war, or for some other cause, no canoe from the shore approached our ship. As we were entirely destitute of wood, we sent a boat's crew, with many cautions as to safety, to the opposite side of the harbor to collect some fuel. I was sent with this party. We landed upon a beautiful beach, upon which a heavy surf was rolling. The savage scene we had just witnessed, so filled us with terror, that we were every moment apprehensive that a party of cannibals would fall upon us and destroy us. After gathering wood for some time we returned to the boat, and found to our dismay that the surf rolling in upon the beach had so increased, that it was impossible to launch the boat. The sun was just setting behind angry clouds which betokened a rising storm. The crested waves were rolling more and more heavily in from the ocean. A dark night was coming on, and savage warriors, their hands already dripping with blood, were everywhere around. We were all silent. No one was willing to speak of fears, and yet no one could conceal them.

Before we left the ship, the captain had informed us that an English missionary had erected his hut about two miles from the place where we were to land. The captain had visited him about two years before in his solitary home, and it was then very uncertain whether he would be able to continue in his post of danger. We immediately resolved to endeavor to find the missionary, and to seek such protection as he could afford us for the night.

Increasing masses of clouds rolled up and spread over the sky; and as we groped our way through the deep and tangled forest, darkness like that of Egypt enveloped us. After wandering about, we hardly knew where, for some time, we heard the loud shouts of savages either in conflict or in revelry. Cautiously we approached the sounds, till we beheld a large war party gathered around their fires, with the hideous trophies of their recent battle, and exulting over their victory.—We thought it wise to keep as far from them as possible, and again turned from the light of their fire into the dark forest, where we could hardly see an arm's length from us. We at length came upon a little path, and slowly following it along, stumbling in the darkness, over rocks and roots of trees, we came in view of the twinkling light of a lamp. I, with another one of the party, was sent forward to reconnoitre. We soon found that the light proceeded from a hut, but whether from the night-fire of a savage New Zealander, or from the lamp of a Christian missionary, we knew not; and few can imagine the anxiety with which we cautiously moved along to ascertain how the fact might be. Our hopes were greatly revived by the sight of a glazed window. And when, through that window, we saw a man in the garb of civilized life, with his wife and one child, kneeling in their evening prayers, our joy knew no bounds. Waiting a few moments till the prayer was closed, we entered the door, and though the surprise of the inmates was very great in seeing two white sailors enter their dwelling, we were most hospitably received. The missionary immediately lighted his lantern, and proceeding with us, led the rest of our party to his humble abode. We all slept upon his floor for the night. Weary, however, as I was, I found but little rest. I thought of my quiet New England home, from which I had been absent but a few months. I thought of my mother, and her anxiety about her sailor boy in this his first voyage. The scene was indeed a novel one to me. The swelling winds of the tempestuous night, the wild scenes of man and nature all around us, the vivid image of the bloody conflict, with the remembrance its hideous and fiend-like outcries, all united so to oppress my spirit that I found but little repose. My companions, however, perhaps more accustomed to danger, and perhaps less addicted to thought, were soundly asleep.

Early in the morning a party of warriors came to the missionary's hut in search of us, having somehow ascertained that a boat's crew were on the shore. The missionary and his wife, both in countenance and manner, manifested the deepest anxiety for our safety. The savages were imperious and rude, and it seemed to me then, that nothing but the restraining power of God preserved his family uninjured in the midst of such cruel and treacherous men. While they had been somewhat subdued in spirit, by the kindness, the meekness, and the utter helplessness of the missionary's family, they considered us sailors fair game for plunder and abuse. By the most earnest solicitations on the part of the missionary, they were induced to spare us. The missionary accompanied us to our boat and we had, for our retinue, a troop of rioting and carousing savages, brandishing their bloody war clubs over our heads, to convince us that we were in their power. A walk of two miles conducted us to the beach. It was a fearful walk, and the watchful anxiety of our friend proved that he considered our danger to be great. When we arrived at the beach, some of the natives manifested great reluctance to let us go. Some took hold of our boat to draw it further upon the land, while they seemed to be earnestly arguing with the rest upon the folly of permitting our escape. At length, however, they yielded to the remonstrances of the missionary, and aided us in launching our boat, through the now subsiding surf.

As we rowed from the shore, and I looked back upon that devoted man, standing upon the beach in the midst of these rude savages, and thought of his return to his solitary home, and of the days, weeks, and months he must there pass in thankless labors, I thought his lot was, in a worldly point of view, one of the hardest I had ever known; and I wondered that any man could be so hard-hearted as to speak in terms of reproach, and point the finger of scorn towards the Christian missionary.

In my last voyage, about two years ago, I again entered this same harbor. It is now called the Bay of Islands, and is one of the most beautiful places in natural scenery on the surface of the globe. I could hardly credit my eyes as I looked out upon a handsome and thrifty town, with many dwellings indicative of wealth and elegance. There were churches of tasteful architecture, and school children with their slates and books. And there were to be seen New Zealand families dwelling in cheerful parlors, sanctified by morning prayers and evening hymns. The untiring labors of the missionary had through God's blessing created a new world. And the emotions of deep compassion with which I had regarded him, when we left him on the beach alone with the savages, were transformed into sentiments of admiration and almost envy in view of his achievements. All other labors seemed trivial compared with his. And I then felt, and still feel, that if any man can lie down with joy upon a dying bed, it is he who can look back upon a life successfully devoted to raising a savage people to the comforts, refinements and virtues of a Christian life.

PREACHING THE GOSPEL.

'I do not wish for any heaven on earth, besides that of preaching the precious gospel of Jesus Christ to immortal souls.'

'How does your church come on?' said Eusebius.

'We are much encouraged,' said Menander.

E. 'I am much surprsed at that. Your pastor is a man of moderate talents, and imperfect education; while ours is acknowledged to be the ablest and most learned man in the Presbytery, and yet the additions to our church have not equaled the deaths for five years. How do you explain this matter?'

M. 'I do not know that I can explain it. God bestows his gifts as he will, and never gives account of himself. Your pastor is an able preacher. We all love to hear him when he visits us. But without knowing his habits, or censuring him in anything, I will tell you how our pastor seems to me to excel most men.'

E. 'I shall be glad to hear you.'

M. 'Our pastor greatly loves his work, and is always doing something that belongs to his office. If he cannot visit one of us in affliction he writes a letter or sends a tract or book to us. When he has preached to us on Sabbath, he has just begun his week's work. If he is doing nothing else he is studying his Bible.'

E. 'But did he not notice the transit of Mercury? Our minister talked of it for days.'

M. 'Our pastor said to me the other day that he supposed learned men would be busy that day in in making observations in the heavens; but that he had not the instruments, or the science, or the time, to render such observations useful or proper for him. He wrote a good part of the morning and spent the rest of the day visiting some poor families. It was well he did, for he found a man dying and his family in great distress. It is thought that one of the family will soon join our church.'

E. 'But does your pastor take no time for recreation?'

M. 'Yes, he recreates himself by varying the course of his studies and labors. He says that heaven will be the best resting places. Besides he says, if an axe be dull you must use it the more diligently. So that now by God's blessing, I believe ours is truly prosperous church. The Sabbath school is large, the prayer meetings well attended, everything seems to be improving.

[Watchman of the South.

YOUNG HENRY MARTYN.

The father of Henry Martyn was a poor miner in the mountains of Cornwall. By a proper economy of all the leisure hours which his arduous life afforded, he acquired a sufficient knowledge of arithmetic to fit him for the counting room, and he was admitted as chief clerk in the establishment of a merchant of Truro. With his enlarged means he determined to afford his family the advantages of education. Among his children there was one pale slender boy, who was remarkable for the natural softness of his spirit, for the warmth of his feelings, and for his ardent thirst for literary acquirements. This diffident boy, whom the neighbors all pronounced to be a "lad of promising abilities," his father determined to prepare for the University.

At the school of Truro, young Martyn was proverbial among his companions for his amiable and inoffensive spirit, though he gave no evidence of the slightest religious impression. At the age of seventeen he entered the University of Cambridge, where he soon distinguished himself by his proficiency in mathematics. His studies occupied the most of his time, but he had a pious and faithful friend, who at every opportunity pressed the subject of religion upon his conscience. He had also a praying father at home, and a favorite sister, a girl "of a meek and quiet spirit," who was earnest in her labors for his soul's salvation—but he says himself that "the sound of the gospel conveyed even in the admonition of a sister, was grating to his ears." The death of his father seems to have awakened the first serious thoughts in his mind, and the faithful preaching and prayers of Charles Simeon, then a professor in the University, were blessed to his conversion.

THE SAILOR HOME AT LAST.

BY REV. JOHN DOWLING.

It was in the winter of 1842, and during an interesting revival of religion in a New England congregation, of which the writer was then pastor, that a pious father rose nearly at the close of an evening meeting, and spoke, in substance, as follows:—"Brethren, I wish you to pray for my first-born son; he has been a wild and wayward youth, but the child of many prayers. For the last eight or ten years, that is, from the age of thirteen, he has been a wanderer on the deep; he has passed through many perils and hardships, sometimes been brought to the very brink of the grave; but an unseen hand has preserved him. Till within a few days, he has continued careless and indifferent to the concerns of his soul; but at length his mind seems tender, and we have begun to hope that the spirit of God is at work on his heart. But, brethren, to-morrow he sails, as an officer of a ship, for China; and exposed as he will be to the temptations of a sailor's life, I tremble for his welfare. Brethren, pray for my first-born son!"

On that evening, many a heartfelt prayer ascended to God for the sailor son, in which the praying father most heartily joined; but the object of those prayers sailed on the morrow, without a hope.

* * * * *

Months rolled away, and still the prayers of a father and a mother followed that wanderer on the ocean wave, and hope was mingled with anxiety, doubt, and suspense. A year had passed away, and that father was permitted to exclaim, 'Brethren, reloice with me; my son which was dead is alive again, he was lost and is found.' A letter had arrived, with the joyful news that he had found the pearl of great price, and had been baptized in China, by the Rev. Mr. Shuck, a Baptist missionary from America. 'Oh,' said he, in this letter, 'I have indeed rolled sin as a sweet morsel under my tongue, but God's protecting hand has been over me for good.' Then, after referring to the day of his baptism, 'Oh, it was a day of days to my soul! A lovely pleasant morning, and I did feel such a sweet peace; a peace that the unregenerated know nothing of. Since then I have literally, like the Eunuch, gone on my way rejoicing.' A few weeks longer, and the wanderer had returned, and in the circle of his friends and home was permitted to

* * tell to sinners round
What a dear Saviour he had found.

Two years more rolled away; and now the child of many prayers, the Christian sailor, under the parental roof, was seen gradually sinking beneath the wasting influence of consumption. A milder climate was sought, to arrest or to retard the progress of decay. But in vain. The sailor returned home—TO DIE. For a few days, and only for a few, was he permitted to linger on earth—and they were days of sadness—days of tears—and yet they were days of joy—of sweet and holy remembrances. Peaceful, and calm, and happy, as the gentle slumbers of childhood on a mother's breast, was the death-bed of the sailor. He had long been tossed amidst the tempest and the storm, and had often had his heart leap at the cry from the top-mast, "Land ahead!" and now he was just at the end of his voyage, his eye was on the port, and he could feel that there was 'land ahead.'

As I heard, but a few days since from the quivering lips of a tender sister, the tale of the more than peaceful, the triumphant departure of her sailor brother, I thought of the language in which a poet has described the death-bed scene of a 'brother of the ocean.

* * * *

His heart was on the shore,
Where holy brethren meet at last,
And storms are heard no more.

I gently pressed his feeble hand,
So soon to turn to clay;
And wondered if his heart was manned,
To meet that dreadful day;
When, as if in my looks he read
The thought, he cried out, 'LAND AHEAD!'

Oh, he could see beyond the skies,
Beyond the grave could see,
Where mansions of salvation else,
For such poor worms as he;
And calmly trod the path that led
Up straightway to that 'land ahead.'

Farewell to thee, mariner. Thy last voyage is ended. Thou hast reached the haven of eternal rest—the port of endless peace. THE SAILOR IS AT HOME AT LAST.

HEROIC PERSEVERANCE.

AN ANECDOTE OF AUDUBON.

"An accident which happened to two hundred of my original drawings, nearly put a stop to my researches in Ornithology. I shall relate it, merely to show how far enthusiasm—for by no other name can I call the persevering zeal with which I labored—may enable the observer of nature to surmount the most disheartening obstacles. I left the village of Henderson, in Kentucky, situated on the banks of the Ohio, where I resided for several years, to proceed to Philadelphia on business. I looked to all my drawings, before my departure, placed them carefully in a wooden box, and gave them in charge to a relative, with injunctions to see that no injury should happen to them. My absence was of several months; and when I returned, after having enjoyed the pleasure of home for a few days, I inquired after my box, and what I was pleased to call my treasure. The box was produced, and opened;—but, reader, feel for me—a pair of Norway rats had taken possession of the whole, and had reared a young family among the gnawed bits of paper, which, but a few months before, represented nearly a thousand inhabitants of the air! The burning heat which instantly rushed through my brain was too great to be endured, without affecting the whole of my nervous system. I slept not for several nights, and the days passed like days of oblivion,—until the animal powers being recalled into action, through the strength of my constitution, I took up my gun, my note-book, and my pencils, and went forth to the woods as gaily as if nothing had happened. I felt pleased that I might now make better drawings than before; and ere a period not exceeding three years had elapsed, I had my port-folio filled again."

FEASTING AT FUNERALS.

Mrs. Grant of Laggan in Scotland, in her essays, relates some singular circumstances concerning the Highland customs previous to the year 1745. It seems, that the pious Scots, had what we of the present age would consider a very singular method of manifesting their resignation to the will of the Lord, on the death of any of their families. As soon as the first burst of grief had subsided after death had done his work, the father of the family selected his best lamb, or kid, and had it dressed in goodly style for the wake—the relations, and neighbors were invited, the musicians were in attendance, and the father of the family opened the dance, with tears streaming from his eyes; after this followed a feast of good things. The whole ceremony was to manifest resignation to the will of God and to repress a murmuring disposition.

With us Americans, especially in the country, a different custom prevailed in time gone by. The friends and neighbors were invited to the funeral, and before they left the house, were treated very bountifully to what was termed good cheer. Gentlemen, and clergymen who might be in attendance, were supplied with one or more glasses of brandy, plebeians with whiskey, and females had a decent glass of wine, or cordial; this, it was supposed was a necessary act of courtesy, and enabled the funeral attenders to endure the heat, if in summer, and the cold if in winter, and moreover, it put them in a good tender mood to hear the funeral sermon; the clergyman also, by the stimulant received, was enabled to speak with greater force, and volubility. In vicinities where a degree of German influence prevailed, the age of the deceased was read—after the conclusion of the sermon, the whole neighborhood were invited to return to the house for refreshment;—they generally returned, and many gourmands would travel miles out of their direct road home, out of respect, to their eating and drinking propensities. Had a stranger dropt in among the greedy eaters, he would certainly have imagined he had blundered among wedding guests, or a national celebration.

OBSEQUIES OF A LOST SOUL.—"What," says Hall, "were it lawful to indulge in such a thought, would be the funeral obsequies of a lost soul? Where should we find tears fit to be wept at such a spectacle? Or would we realize the calamity in all its extent, what tokens of commiseration and concern would be equal to the occasion? Would it suffice for the sun to hide its light, and the moon her brightness?—to cover the sea with mourning, and the heavens with sackcloth? Or were the whole fabric of nature to become vocal, would it be possible for it to utter a groan too deep, or a cry too piercing to express the magnitude and extent of such a catastrophe?

PERMANENT AND TRANSIENT PASTORAL RELATIONS.

A great change has taken place within a few years in the duration and estimation of the pastoral relation. Many persons can remember the time when the choice of a pastor was generally preceded by a season of fasting and prayer, and when his entrance upon the office was considered permanent, and deemed one of the most important events in the history of a community. But now it is quite common for churches to employ a pastor for a single year, and to discuss the question of continuing him longer among them with feelings very similar to those with which they would talk about dismissing or hiring a bell-ringer or fire-maker for the meeting-house. The natural consequence is, that a corresponding change takes place in the estimation in which the pastoral relation is held, both by pastor and people. It is bereft of that sacredness and solemnity which was formerly attached to it, and is regarded more as a social than a religious relation.

Many causes have combined to produce this change. In some cases, a preacher has been settled in a church, who is neither disposed to perform the duties of a pastor, nor to encourage the call of a person who will perform them; hence the church has been driven to the expedient of hiring a preacher for a few months at a time, until that practice has become established. In other cases, perhaps the pastor has been inadequate to his work, and unable to edify and instruct a congregation for a long time, or he has been too indolent to prosecute his necessary studies, or too roving in his disposition to feel settled in any place, or too ambitious to be satisfied with his present attainments. These causes combining have often broken up the pastoral relation where the whole blame could not be attached to any one party. But there is a more common and blameable cause of separation often found in the church itself. Perhaps a few individuals have become dissatisfied with the pastor's course in some respects; they begin to whisper about their dissatisfaction, and to hint the advantages which might result from a change; the people, ever eager for something new, listen favorably to the proposal; at length a sentiment is created so strongly averse to the existing arrangement, that the minister cuts the matter short by throwing in his resignation. It is a very easy thing for any person, of common skill and address, who should set himself about a work of this kind, soon to accomplish his object in a church where the principle of independence is practically acknowledged. Too many cases of the kind have occurred to admit of a doubt on this point. They ought to put churches on their guard against the efforts of designing men, whether those efforts are made under the pretence of interest for the church or of mere personal feeling.

The consequences of such frequent changes of the pastoral relation, are often most lamentable. The prospect of a speedy change tends invariably to make the pastor superficial, negligent of his studies, and satisfied to dwell upon a limited number of subjects with which he has become familiar. It prevents his adopting any enlarged plans to advance the permanent interests of the church and community. It makes him comparatively careless of his reputation and influence, since he must soon remove to a new field. In short, it renders it impossible for him to lay himself out with that encouragement, and that feeling of individual responsibility, which is constantly before the permanent pastor. Nor does the evil end with the pastor; the church suffers to an equal, if not still greater, extent. The people come to love change, to live upon excitement, and to be satisfied with the mere sparkling froth of religious declamation instead of the strong meat of sound doctrine. A sort of artificial piety grows up among them, which is about as ephemeral and variable as the instrumentality by which it was excited. The discipline of the church is either wholly neglected, or never thoroughly carried out. Indeed the whole church often becomes so completely conformed to the world as to lose whatever influence for good it ever exerted.

It is a question of vast moment to decide how these evils may be remedied. To settle the preachers invariably for life, would undoubtedly increase rather than diminish them. To take the power of choosing or dismissing the minister away from the people, and vest it in bishops or presbyters, would not help us. The remedy must be applied by the people themselves in order to be effectual. They must learn to seek and prize instructive preachers more than those who minister mainly to excitement. They must become better acquainted with them before their settlements. They must be more unanimous in calling them, and not satisfied to call a man by a mere majority. Above all, they must determine, when a man is called to sustain the pastoral relation among them, that his settlement shall be permanent, useful, and happy. With this determination consistently carried out, without listening to the insinuations of those who would unsettle or break up the sacred relation between pastor and people, we think there will be little danger that a faithful preacher will make frequent changes.

Permanent Ministry.—In these days of frequent ministerial changes, it does one good to meet with an instance of permanency in the ministry. At Hartford, Ct., there is a church which was organized more than two hundred years ago, and has never yet dismissed a pastor. Its present pastor, Dr. Hawes, has filled the office twenty-eight years with constantly increasing usefulness, and bids fair to continue his labors for some time to come. In New York, Dr. Spring, pastor of the Brick Presbyterian Church has been settled over the people of his charge thirty-five years, and a few weeks ago preached his thirty-fifth anniversary sermon, the character of which shows clearly that he is far from being "too old to be useful."

The Case of Maxson vs. Annas.—Just as we were going to press, we received a letter from Bro. John Maxson, dated at Morrisville, the county seat of Madison, August 23d, informing us, that on the preceding day he was arrested under a Cassar, and taken to that place for imprisonment. It seems that in legal cases like the one in which he has been engaged, the losing party is liable to be imprisoned for the costs if they are not paid forthwith, notwithstanding he may have property lying exposed to the value of ten times the costs. In this instance the Cassar was taken out, not for want of property to satisfy an execution, but for the gratification, we fear, of a feeling with which most men are alas too familiar. The process does not admit of taking property, but only the body; hence Mr. Maxson was allowed only a minute to make up his mind either at once to pay over the money, or to proceed immediately to prison. The result is, that he is now incarcerated for a debt which he has incurred in consequence of trusting to the protection of a law which was regarded as all-sufficient. We have not time now for comments, and they would be useless if we had. The facts are before you, friends; and we trust that not many days will be suffered to pass before the means are provided to liquidate a debt of nearly two hundred dollars which has already been incurred.

ON THE FIRST DAY OF THE WEEK.

In the primitive days of the Gospel, it seems to have been the practice of Christians to lay by in store for the benevolent purposes of the Gospel, according as God had prospered every man. Do not some of our brethren, who are bitterly objecting to removing the old land-marks, forget that this is one of them? Brethren, let us ask for the old paths, and walk in the good old way. The apostles, and our Saviour himself, had a system, and the laying by in store on the first day of the week, seems to us as systematic as the cent-a-week system among us for the cause of missions. If this is the true gospel-benevolence, let us adopt it; and let the good conscientious brother who is doing nothing for missions, now begin to be slow for removing the old land-marks. To lay by in store for benevolent purposes, and to hoard up in miserly selfishness, are two very different things. God is opening the world to missionary labor. Never was there a time that more loudly called on the church for action and prayer.

[Morning Star.

☞ A most admirable old custom was that, and one which we should be right glad to see restored. It was thought fit by the apostle, that after having enjoyed the rest of the Sabbath, and before entering upon the duties of the new week, the early Christians should lay by them in store according as God had prospered them. What better time to look over their affairs, and make the proper appropriations for benevolent purposes? But alas, in this day so much is said about the sacred and sabbatic character of the first day of the week, that many persons dare not think of their worldly affairs enough on that day to see how God has prospered them. It was not so in the apostle's day, who gave the command. Nor was it so in St. Jerome's day, who approved the course of lady Paula and her maidens in returning to their work after the morning meeting on the first day. We long for the return of those good old times, when men shall not only keep the Sabbath, but shall lay by them in store on the first day of the week according as God has prospered them.

Church of England Missionary College.—In view of the want of an adequate supply of ministers duly prepared by special training to labor with effect in the dependencies of the British Empire, it has been determined to found a Missionary College, for the purpose of educating young men for service in foreign settlements, with such strict regard to economy and frugality of habits as shall fit them for the special duties to be discharged, the difficulties to be encountered, and the hardships to be endured. London has been chosen as its site, and a large sum has already been collected towards the erection of the buildings. The institution is to be endowed and supported mainly by free contributions.

France.—The sum paid by the French government for the support of religious worship, is stated by the 'Presse' to be 37,684,350 francs. Of this the Romanists receive 36,318,900 francs; Protestants, 1,255,050 francs—Jews, 11,400f.

Revivals.—In the Christian Index we find notices of several recent revivals in Georgia. At one of them, twenty-one persons were added to the church by baptism; at another eighteen; and at a third eight.

The General Conference.—In reply to the many inquiries whether we will attend the General Conference, we have to say, that much as we desire to be present, our business arrangements are such as to render it impossible. We hope, however, to publish an early and full account of the proceedings of that body; and shall rely upon Eld. Wm. B. Maxson, who is to be present, to prepare or secure the preparation of such account of the proceedings.

☞ Immediately after issuing our last paper the editor left the city for a few days, and only returned in time to send the last form of the present number to press. If any apology is needed for the hasty manner in which it is thrown together, he trusts this will be deemed sufficient.

For the Sabbath Recorder.

APPROVING THINGS THAT ARE EXCELLENT.

"And this I pray, that your love may abound yet more and more in knowledge, and in all judgment; that ye may approve things that are excellent; that ye may be sincere, and without offence, till the day of Christ." Phil. 1: 9, 10.

We were reminded of this apostolic prayer for the Phillippian Church, while reading the "Second Annual Report of the American and Foreign Sabbath Union," and were led to desire that it may be accomplished in us, and in all the seventh-day brethren into whose hands the Report and Permanent Sabbath Documents may chance to fall.

The Report contains twenty-five propositions, designed to show the importance of Sabbath-keeping; extracts from letters and addresses of twelve distinguished men of this country, who advocate the cause of the Sabbath Union; an account of the Annual Meeting held at Boston; three addresses from the National Sabbath Convention held at Baltimore; twenty-one resolutions adopted by that body; letters from Judge Hornblower of N. J., Professor Schmucker of Gettysburg, Pa., Chancellor Walworth of N. Y., and Theodore Frelinghuysen, Chancellor of the New York University.

From the excellent things contained in these documents, we extract the following truthful and important propositions, which we present a little transposed from the order in which they appear in the above Report, for the sake of showing their striking agreement with the views of God's holy law, advocated in the publications of the American Sabbath Tract Society, and in the Sabbath Recorder.

Proposition 1st. "Six days in a week were appointed for labor, and attention to secular concerns; and one day for rest and devotion, especially for the worship of God, and the promotion of the spiritual good of men. 'Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy. Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work.'"

2d. "This division of time into six days for labor and secular concerns, and one for rest and spiritual duties, was not an arbitrary arrangement; but was based on the nature of things; was required by the glory of God, and the highest good of men; had its origin in the conduct and will of God; and was indicated and sanctified by his own high and holy example. 'In six days Jehovah made heaven and earth, the sea and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day, wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath day, and hallowed it.' Ex. 20: 11. That is, he set it apart for a special and peculiar purpose. And blessed it for the end for which it was made, and to which it was devoted."

3d. "To this example of Jehovah, he himself appeals (in the fourth commandment) as a reason why men should confine their secular business to six days in a week, and should remember and keep holy the Sabbath."

4th. "The reason why he wrote this law among the other nine fundamental, permanent, universal, moral laws, was, it was like them. And it was placed there, that its nature and character might be known. It was in accordance with the great law maxim. 'Noscitur a Sociis'—it is known by its associates. Like them, it is a fundamental, permanent, universal, moral law."

5th. "The Sabbath is the great institution for keeping alive the knowledge of the one living and true God, and thus giving efficacy to his moral government among men. The Sabbath was made by God, set apart, and given to men, as a special season for the communication and attainment of this knowledge. And it holds a relation to general morality, similar to that which the marriage institution holds to social purity. Neither the one nor the other can be disregarded, without opening the way for universal wickedness."

6th. "Very few who have regularly kept the Sabbath, and habitually attended public worship, which is a part of the proper keeping of that day, are found in any of our prisons. While men keep the Sabbath, the God of the Sabbath keeps them, not by coercion or external force, but by those moral influences of truth, duty, and interest, which the Sabbath was designed, and with its attendant means of grace, is adapted to exert. And under those influences, rendered efficacious by his spirit, he not only ordinarily keeps them from gross outward crimes, but often, while he promotes their highest temporal good, leads them to that knowledge of himself and of his Son, which is 'life eternal.'"

7th. "As but six days in a week have been made or given to men for secular business, they have no right to take any more for that purpose; no more belong to them, and if men take more, they take that which IS NOT THEIRS. And though it may sometimes promise some temporary good, it will not be likely to end well; for the sabbatical law was engraven not only on the tables of stone, but on the bodies and souls of men, and is armed with a penalty which no continued violation of it can annul or evade."

8th. "Bodies of men, by being incorporated for private or public objects, have no more right to desecrate the Sabbath than individuals; and the members of such bodies are as really bound to observe it, in their public and official acts, as they are in their individual and private transactions among their fellow men."

We have read these documents with great interest, and can say with President Day of Yale College:—

"They give a condensed and luminous view of the reasons and scriptural authority for the universal and perpetual obligation of the weekly Sabbath."

Professor Woods, of Andover Theological Seminary says:—

"It is manifestly of the highest consequence, that the Sabbath should be regarded as a divine ordinance; and that we should be fully persuaded that we are required by the supreme authority of God, to remember and keep it holy as we are to keep any other command of the Decalogue. If the Sabbath is let down from the high place it holds in the divine law, if it is considered as an ordinance of man, and if the observance of it is enforced merely by considerations of expediency, it will fail of controling the conscience. will leave men exposed to be led away by temptation, and will never secure to them the benefit of a cordial obedience to God."

President Nott, of Union College, N. Y. observes:—

"All God's laws are founded in wisdom and goodness, and it is as much the interest as it is the duty of man to obey them. There are considerations in favor of the observance of the Sabbath embodied in these documents, that could not fail to impress the mind of the patriot and statesman, as well as the Christian, if presented before them. If the nation is to be saved, the observance of the Sabbath must be restored; and in order to the restoration of the observance of the Sabbath, the understanding of the public must be enlightened, and the conscience of the public quickened."

President Wayland, of Brown's University, R. I. said:—

"The importance of the religious observance of the Sabbath, is seldom sufficiently estimated. Every attentive observer, has remarked, that the violation of this command, by the young, is one of the most decided marks of incipient moral degeneracy. Religious restraint is fast losing its hold upon that young man, who, having been educated in the fear of God, begins to spend the Sabbath in idleness, or in amusement. And so also of communities. The desecration of the Sabbath is one of those evident indications of that criminal recklessness, that insane love of pleasure, and that subjection to the government of appetite and passion, which forebodes that the 'beginning of the end' of social happiness, and of true national prosperity has arrived."

These are excellent things, and such as we who observe the seventh day, because the institution and the law say it is the Sabbath of the Lord our God, can most heartily concur in. Nay, they are the very things for doing and pleading which, we are a separate people, and are called to bear contumely and reproach, from many who will read and applaud the sayings of these great men. And right glad are we, that the public mind is so far stirred up on this subject, that "seventeen hundred delegates, from eleven different States," could be assembled together at the National Convention, to give their support to these important sentiments. It is an excellent thing to see the most illustrious statesman, the aged Judge, and the far-famed barrister, the Presidents of Colleges and Universities, with the most distinguished divines in the country, giving their united concurrence to the promulgation of these high and important truths, to awaken and quicken the public conscience upon the obligation to keep holy the Sabbath day. True, these, strong truths as advocated by the patrons of the American and Foreign Sabbath Union, are interpolated with resolutions, sentences, and words of men's devising, to make them speak for the observance of the first day of the week, and doubtless will have this effect upon many. Yet we are right glad of their dissemination; for that which is most needed to bring men to the observance of God's holy Sabbath, is a conscience educated and disciplined to fear God's holy law. Our experience as Sabbath Reformers convinces us, that we have little or nothing to hope from the conversion of those to the holy Sabbath who regard it merely as a go-to-meeting day. Convince them that the Bible enjoins the seventh day, and that only as a Sabbath, and they remain unmoved by it; because they can go to meeting on the first day as well as on the seventh. And so with your no-law and all gospel men; they have no conscience on the subject. And all who have come to us from the observance of the first day, are such as had God's law written upon the conscience; and when they discovered their mistake respecting a change of time, all their fastest principles required that they should keep that day which God says He hallowed and blessed. Let conscience be educated to obey God's law, and although prepossessions are strong, there is a way for truth to enter; and entering such a soul, it will find an abiding place and presently show its effects.

These things have often been illustrated in the history of the conflict of other important truths with the popular errors of the day. The Dissenters of England have made most progress, as a general thing, in those towns and parishes where the purest evangelical doctrine has been preached by the church incumbent. Before Newton went to Olney, the parish was overrun with vice and profligacy. They have had an evangelical ministry in the parish church ever since; yet the Dissenters are double the number of the Churchmen. Before Leigh Richmond went to Turvey, in Bedfordshire, there were but three or four dissenting families in the parish; in a short time after his death an Independent Church was formed, who built themselves an elegant meeting house.

We would not, if we could, recall one of the sixty thousand Permanent Documents which the American and Foreign Sabbath Union resolved to distribute, nor prevent the supply of a single family in the United States with all the Permanent Documents the Society has published. Let them not think that we are opposed to educating conscience on this subject. No—we wish the public conscience was a thousand times more enlightened and quickened thereon than it now is. We speak from observation, when we say, that the great body of Christian professors at this day treat the subject of the Sabbath as a matter of little importance, provided they go to church; or provided their neighbors are there, on the first day of the week. If the American and Foreign Sabbath Union can bring them to see that the law of God does require of them to "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy," we doubt not that there are reflecting men who will then inquire, What day is it that God has sanctified and blessed?

Before we part with the Second Annual Report, we must express our surprise, that the compilers of it did not more consult the law of God, and the dictates of conscience, when they said of the Baltimore Convention, "Distinctions of sect or party were for the time forgotten; . . . . the results of discussion were harmonious; the numerous resolutions, addresses, and eloquent appeals, sent forth to influence the nation, were as the voice of one man." "What a sublime spectacle! How unlike political contests, or party strifes! All, without a dissenting voice, harmoniously concurring in the adoption of measures for the more sacred observance of the Lord's day." Did they forget, that they refused seats to Mr. Hull and Mr. Carpenter, two Christian ministers deputed, one of them by a Christian church of more than one hundred years standing, and containing more than three hundred members, and the other, deputed by a Sabbath Reform Society? Were not Mr. Titsworth and Mr. West, and others, so refused? Did they forget that Mr. Magruder and Mr. Lemmon were hissed by the members of that Convention, when addressing that body in session, for advancing unpalatable sentiments? Or do they think the Lord has forgotten all those things? Do they think the weekly presses which commented on these things for a month or more afterwards, have forgotten them? Perhaps they think the persons who read the papers which commented upon those things are not the persons to read the cover of the Permanent Documents. "What a sublime spectacle!"

P. S. We have a few more things to say respecting the Permanent Documents in a subsequent number.

War with Mexico.—The final action of the Mexican Congress upon the subject of a war with the United States, has not yet been received. Of course therefore, nothing decisive is known. It is the general opinion, however, that Mexico will not waste her energies in idle vaunts, but have a brush with us. Notice has already been given of the active preparations of the Mexican government. Our government is also engaged, and is daily shipping troops and munitions of war to the scene of strife, if strife should come. Intelligent and intimate friends of the administration express their fears that this affair is going to cost us an immense expenditure of money and life. The New Orleans papers of August 17, state that Gen. Gaines has received authentic information that 10,000 Mexican troops are within seven days march of Gen. Taylor's quarters. A requisition was made upon the Governor of Louisiana for 1000 troops, which was promptly responded to. These circumstances leave the Cabinet at Washington in a state of most anxious suspense.

Anti-Rent Troubles.—We learn from letters dated at Delhi, Delaware Co., that about fifty prisoners have been taken, charged with the murder of Steele. About twenty have been fully committed as accessories to the murder, and many others are yet to be disposed of. Delhi is like a camp, full of prisoners and guards. There are two hundred men constantly under arms, and the people are greatly exasperated against the anti-renters.

RELIGIOUS ITEMS.

Recent Intelligence from Africa.—"Africa's Luminary," just received from Liberia, gives cheering accounts of progressive civilization and Christianity. So powerful is the influence of the colonies, that a pacific policy is spreading far and wide, and petitions for missionaries and teachers are pouring in from the kings and chiefs in every direction. In nothing is the change from heathenism to civilization more remarkable, than in the condition of the female sex. Hitherto, as in every savage country, woman was the slave of man; but now, says the Luminary, she is the companion, and evinces her love for Christianity with as much fervor and sincerity as did Mary of Bethany.

Madura.—'On every side,' says a missionary, recently, 'we find a movement towards Christianity. Individuals, families, and whole villages, are looking to us for instruction—some with pure, others doubtless with improper, and more with mixed motives. Still, however, they come, renouncing heathenism, and placing themselves under the influence of the gospel.' "He that goeth forth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again, rejoicing."

Anniversaries in Paris.—The Reports of the late Religious Anniversaries in Paris have recently been received. Their objects are similar to those of this city, and the aggregate amount of their expenditures the past year has been about 400,000 francs, not including what was given to institutions established in the provinces. This sum is surely quite remarkable, considering the state of the Protestant population of France, consisting of only about twelve or fifteen thousand souls.

Doctor Channing says: "A man brought up to an obscure trade, and hemmed in by the wants of a growing family, may, in his narrow sphere, perceive more clearly, discriminate more keenly, weigh evidence more wisely, seize on the right means more decisively, and have more presence of mind in difficulty, than another who has accumulated vast stores of knowlege by laborious study; and he has more of intellectual greatness. Many a man, who has gone but a few miles from home, understands human nature better, detects motives and weighs character more sagaciously than another, who has traveled over the known world, and made a name by his reports of different countries."

Newspapers.—The Pittsburgh Morning Chronicle thus discourses:—"What a singular medley a newspaper must be! In one column you shall find a labored and swelling eulogy on fallen greatness, apparently written with tears and inspired by sorrow, and in the next appears the history of the crops; anon appears a meagre witticism; next comes a theatre puff, or a recommendation of ice-cream; and then follows up the deaths and marriages. All tastes (and no tastes at all) must be consulted, sorrow and fun, business and nonsense, must all find a place in the "folio of four pages," or people "will stop the paper."

MOBOCRACY TRIUMPHANT IN KENTUCKY.

The following account of recent proceedings in Lexington, Ky., affords another illustration of the spirit which supports the peculiar institution of the South. The murder of Lovejoy, a few years ago, at Alton, found apologists, because he was identified with the abolitionists, and supposed to be destitute of sympathy for the South. But here is a native of Kentucky, of commanding talents and high standing, threatened with the same fate which Lovejoy met, for no other reason than because he has dared to speak freely of the evils and dangers of slavery. We are told, it is true, that his influence favors insubordination among th eslaves. However this may be, we believe there is much more fear that he will disturb the slumbering consciences of guilty slaveholders. Hence his paper must be discontinued, and his own life jeoparded.

We are glad to see that some of the papers in other parts of Kentucky where the people are less excited, and are in a condition to look upon the matter with some degree of calmness, have fearlessly denounced the proceedings in Lexington. It can not be doubted, that in this case, the slaveholders have done more to promote the cause of emancipation, than could ever have been accomplished by the object of their spite.

The following account of the matter is taken principally from the New York Tribune, and includes all that is known in New York up to Wednesday noon:—

FREEDOM'S BATTLE IN KENTUCKY—THE WORK OF PERSECUTION BEGUN!

The establishment at Lexington, Kentucky, of Cassius M. Clay's True American has been hailed by the enlightened friends of Freedom in every part of the country with feelings of exhultation, as a token that the system of slavery which has so long cursed a large portion of our country was ere long to be swept away by the influence and efforts of men whose right to interfere with the institution could not be disputed, and whose residence in the slave States peculiarly qualified them for the work. From the first we have foreseen that Mr. Clay's high social and moral standing in Kentucky would be insufficient to shield him from the persecution with which the enemies of Freedom and Humanity are wont to assail every man, however exalted, who undertakes the work of reform with an earnestness and boldness that gives assurance at once of sincerity and final success. We were not at all surprised, therefore, on learning as we did yesterday, by the True American Extra, dated the 15th inst. that an onset upon Mr. Clay has been commenced which has for its object the suppression of his bold and fearless paper. Indeed this is precisely what we have anticipated, and our only wonder is that the movement has been so long delayed.

The facts as stated by Mr. Clay are these: On the 15th inst. just before 3 o'clock P. M., Mr. Clay was informed that a meeting was to be held at the Court House in Lexington to take measures for the suppression of the True American. Although in ill health he determined to attend the meeting and vindicate his rights personally. About 20 persons were present, including two or three of his personal friends. With the exception of those last named, he knew them all as political, and three-fourths of them as personal enemies. Among the rest was Thomas F. Marshall. Mr. Marshall stated that the excitement in the community had been caused by some articles in the American which were thought to be insurrectionary in their tendency. Several speakers contended that the meeting was a private one, whereupon Mr. Clay, after protesting against the wrong construction put upon the article in question left the house:

The result of the meeting was afterwards communicated to him in the following letter:

LEXINGTON, 14th Aug. 1845.

CASSIUS M. CLAY ESQ.—SIR: We, the undersigned, have been appointed as a committee upon the part of a number of the respectable citizens of the City of Lexington, to correspond with you under the following resolution:

"Resolved, That a Committee of three be appointed to wait upon Cassius M. Clay, Editor of the 'True American,' and request him to discontinue the publication of the paper called the 'True American,' as its further continuance, in our judgment, is dangerous to the peace of our community, and to the safety of our homes and families."

In pursuance of the above, we hereby request you to discontinue your paper, and would seek to impress upon you the importance of your acquiescence. Your paper is agitating and exciting our community to an extent of which you can scarcely be aware. We do not approach you in a form of a threat. But we owe it to you to state, that in our judgement, your own safety, as well as the repose and peace of the community, are involved in your answer. We wait your reply, in the hope that your own good sense and regard for the reasonable wishes of a community in which you have connections and friends, will induce you promptly to comply with our request. We are instructed to report your answer to a meeting, to-morrow evening, at three o'clock, and will expect it by two o'clock P. M. of to-morrow. Respectfully, &c.

B. W. DUDLEY,
THOS. H. WATERS,
JOHN W. HUNT.

To this letter Mr. Clay sent the following bold and manly reply:

SIRS:—I received through the hands of Thomas H. Waters, one of your committee, since candle-light, your extraordinary letter. Inasmuch as two of your committee and myself are not upon speaking terms, and when I add to this the fact that you have taken occasion to address me a note of this character, when I am on a bed of sickness of more than a month standing, from which I have only ventured at intervals to ride out and to write a few paragraphs, which caused a relapse, I think that the American people will agree with me, that your office is a base and dishonorable one, more particularly when they reflect that you have had more than two months whilst I was in health, to accomplish the same purpose. I say in reply to your assertion that you are a committee appointed by a respectable portion of the community, that it cannot be true. Traitors to the laws and constitution cannot be deemed respectable by any but assassins, pirates and highway robbers. Your meeting is one unknown to the laws and constitution of my country; it was secret in its proceeding, its purposes, its spirit, and its action, like its modes of existence, are wholly unknown to or in direct violation of every known principle of honor, religion or government, held sacred by the civilized world. I treat them with the burning contempt of a brave heart and a loyal citizen. I deny their power and defy their action. It may be true that those men are excited as you say, whose interest it is to prey upon the excitement and distresses of the country. What tyrant ever failed to be excited when his unjnst power was about to be taken from his hands? But I deny, utterly deny, and call for proof, that there is any just ground for this agitation. In every case of violence by the blacks since the publication of my paper, it has been proven, and will be again proven by my representatives if my life should fail to be spared, that there have been special causes for action independent of, and having no relation whatever to the True American or its doctrines. Your advice with regard to my personal safety is worthy of the source whence it emanated, and meets the same contempt from me which the purposes of our mission excite. Go tell your secret conclave of cowardly assassins that C. M. Clay knows his rights and how to defend them. C. M. CLAY.

Lexington, August 15, 1845.

Having thus met the enemies of Freedom of Speech and of the Press, he made the following appeal to the friends of the Constitutional Liberty to stand by him in this hour of trial.

KENTUCKIANS: You see this attempt of these tyrants, worse than the thirty despots who lorded over the once free Athens, now to enslave you. Men who regard law—men who regard all their liberties as not to be sacrificed to a single pecuniary interest, to say the least of doubtful value—lovers of justice—enemies of blood—laborers of all classes—you for whom I have sacrificed so much, where will you be found when this battle between Liberty and Slavery is to be fought? I cannot, I will not, I dare not question on which side you will be found. If you stand by me like men, our country will yet be free, but if you falter now, I perish with less regret when I remember that the people of my native State, of whom I have been so proud, and whom I have loved so much, are already slaves. C M. CLAY.

Lexington, August 15, 1845.

What response will be made to this noble appeal remains to be seen. But let the friends of slavery beware. If they resort to violent measures, they will give to their darling institution a shock from which it can never recover.

☞ We learn by later advices, that on Monday the 18th, a large concourse of citizens of Fayette County, were assembled, and after hearing the report of their committee and several other expressions of the feelings of an excited mob, "a committee of sixty was appointed to proceed to the office of the True American, and take down the press, box it up, and send it to Cincinnati." True to their calling, the Committee reported at 2 o'clock that the press had been taken down, and pledged themselves that in a few hours it should be on the cars. No resistance whatever was offered to the mob. Indeed, a pledge was proffered to them in the name and behalf of C. M. Clay, that if they would not molest his prope.ty, his paper should be immediately discontinued. Mr. Clay was probably detained at home by illness, but had taken the precaution to make his will and to arm himself in anticipation of a personal assault.

The last advices from Mr. Clay represent his condition as very critical. A private letter from Cincinnati to the editor of the Tribune says, "I learn that Clay is dangerously ill. The excitement has proved to much for him. I fear the worst." A letter from Lexington, dated Aug. 19th, says that in the opinion of the attending physician, he must die.

THE WAY TO CONQUER.—He who overcomes by force conquers but half his foe, since the mind is not subdued; but he who overcomes by persuasion conquers the whole man, since he controls the will which gives him command of the body also.

Clerical Wine-Drinking in England.—In Dr. Durbin's 'Observations in Europe, we find the following:

"I do not recollect ever to have preached a sermon in England, without being offered a glass of wine afterwards in the vestry. Wine was frequently distributed in Conference during its active session. The temperance movement has not taken hold of our brethren in England; and they see wine-drinking, not as we do now, but as we did twenty years ago."

Rev. D. D. Whedon, late Professor of Languages in the Wesleyan University, Middleton, Conn. was elected Professor of Logic and Rhetoric in the University of Michigan, at the annual meeting of the Board of Regents, held at Ann Arbor, on Tuesday, the 5th inst.

IMPORTANT FROM MEXICO.

We begin to hope, after all, to be spared the necessity of giving to our readers from time to time, the sickening details of a protracted and inglorious war. The recent news from Mexico renders it quite doubtful whether anything at all will be done by the Mexican Congress in vindication of their "National Honor." An attempt upon Texas—the great safety-valve for Mexican patriotism, may possibly grow out of the present excitement. We cut the following from the N. O. Tropic:—

VERA CRUZ, 4th Aug., 1845.

DEAR SIRS:—The election of a new President commenced on the 1st inst, for which there are four candidates—say, Gen. Herrera, President ad interim, Gen. Almonte, ex-Mexican Minister at Washington, Gomez Farias, and one other whose name has escaped my memory. The Presidency, however, seems to lay between the two former, one of whom it is supposed will be the successful candidate.

Almonte has offered his services to Government in the approaching campaign against Texas, but I rather think it is more a "rouse de guerre" to help him to the Presidency, than any great desire he has got to have a brush with the Texans—or as I ought rather to say now the United States.

H. B. M. brig-of-war Persian, arrived here on the 27th ult. in seven days from Galveston, bringing the news of the Annexation of Texas being confirmed by the President, Jones—and also that a body of U. S. troops, say about 4,000 men were expected at Galveston, in the course of a few days.

It appears that our Government is in no hurry to declare war against the United States, or at any rate, it seems to be the general opinion that she will merely attempt to reconquer Texas without making any declaration of war. Of course the news by the Persian caused a great excitement throughout the country. The Ministry has presented an act to the two Chambers for their deliberation.

1st. To declare war against the United States.

2d. Authorizing them to raise a foreign national loan to the amount of fifteen millions of dollars, which they consider to be requisite to carry on a war and re-conquer Texas.

The proposals are now under discussion in the Chambers, and if they get the "Targent," there is no doubt they will make the attempt to again get possession, though it is doubtful whether they declare war against the United States or not.

Of course you have heard ere this, of the revolution at Tobasco, in favor of Federalism, which has induced government to declare said port closed to foreign as well as native shipping, but is rather puzzled to find out how they will keep out the former, as they have not got a single steamer that they can get ready in less than eighteen or twenty days, all the engineers being still, as I may say, loafing on shore and waiting for their pay, of which, for some months past, they have received but a mere trifle

AUG. 5.—The Water Witch not sailing yesterday, I open to say that we have no news from the American Squadron, but it is thought here that it will soon appear. It is said that the troops now on the road to Texas, amount to 10,000 men.

Yours, etc.

THE SLAVE TRADE.—With reference to a statement showing the extent and horrors of the slave trade in Brazil, the Tribune holds the following language:—

It seems almost incredible that such revelations can be true, and yet they come in a shape so authentic as to defy skepticism. The history of the past fifty years has demonstrated the utter impossibility of putting down the trade in slaves so long as slavery itself is fostered or even tolerated. Slavery creates a demand for human flesh, which will be supplied by bad men in spite of all the laws that can be placed on the statute books. There are few among us who would consent to call the foreign traffic in slaves by any gentler name than piracy, and yet thousands of our citizens regard not only without horror, but even with complacency, that domestic trade in human flesh which sunders all the dearest relations of life, and is attended with cruelties scarcely less atrocious than those of the 'middle passage.' In what code of morals is it made a crime to buy and sell the natives of Africa, and a deed of innocence and honor to trade in the bodies and souls of men on our own soil? To connive at such legislative enactments as are designed and calculated to turn the Northern Slave States into marts for the sale of human flesh, and yet mourn over the importation of slaves from Africa, is to demonstrate the insincerity of our grief by "a fiendish deed."

CASE OF BISHOP ONDERDONK.—At the Annual Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Western Diocese of New York, recently held in the city of Rochester, a preamble and resolution, touching the connection of Bishop Onderdonk with the General Theological Seminary, and proposing to instruct the Trustees representing the Diocese in the Seminary to make all necessary and proper efforts to procure a special meeting to act upon the question of his removal, were offered by Judge Dayton of Lockport. The subject called out a long and interesting debate, which is sketched in the Rochester papers. The result was the unanimous postponement of the question until the next Convention. This was assented to by the mover.

WONDERS OF THE IRON MANUFACTORY.—The amount of iron produced in the United States, is three hundred thousand tons; all of which, and much more, is consumed in this country. The amount of nails alone is supposed to be fifty thousand tons. Forty thousand casks or four million pounds, are annually made by the Boston Company. Suppose that the nails will average one hundred and sixty to the pound, the number here produced each working day, would be nearly two millions. This is supposed to be but the twenty-fifth part of the nail manufacture of the United States. It seems incredible that about fifty millions of nails are made, bought, sold and used, every day, in the United States—yet such seems to be the fact.

A SINGULAR FEMALE.—The Baltimore American Republican gives an account of the recent occasional appearance of a woman in that neighborhood, supposed to have fled from human society and taken up her abode in the woods. "She is reported by those who have seen her as being remarkably delicate and fair, with flowing tresses—small feet and hands—neatly though plainly appareled—and in her movements, when unconscious of any of her species being near, cautious and sprightly; but upon observing any person, she bounds back to the depth of the forest, with a speed and lightness almost superhuman." She is seldom seen, having been accidentally discovered emerging from the secluded solitude of the rocks and glens where she remains hidden during the greater part of the time. A number of gentlemen have determined if possible to find out the abode of the 'fair and lovely' stranger, and restore her again to her friends and society.

DISTRESSING ACCIDENT.—Albany, Aug. 21.—A distressing accident occurred on the Mohawk railway at its intersection with Broadway, as the train was coming in from the West this afternoon. The driver of a carriage, containing five persons, Mr. and Mrs. Jacob Anthony, of Cahoes, and Mr. Lyman, wife and child, of Rochester, was passing up Broadway, and when at the railway crossing he was warned of the approach of the train, which was then in sight.

The man at the station, employed by the railway company, warned him to stop, but in vain. He passed on to the brake and the carriage was struck in the centre by the locomotive. Mr. Anthony jumped out. Mrs. A. was attempting to get out when the carriage was struck, but she fell in the track; the engine, tender and three cars passed over her, cutting her nearly in twain below the breast, and killing her instantly.

The carriage was dragged a distance of about 40 rods, and Mr. Lyman, who was, until the train was stopped, partly hanging out of the carriage, was considerably hurt. Mr. Lyman's wife and child were in the carriage and escaped unhurt. One of the horses was killed. The train was proceeding at its usual slow pace. The driver of the carriage was solely to blame. He cannot explain his conduct. [Cor. Livingston & Wells.

The steamer Express, plying between this city and Albany, on her passage down on Wednesday, was run into by a vessel going up the river. Considerable damage was sustained by the boat; one man was killed, and another severely wounded. It appears from the testimony of the passengers that the captain and officers of the Express were in no respect to blame, that they used every precaution, and that the guilt rests entirely with those on board the vessel.

IRA SAYLES, Associate Principal, and Professor of Mathematics.
GURDON EVANS, Professor of Natural Sciences.
J. R. HARTSHORN, Professor of Anatomy and Physiology.

From the very liberal patronage extended to this Institution during the past seven years, the Trustees have been induced to make arrangements for greatly increasing its facilities. The Chemical, Philosophical, Astronomical, and Mathematical apparatus is amply sufficient for a full illustration of the different departments of those Sciences. The apparatus will be farther increased at the commencement of the ensuing Fall Term, by the introduction of whatever may be necessary in other Sciences than those above mentioned, especially, by a MANIKIN of the most approved structure, now being imported from Paris, expressly for this Institution. This will enable the student of Physiology and Anatomy to pursue his studies with advantages nearly equal to those afforded by an actual subject, having this farther advantage of being divested of all those revolting circumstances ever attendant on the dissecting room.

THE TEACHERS' CLASSES, as usual, will be exercised in practical teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective Instructors. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. Daily Lectures will also be given during the Fall and Winter Terms; and the public may be assured that this department of the Institution shall be conducted upon the principles of the best regulated Normal Schools, in this, or any other country.

Finally, the proprietors pledge themselves, that the reputation of this Institution shall be sustained by the introduction of whatever may be necessary to meet the demands of an intelligent public.

The Institution is liberally endowed and subject to the visitation of the Regents.

Its Library is choice and extensive, and accessible, also, to all the students gratis.

THE ACADEMIC YEAR for 1845—6 consists of three Terms, as follows:—The First, commencing Wednesday August 13, 1845, and ending Thursday, November 20. The Second, commencing Wednesday, November 26, and ending Thursday, March 6, 1846. The Third, commencing Wednesday, March 25, and ending Thursday, July 2.

EXPENSES.—Tuition, per term, from $3 50 to $5 00. Board, per week, $1 00. Piano, (extra,) per term, $10 00. Washing, lights and fuel, per term, from $2 00 to $5 00. The entire expenses for an Academic Year, including board, washing, lights, fuel and tuition, (except on the Piano,) need not exceed $70 00; and may even be reduced much below this, where individuls board themselves, either separately or in clubs. For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense. SAMUEL RUSSELL,

WHY THUS LONGING?

BY H. W. LONGFELLOW.

Why thus longing, thus for ever sighing
For the far-off, unattained, and dim;
While the beautiful, all round thee lying,
Offers up its low, perpetual hymn?

Wouldst thou listen to its gentle teachings,
All thy restless yearnings it would still;
Leaf and flower, and laden bee, are preaching,
Thine own spnere, tho' humble, first to fill.

Poor indeed thou must be, if around thee,
Thou no ray of light and joy canst throw;
If no silken cord of love hath bound thee
To some little world through weal or woe;

If no dear eyes thy fond love can brighten,
No fond voices answer to thine own;
If no brother's sorrow thou canst lighten,
By daily sympathy and gentle tone.

Not by deeds that win the crowd's applauses,
Not by words that give thee world-renown,
Not by martyrdom and vaunted crosses,
Canst thou win and wear th' immortal crown.

Daily struggling, though unloved and lonely,
Every day a rich reward will give;
Thou wilt find, by heart-striving only,
And truly loving, thou canst truly live.

From "The Friend."

A WELL AUTHENTICATED FACT.

"In the year 1814, the late Mr. and Mrs. Foster, who were lost in the Rosthay Castle steamer in 1831, were acquainted with three sisters residing in London, two of whom were very serious retiring women, and the third just as gay and volatile. They were all elderly, which rendered the gaiety of the third less becoming, and also inclined her the more easily to take offence at any remarks made upon it: she hated the piety of her sisters, and opposed it in many petty spiteful ways; though they endeavoured seduously to accommodate themselves to her wishes; and to render the difference of their opinions as little disagreeable as possible.

One night, towards the close of the year 1814, she had been out at an assembly very late, and the next morning at breakfast was so remarkably different from her usual manner, that her sisters feared that she was either unwell or had met with some misfortune that had affected her deeply; instead of her usual incessant chatter about every person she had met, every thing they wore, and had said, and done, she sat silent, sullen, and absorbed; the gloom upon her brow was a mixture of temper and distress, which seemed to indicate a fixed resolution formed upon circumstances disagreeable to her, as if she was determined to pursue her own will, though it should lead her into trouble, rather than pursue the course she knew to be right, but would reduce her to submit to the control of another. As she eat nothing, her sisters asked her if she were unwell. "No." What was the matter. "Nothing." Had nothing distressed her? "She had no idea of people prying into what did not concern them." The whole of the morning she spent in her own room, and at dinner the same scene as in the morning recurred; she ate little, never spoke but to answer uncivilly, and then with an appearance of depression and melancholy that spread their influence very powerfully over the cheerfulness of her companions. She retired to rest late, and with the spirit of one that expects from sleep neither alleviation nor refreshment.

The next morning she again scarcely tasted breakfast, and seemed in the same distressed, uncomfortable state as on the preceding day; her sisters again renewed their inquiries. She said, "I am well, and nothing pains me." Then you have something on your mind; why will you not tell us, do we not love you, have we not the same earthly interest as you, and can we seek any good but yours in our anxious wish to share your sorrows? "O you have superstitions enough of your own, without mine being added; I shall not tell you what ails me; so you have no occasion to rack your curiosity; I dare say you would think it some spiritual triumph, but I laugh at such things; I am not quite old enough yet to be the victim of dreams and visions." "We do not live in dreams and visions, Anne," was replied; she answered harshly, "No, and I do not intend you shall." The sisters looked at each other, and remained silent.

The second day passed as the first; Anne was gloomy and moody, and her sisters both from pity and anxiety were unhappy. The third morning she again on the day as one who loathes the light, who has no object in living, and to whom the lapse of time in the prospect of futurity brings neither comfort nor hope. As her sisters looked on her, one of them suddenly said, "Anne, what was your dream?" "Ha! what was it, you would give the world to know, but I shall not tell you; I thought you did not believe in dreams." "Neither do we in general, we know them to be the offspring of a disordered stomach, confused images and fancies, when reason is dormant, and the memory of them usually passes away, as soon as we are engaged in our daily avocations; yet there is no doubt, some dreams are no more sent in vain, than any other affliction or warning. There is a verse in Scripture, which mentions God as speaking 'In the visions of the night, when deep sleep falleth upon man." She laughed again. "You have a verse in the Bible for every thing that suits you, but I do not choose to be warned in such a manner, and there is no doubt I shall get it out of my head in a day or two." "Anne, we do beseech you to tell us; if you really have had a dream from Heaven, you surely would not wish to forget it, and if not, we will help you to laugh it off."

She answered, "Well if I must tell you, I must; no doubt it was very extraordinary and very frightful; I should have thought it the effects of the ball, but that I never saw any thing any where in the least like it.

"I thought I was walking in the wide street of a great city; many people were walking there besides myself, but there was something in their air which immediately struck me; they seemed thoughtful and cheerful, neither occupied with business or with pleasure, but having about them such a dignity of repose, such high and settled purpose, such grace, and such purity, as never were stamped on mortal brow; the light of the city was also strange, it was not the sun, for there was nothing to dazzle; it was not the moon, for all was clear as day; it seemed an atmosphere of light; calm, lovely, and changeless. The buildings seemed all palaces, but not like palaces of earth; the pavements were all alike of gold, bright and shining, and clear as glass; the large and glittering windows seemed like divided rainbows, and were made to give and transmit none but the rays of gladness; it was indeed a place to which hope may bend, and whereon charity might dwell. I could not help exclaiming as I walked along; 'these are the habitations of righteousness and truth;' all was beauty, bright and perfect; I could not tell what was wanting to make me wish for an eternity in such a place, and yet its very purity oppressed me; I saw nothing congenial, though looks of kindness met me in every face of that happy throng. I felt nothing responsive; I returned in silence their friendly greetings, and walked on alone, oppressed and sad. I saw that all went one way, and I followed, wondering the reason.

"At length I saw them approach a building much larger and finer than the rest. I saw them ascend its massive steps, and enter beneath its ample porch; but I felt no desire to go with them, further than to the foot of the steps. I approached from curiosity; I saw persons enter who were dressed in every varied costume of the nations; but they disappeared within the porch, and then crossed the hall in white. Oh! that I could describe that hall to you! It was not marble, it was not crystal, it was not gold; but light, pure light, consolidated into form. It was the moon, without the coolness, it was the sun without his dazzling ray; and within was a staircase mounting upwards, all of light, and I saw it touched by the snowy feet, and white and spotless garments of those who ascended. It was indeed passing fair, but it made me shudder, and I turned away. As I turned I saw on the lower step one looking at me with an interest so intense, and a manner so anxious, that I stopped to hear what he had to say; he asked in a voice like liquid music. 'Why do you turn away? Is there peace elsewhere? Is there pleasure in the works of darkness?' I stood in silence, he pressed me to enter, but I neither answered, nor moved; suddenly he disappeared, and another took his place, with the same look and manner; I wished to avoid him, but seemed riveted to the spot. 'Art thou come so far,' he said, and wilt thou lose thy labour? Put off thine own garments, and take the white livery here.' He continued to press me until I got weary and angry, and I said, 'I will not enter, I do not like your livery, and I am oppressed by your whiteness.' He sighed and was gone. Many passed by me with looks of mingled kindness and pity, and pressed me to follow on with them, and offered me a hand up the steps which led to their mysterious change, but I rejected them, and stood melancholy and distressed.

"At length one bright young messenger came up to me, and entreated me to enter, with a voice and a manner which I could not resist. 'Do not turn away,' he said, 'where canst thou go? Do not linger, for why shouldst thou weary thyself for nought? Enter thou and taste of happiness. Do not all tribes and colours press into that hall? Are they not clothed, and washed, and comforted?' He gave me his hand, and I entered the hall along with him.

"Here I was sprinkled with pure water, and a garment of pure white was put upon me, and I know not how, but I mounted the white staircase with my happy guide. Oh! what a light burst upon me when I reached its summit! Mortal words cannot describe it, nor mortal fancy conceive it. Where are the living sapphires—where are the glittering stars that are like the bright radiance on which I stood? Where are the forms either, or the looks of love that breathed in the innumerable company that moved around me? I sunk down overpowered and wretched; I crept into a corner, and tried to hide myself, for I felt that I had nothing in unison with the blessed creatures of such a place; they were moving in a dance to the music, to the harmony of songs that never fell upon mortal ear; my guide joined in raptures, and I was left alone. I saw the tall forms all fair and brilliant in their ineffable felicity, their songs and looks of gratitude forming the circumstances and differences of each.

"At length I saw one taller than the rest, one every way more fair, more awful, surpassing thought, and to him every eye was turned, and in his face every face was brightened. The songs and the dance were to his honor, and all seemed to drink from him their life and joy. As I gazed in speechless and trembling amazement, one who saw me left the company, and came where I stood, 'Why?' he asked, 'art thon silent? come quickly and unite in the dance, and join in the song.' I felt a sudden anger in my heart and I answered with sharpness—'I will not join in your song, for I know not the strain, I will not unite in your dance, for I know not the measure.' He sighed, and with a look of surprising and humiliating pity, returned to his place. About a minute after another came, and addressed me as he had done, and with the same temper I answered him in the same words; he seemed as though he could have resigned his own dazzling glory to have changed me; if Heaven knew anguish, he seemed to feel it; but he left me and returned. What could it be that put such tempers into my heart?

"At length the lord of this glorious company of these living forms of light and beauty saw me, and came where I stood. I thrilled in every pulse with awe; I felt my blood curdle, and the flesh upon me tremble, and my heart grew hardened, my voice was bold. He spoke, and deep toned music seemed to issue from his lips, 'Why sittest thou so still, when all around thee are glad? Come join in the dance, for I have triumphed! Come join in the song, for now my people reign.' Love ineffable, unutterable, beamed upon me as though it would have melted a heart of stone, but I melted not. I gazed an instant, and then said, 'I will not join in the song, for I know not the strain, I will not join in the dance for I know not the measure.' Creation would have fled at the change of his countenance. His glance was lightning, and in a voice louder than ten thousand thunders, he said, 'Then what doest thou here?' The floor beneath me opened, the earth quaked, and the whirlwind encompassed me, and I 'sunk into tormenting flame.' With the fright I awoke."

There was silence for a time, for the sisters were struck with awe. They considered the dream, the deep impression it had made. "Anne," said they, "we cannot wish you to forget this dream, we surely believe it is from God. Your description of the holy city is much the same as we find in the Bible: 'the city hath no need of the sun, nor of the moon to lighten it, for the temple of God is there, and the Lamb is the light thereof;' all who enter there must put off their own garments, that is, their own righteousness, and must be clothed with linen clean and white, even in the righteousness of the saints, and their rightousness is of me, saith the Lord." Those that walk in the heavenly temple, are those that have come out of great tribulation, and washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb; wisdom waits daily on the steps to call the sons of men into that temple, and the people of God try to persuade their followers to tread in their steps. O dear sister, you know something of the way; do hearken to the faithful warning, join us, and walk in the path that leads to heaven." Anne's brow again darkened, and she answered, "I will do as I please, I do not intend you to preach to me." She continued in this melancholy state until the end of the week, and was found in her own room a corpse; no one knows the cause of her death; she died without disease, and without change.

Church Music, No. 4.

I approach now another question connected with church singing. Is it appropriate, is it right, to use instruments of any kind in the house of God? I propose this as a question still open for discussion in the Christian church, though I confess, that if I supposed it would lead to any doubts as to my own opinion, I should shrink from the smile I should provoke. My own answer is anticipated, doubtless, by all who have read the previous articles. I answer yes, I should be happy to have a well played organ in every Wesleyan Church in the country. Not in opposition to the will of the people, to be sure, but in concurrence with their enlightened consciences.

The organ is by far the most appropriate for sacred music, and greatly promotes, by the strength and harmony of its tones, congregational singing. This was the opinion of Mr. Watson. I also find the lovely Summerfield, giving his testimony to the beautiful effect of the organ in the house of God. And a greater than either, has said, "praise him with stringed instruments, and the ORGAN."

But where shall the organ be employed in his praise, if not in his house?

Let it not be foolishly said, the organ cannot praise him, for no more can the organs of speech, by the use of which we are enabled to make musical sounds.

The mind, however, of him who plays the organ; which directs all the movements of the hands, and controls all the muscles of the fingers, and thus produces the beautiful harmony, the deep, solemn tones, which so secretly entrance the mind, and melts it into devotional tenderness, can praise him, and praise him the more acceptably, by being thus prepared, as the prophets were, to prophesy, by the tranquilising sounds of the minstrel. And besides, those who urge the weak objection that instruments cannot praise God, must stand reproved by the constant language of the sweet singer of Israel, who calls upon God's saints, to praise with the timbral and harp. Do they rebuke David? Dare they jestingly ask how a harp could praise him? It was easy for the Psalmist and for others to see how the sweet sounds of the harp could carry up the soul in devotional asperatsons to God. Tell me not in reply that this belonged to a dispensation that has passed away. I very much question whether those who talk of those as belonging to a dark age of the church, are safer guides than the Psalmist, wehther they are either more enlightened or more deeply pious.

I feel quite satisfied to tread in the footsteps of Bible saints, of those whom Peter calls "holy men of God," speaking "as moved by the Holy Ghost." It was under the inspiring influences of the Holy Ghost, wraping him in the pure flame which wraps the burning seraph, that David said, praise God with the organ. I repeat, I am satisfied to follow him, who could say, "though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death I will fear no evil."

Still, if the idea of instrumental music alarms certain sensitive persons, I point them to a future state where the redeemed are represented as having "harps in their hands." Are you not afraid the purity of heavenly worship will be moved by those "harps?" things that would so pollute the church here, that certain brethren could not worship where they were. Tell me not this is all figurative language, I know we have meagre ideas of heaven. But God to attract us upwards, to impress us with the ineffable bliss of the redeemed, represents them not only as singing, but joining the voice with the harp. But if he had desired instruments banished from his house on earth, could he have represented them as used in the "temple not made with hands?" Had he desired the church to banish them as polluting his worship here, would he have presented the church as using them above? I have wandered from the course marked out for myself when I commenced, and must here close.

W. H. BREWSTER.

Providence, July 21.

GOLDEN SCRAPS.

BY MRS. L. H. SIGOURNEY.

HABIT.

We all acknowledge the strength of habit. Its power increases with time. In youth, it may seem to us like the filmy line of the spider; in age, like the fly caught in its toils, we struggle in vain. "Habit, if not resisted," says St. Augustine, "becomes necessity."

The physical force of habit is thus clearly illustrated by Dr. Combe: "A tendency to resume the same mode of action at stated times, is peculiarly the characteristic of the nervous system; and on this account, regularity is of great consequence in exercising the moral and intellectual power. All nervous diseases have a marked tendency to observe regular periods, and the natural inclination to sleep at the approach of night, is another instance of the same fact. It is this principle of our nature, which promotes the formation of what are called habits. If we repeat any kind of mental effort every day at the same hour, we at last find ourselves entering upon it, without premeditation, when the time approaches."

THE ELDEST DAUGHTER.

The deportment of the older children of the family, is of great importance to the younger. Their obedience or insubordination operates throughout the whole circle. Especially is the station of the eldest daughter, one of eminence. She drank the first draught of the mother's love. She usually enjoys much of her counsel and companionship. In her absence she is the natural viceroy. Let the mother take double pains to form her on a correct model; to make her amiable, diligent, domestic, pious; trusting that the image of those virtues may leave impressions on the soft, waxen hearts of the younger ones, to whom she may, in the providence of God, be called to fill the place of a maternal guide.

DOMESTICS.

Children should be required to treat domestics with propriety. Those, on whom the comforts of a family so essentially depends, are entitled to kindness and sympathy. The theory, that industry and good conduct are worthy of respect, in whatever rank they are found, cannot be too early illustrated and enforced on the members of a household.

GRATITUDE.

Be careful to teach your children gratitude. Lead them to acknowledge every favour that they receive, to speak of their benefactors, and to remember them in their prayers. Accustom them to distinguish with a marked regard, their instructors, and those who have aided them in the attainment of goodness or piety. It is an interesting circumstance in the life of Ann, Countess of Pembroke, who was distinguished more than two centuries since, by her learning, her decision of character, the languages she acquired, and the honors she enjoyed, that she erected a monument to the memory of her tutor, and always spoke of him with the utmost veneration, as her guide in the rudiments of knowledge.

FILIAL LOVE.

Filial love should be cherished. It has, especially, a softening and ennobling effect on the masculine heart. It has been remarked, that almost all illustrious men have been distinguished by love for their mother. It is mentioned by Miss Pardoe, that a "beautiful feature in the character of the Turks, is reverence for the mother. Their wives may advise or reprimand, unheeded, but their mother is an oracle, consulted, confided in, listened to with respect and deference, honored to the latest hour, and remembered with affection and regret even beyond the grave." "Wives may die," say they, "and we can replace them; children perish, and others may be born to us; but who shall restore the mother when she passes away, and is seen no more?"

FILIAL GRATITUDE.

Gratitude is a principal ingredient in filial affection. It often reveals itself in a most striking manner, when parents moulder in the dust. It induces obedience to their precepts, and tender love for their memory. A little boy was once passing the ornamental garden of a rich man. He was observed to look earnestly and wishfully at some sprouts, that were germinating on the trunk of an old poplar. On being asked what he wanted, he said, "My mother loved flowers, and every green living thing. She has been dead two years, yet I have never planted one where she sleeps. I was just thinking how pretty one of these would look there." The gentleman kindly gave him a rose-bush, and the fresh wand of a weeping willow. Then the poor little fellow lifted up his streaming eyes, and gave thanks in a broken voice for himself, and for his dear, dead mother.

REPUBLICAN DESPOTISM.

In the State of Connecticut I found a a refugee from injustice who had fled from the bloodhounds and hell-hounds of Georgia. On the upper joint of each fore-finger her master's name was printed in letters of fire—from her wrist to her neck, her arm was full of black scars of the bloody whip, and she said her back was in the same condition. She was large, stout and active, and was compelled to marry at 14 years of age, that her master might make gain by selling her offspring. After she had borne four children, her master sold the two oldest away from her, but she clung to them as with a death grasp and begged him not to let them go, but while she asked an egg, he gave her a scorpion by shooting her in the arm which struck her numb and unclenched her hands, and the precious jewels of her bosom were snatched away—she knows not where. The next day she was in as great agony as she could well endure.—Some of the shot still remain in her arm, and are plainly perceived just under the skin. Said she, they used to strip us naked, tie our feet together, cross our hands and swing us up by the wrists, then draw the cat o' nine tails through the left hand to straighten the lash, and bring it down upon us so as to draw blood at every stroke.—Many a time when we were digging ashard as we could with a heavy hoe, they would lay on the lash till the blood would run down our backs to the ground, and I would look up to my God and pray for them and feel happy. We often sat up till midnight or break of day to go to meeting and got dreadfully whipped when we came home, but we would go.

When her two oldest children were sold, she resolved to fly to the North for refuge. She soon found an opportunity to escape with her two remaining children, and by lashing the oldest of them to her back and placing the youngest in a sack at her bosom, she mounted some stilt crutches to prevent the dogs from scenting her track, and thus this child of God took up her line of march for freedom, and though, as she said, it was dreadful hard work, yet through the good hand of God, by great effort she reached Pennsylvania half dead with hunger and fatigue, having slept by day and travelled by night, and snatching her food as she could catch it. After a short tarry with a quaker family, she looked out of the window, and lo! her old master was coming. She cried out, la! misse there is my massa as true as you live, and there is the old white horse I used to drive, and her limbs became like a rag and she dropped to the floor. The quaker hastened to her help, and raising a trap door, lifted her up and put her and her children down into a cellar hole. Her master and his posse came in and searched the house but found her not. After this, they sent her and one child to New Haven, and thence to the place where I saw her, where she wept and talked, and I wept and prayed with her.—God save the people—save the slaves.

DUMB DOGS.

The following curious fact in natural history occurs in a letter from the Mauritus to Professor Bell of King's College, London:—In coming from Lechelles hither we touched at Juan de Nova, where I had an opportunity of seeing for the first time an island of purely coral formation. It is of a horse-shoe shape, about twenty one miles long, and from a half to three-quarters of a mile broad, with extensive reefs around it abounding with turtle. Dogs of different kinds have been left there from time to time, and finding abundance of food in the turtle eggs, young turtle and sea-fowl, have multiplied prodigiously, so that there are now some thousands of them. I can testify from personal observation that they drink salt water, and they have entirely lost the faculty of barking. Some of them which have been in captivity for several months, had not yet lost their wild looks and habits; nor had they any inclination for the company of other dogs, nor did they acquire their voice. You may perhaps have heard of this before; if so, my notice will confirm your knowledge; if not, the fact has come under my own ocular demonstration. On the island the dogs congregate in vast packs, and catch sea-birds with as much address as foxes could display. They dig up the turtle eggs, and frequently quarrel over their booty. The greater part of them droop their tails like wolves, but many carry them curled over their backs. They appear to consist of spaniel, terrier, Newfoundland, and hound, in various degrees of mixture, and are of all colors except pure white or brindled.

GOVERNMENT OF THE THOUGHTS.—You esteem it a dreadful thing to be obliged to live with persons who are passionate and quarrelsome. You undoubtedly judge right; it is like living in a house that is on fire. Dismiss, therefore, as soon as may be, all angry and wrathful thoughts. They canker the mind, and dispose it to the worst temper in the world, that of fixed malice and revenge. Never recall the ideas or ruminate upon past injuries and provocations. This is the amusement of many in their solitary hours; but they might as well play with cannon balls or thunder-bolts. They may work themselves up to distraction—to hate every thing and every body; and to have the temper and disposition of the Destroyer himself. Anger may steal into the heart of a wise man, but rests only in the bosom of fools. Make the most candid allowances for the offender; consider his natural temper; turn your anger to pity; regard him as ill of a very bad distemper. [Dr. Horne.

DEFENSIVE WARFARE.—I abominate war as unchristian. I hold it to be the greatest of human crimes; I deem it to include all others—violence, blood, rapine, fraud—everything that can deform the character, alter the nature, and debase the name of man. There is one case only which can justify it—there is one occasion only which makes it other than a crime—that is self-defence. Our own defence, or the defence of our country, and nothing else, on no other terms is war anything but a sin. [Lord Brougham.

SIN.—We must ever remember that sin is the abominable thing which God hates, and against which the whole of his word is directed; and though penitent sinners are so gladly received by him, that there is joy in heaven over their conversion, presumptuous sin is a great gulf, out of which few who fall into it are restored. [Bp. J. B. Sumner.

DANGERS OF DELAY.—Remember, though God promises forgiveness to repentant sinners, he does not promise they shall have to-morrow to repent in. Make much of time, especially in the mighty matter of salvation.

The Sabbath Recorder.

EDITED BY GEORGE B. UTTER. "THE SEVENTH DAY IS THE SABBATH OF THE LORD THY GOD." PUBLISHED AT NO. 9 SPRUCE ST.

VOL. II—NO. 11. NEW YORK, FIFTH-DAY, SEPTEMBER 4, 1845. WHOLE NO. 63.

The Sabbath Recorder.

For the Sabbath Recorder.

PERMANENT SABBATH DOCUMENTS.

In our notice of the Annual Report of the American and Foreign Sabbath Union, we stated a number of leading scriptural positions professedly taken by the action of the Society. Glad should we have been, to have found as much to commend in the arguments of their Permanent Sabbath Document No. 2. But upon a careful reperusal of the thing, with a few notes made on our first reading of it, our decided opinion is, that so far as the interpretation and application of holy scripture is concerned, there is not a more unsound or inconclusive treatise on the subject now before the public. The argument is a pitiful piece of pettifoggery, utterly unworthy the men whose names stand as the officers of the Society. Divesting ourselves of prepossessions, as much as it is possible for honest mortals to do, we were sincerely desirous of finding something that we might think looked like carrying out the great Bible principles laid down in the Report—something that would be calculated to call up conscience to the claims of her Maker's broken law. But in this we have been entirely disappointed. It is chiefly a labored effort to make the Bible coalesce with the Christian Fathers to support a human institution in the place of a divine one.

There is no feature of the Bible which more bespeaks its divine original, than the direct and palpable manner in which all God's requirements are addressed to the intellects and consciences of men. What the people of Judea said of Jesus Christ, is equally true of the Bible. It speaks with authority, and not as do the Scribes and Pharisees. The Psalmist saith, "The entrance of thy words giveth light." But it is the business of some teachers to put darkness for light, and then dazzle the eyes of their followers with a phosphorescence, kindled by the friction of their own efforts. This, of course, makes such followers the dupes of their leaders; but it can never lead men to a holy conscientious regard to their Maker's will. It is utterly at variance with the design of Divine Revelation. A healthy and honorable course of efforts for a religious reformation needs it not, and cannot long subsist with it.

For more than three centuries, parts of the Christian world have set up for a refomation from the great anti-christian apostacy; and vast and sleepless efforts have been made to win the nations to the Protestant faith. But as yet comparatively little progress has been made in leading them to feel the full influence of all the great vital principles of a pure Christianity. The swords of the great Ducal Princes of Germany, the sceptre of Henry the Eighth of England, and the armies of Queen Bess his daughter, won more nominally to the Reformation, than all the doctrines of the Reformers. We suppose the cause to be, a want of heart to carry out the plain unsophisticated requirements of Revelation. There has been such a studied conformity to the lighter shades of Romanism, that the public conscience has never been made fully to feel the broad distinction between the apostacy, and a pure Christianity; nor will it until an entire conformity to all divine requirements is regarded as the measure and standard of a Christian.

At this day there is less apparent prospect that the different sects of Protestants will ever arrive at a primitive unity of faith, than at any former period of their history. Their own growing greatness is putting the desire and probability of unity farther and farther off; and their continued and infatuated adherence to the unscriptural usages of the respective Reformers who originated them, makes it impossible for the present instrumentalities ever to bring them together. Studied efforts are made at the present day, among most denominations, to persuade the immature in mind and principle, that certain disputed usages are non-essential matters, the order of which is to be determined in every one's own bosom! Just so far as it prevails, it is suicidal to piety and Christian unity, because it removes a matter of duty to God, from the bar of conscience and the word of God, and gives to poor carnal inclination that which God has determined by his own authority; and although made on a plea of greater liberality, as the usage is not given up, it is in fact only enclosed in a condiment to make the patient swallow all that is sectarian about it. This is precisely the character of a great part of the efforts which are now making to promote the observance of what is surreptitiously called the "Christian Sabbath;" and so far as they prevail, they tend to foster a laxity of sentiment respecting the obligatory nature of God's holy law.

Permanent Sabbath Document No. 2, nominates no particular class of opponents; yet it has evidently a squinting two ways. On one hand, it takes a glance at the no-Sabbath heresy; but the main brunt is leveled at seventh-day orthodoxy.

The first page is devoted to the proof of the position, that "the Sabbath was not made for the Jews only;" and four pages more, towards the close of the Document, are written to show that the Sabbath was not done away by the bringing in of the gospel of Christ. These positions are carried out very well; but singurlarly enough, in a few pages after defending the first position, the Christian Sabbath is advocated at the expence of the Jewish Sabbath. Now, if the Sabbath which Jesus said was made for man, for the human race, was the same which the Jews of old kept—(and this is acknowledged in the Documents)—by what process has it been metamorphosed into a Jewish Sabbath? Whether the gentlemen of the American and Foreign Sabbath Union can see any discrepancy in these things or not, we know their effect upon the broad superfices of society. Public sentiment is relaxed respecting what a Sabbath should be. It engenders light thoughts respecting a law that enjoins a Jewish Sabbath; and so removes duty from conscience, places it at the call of private advantage or public convenience and custom.

In the next place, we find the postulate—"As the word Sabbath, in the decalogue, means rest, no chronological or numerical identity is referred to, or is the primary and essntial idea in the Sabbath law; and this is argued on the ground that day and night, the first day and the seventh day, in different places and to different people, come at totally different times." This postulate is a palpable affront to both the institution and the law, for both plainly affirm, that "the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God." The law affirms, that it was because God rested on that day that he blessed and hallowed it. Nothing is said in the Bible about his hallow it or blessing it because man rested thereon. A blessing is pronounced upon the man who shall keep it, to love the Lord and to serve him, (Isaiah 56: 6,) but never a blessing on the day because man rested thereon. We affirm, that the law requires men to venerate the day for God's sake rather than their own, and that such a view of the subject is most beneficial to conscience and the interests of religion; for in that family where it is so kept and taught it is impossible that the inmates can forget God the Creator, or the claims of his law upon them. And this is evidently the meaning of Exod. 20: 20.

To say then, as this Document does, for the sake of keeping a day different from what the law requires, that "No identical period is, in itself, intrinsically holy; but one seventh is set apart by Jehovah for sacred purposes; on that account it is called holy—as the temple and the sacred vessels were called holy, because devoted to holy purposes,"—is to hold the truth in unrighteousness. The same use of it would justify the course of Nadab and Abihu, when they offered strange fire before the Lord. No fire is in itself intrinsically holy, but there was fire set apart by God for sacred purposes, and on that account called holy. But Nadab and Abihu took either of them his censer, and offered strange fire before the Lord; and there went out fire from the Lord and devoured them. The same may be said of Jeroboam, who observed "a feast on the fifteenth day of the eighth month, even in the month which he had devised of his own heart;" instead of the fifteenth day of the seventh month, as the statutes of the Lord required. Of such a course Bishop Hall has said, "It is a dangerous thing, in the service of God, to decline from his own institutions; we have to do with a power which is wise to prescribe worship, just to require what he hath prescribed, and powerful to revenge what he hath not required."

The stale objection about day and night coming at totally different times to different parts of the world, is fallacious in itself and God-defying. Day and night, the first day and the seventh day, undoubtedly occur to all parts of the earth exactly at the time in which God designed they should occur when he made and numbered them. They occur to all parts of the earth now just as they did when he set the sun and moon and stars for signs and seasons and for days, and to divide the day from the night—the same as when he instituted the Sabbath day. God's laws have nature for a defence; no man can remove the boundaries he hath set to his own appointed times; and none need clocks or other time-keepers to know them. He made darkness and light the boundaries of Sabbath time, and made the course of time westward with the revolution of the earth; and as the sun, or the light, shines upon half the globe at once, it is impossible for any man to get more than half a revolution of the earth from any given point,; and reckoning as God has given the earth its motion, there is no such thing as the seventh day occurring to any part of the earth at the same identical period of time as the first day does to another. No man can be at Boston and in China on the same day; and if he journeys to China, he will find the course of time is the same there as at Boston, and the same with the law of God; it is the seventh day, in the order in which God made days, that men are to keep at all places on the earth. The mistakes of mutineers can never alter the laws of God, or impugn his wisdom. When people resort to quibbling it is a natural inference that they have got into a cramped place.

The next position of the Document reminds us of a man who thought his neighbor's fence encroached upon his farm, and so pushed it down, but immediately found that he had destroyed the defence of his own enclosure. So in this case; after having taken the foregoing position, the inquiry is made, "Is it then of no importance which of the six days in a week men occupy for labor and secular concerns, and which for rest and spiritual duties? May each select his own time without regard to the divine sanction, or the general good? No. In the first place there should be agreement." . . . . "Each should inquire with regard to the will of God, and observe the day which is indicated in his word and by his providence." Really this appears to us palpably contradictory, after saying, that "the law requires no numerical identity—no time is in itself intrinsically holy—a man keeping the seventh day, reckoned from the second day of the week, as really complies with the spirit and letter of the fourth commandment as men did of old who kept the Jewish Sabbath,"—and that when God has said nothing about such a new data for reckoning, and when such a reckoning is never made except to avoid the claims of God's holy law. But wisdom will be justified of her children. We should like to know what stronger or clearer indication God can give from his word for Sabbath-keeping than what he has given in the fourth commandment. What stronger demonstration of his providence to point out the true Sabbath, than the suspension of the manna every seventh night and day, for forty years in succession, while it fell every other night and day during the same time? The Permanent Document points out nothing so clear as these in favor of first day. Or, if we must rely chiefly on gospel testimony, what is clearer than that it was of the seventh day that our Lord Jesus Christ said, "The Sabbath was made for man"—"It is lawful to do good on the Sabbath day"—and added his works of providential mercy, and holy instruction? It was the day on which the Pharisees rested of which he said these things. But when did he ever say as much of the first day?

We have sometimes been amused with the inventiveness of an author, when we have thought there was an apparent malformation from the want of a due proportion of comparison and weight; and still more when it appears that there is a prominent want of conscientiousness. It was with such feelings that we read six or eight pages of whys and wherefores for substituting the first day in the stead of the seventh for a Sabbath. Although they are scriptural whys and wherefores, they are quite as irrelevant to the subject as those which the Rev. Charles Pise, D. D., has used to prove the doctrine of a Purgatory. By exactly the same process of ratiocination used to make the scriptures furnish a warrant for a first-day Sabbath, they can be made to prove the existence and uses of a Purgatory. The Permanent Sabbath Document produces for the Sabbath transfer, Isaiah 65: 19, "Behold I create new heavens and a new earth." Dr. Pise, in his lecture on Purgatory lately delivered in New York, produces 2 Cor. 15: 29, "What shall they do who are baptized for the dead?" The Permanent Sabbath Document instances the song of the heavenly host at the nativity, Luke 2: 14, "Glory to God in the highest." Dr. Pise instances the testimony of Paul, 2 Cor. 3: 13, "The fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is." Now if the Permanent Sabbath Document may be received without question, so may the lectures on Purgatory. If the Permanent Sabbath Document proves its own points, so does Dr. Pise. If one is valid, so is the other. An author who uses the holy scriptures in the above manner, does not expect a sober answer to his false interpretations of particular passages, because he follows no acknowledged rules of exegesis.

The remainder of the Document is occupied with a detail of the testimonies of the Christian Fathers, to which is added an appendix of thirteen pages on the opinions of Luther, Melancthon, Calvin, and other reformers, concerning the Christian Sabbath. On these authorities, all we have to remark at this time is, that if the testimony of the fathers is to be regarded as valid authority, then the Oxford Tractarians are right, and the democracy of modern Protestant churches is rebellion against legitimate authority. But we cleave to the plain letter and spirit of the Bible—the great statute book of heaven—and regard the injunction of our blessed Lord, "Call no man father on earth."—Consequently we attach no more importance to the writings of the fathers or the hierarchs who lived in the first five centuries of the Christian era, or to the opinions of the fathers of the Reformed churches, than we do to the Permanent Sabbath Documents sent out by the American and Foreign Sabbath Union. We give honor to whom honor is due. We do not despise dignities; but we would "prove all things, and hold fast that which is good." Such too are professedly the sentiments of a vast proportion of the American people; and all attempts at holding them permanently bound to any religious observance, which is not founded upon and sustained by a plain command of the living God, will prove nugatory. The only way permanently to promote the observance of the Sabbath is to produce plain divine authority and awaken conscience by teaching men the fear of God. When we consider the thoroughly democratic tendencies of our age, and remember the declaration of the Saviour, "Every plant that my heavenly Father hath not planted shall be rooted up," the project of the American and Foreign Sabbath Union appears to us utterly hopeless. There is no more probability that they can bring this nation to their views of Sabbath keeping, than there is of their establishing a national hierarchy. S. D.

THE ACQUISITION OF DILIGENCE.

It is wonderful how much is done in a short space, provided we set about it properly, and give our minds wholly to it. Let any one devote himself to any art or science ever so strenuously, and he will still have leisure to make considerable progress in half-a-dozen other acquirements. Leonardo da Vinci was a mathematician, a musician, a poet, and an anatomist, besides being one of the greatest painters of his age. Michael Angelo was a prodigy of versatility of talent, a writer of sonnets, (which Wordsworth has thought worthy of translating,) and the friend of Dante. Salvator was a lutentist and a satirist. Titian was an elegant letter-writer, and a finished gentleman. Sir Joshua Reynolds' discourses are more classical and polished than any of his pictures. Let a man do all he can in any one branch of study, he must either exhaust himself and doze over it, or vary his pursuit, or else lie idle. All our real labor lies in a nutshell. The mind makes, at some period or other, one Herculean effort, and the rest is mechanical. We have to climb a steep and narrow precipice at first; but after that the way is broad and easy, where we drive several accomplishments abreast. Men should have one principal pursuit, which may be both agreeably and advantageously diversified with lighter ones. [Hazlitt.

FAITH.

I said to Sorrow's pelting storm,
That beat against, my breast—
Rage on—thou mayst destroy this form
And lay it low at rest.
But still the spirit that now brooks
Thy tempest raging high,
Undaunted on its fury looks
With calm and steadfast eye.

I said to Friendship's menaced blow
Strike deep! this heart shall bear;
Thou canst but add one bitter woe
To those already there.
If thou wouldst crush a feeble worm,
Strike—but remember well
There is an hour ere long to come
When justice shall prevail.

I said to Death's uplifted dart,
Aim sure—O, why delay?
Thou wilt not find a fearful heart,
A weak reluctant prey.
For still this spirit firm and free,
While yielding to thy sway,
Safe in the arms of Jesus' love,
Shall smiling pass away.

STYLE IN PUBLIC SPEAKING.

The pithy writer who calls himself "Old Gilbert," in an essay on the subject of speech-making and preaching, gives some of his views in the following paragraphs:

We confess our likes for effective pulpit style. A minister is not a pulpit essayist. A minister is not a philosophic lecturer. A fine book style is not a fine pulpit style. The heart is the minister of the desk. The best style is that which brings the intellect down through the heart, and melts all its precious metals in that hot furnace. If you want a specimen, take good old South—see what edge is in all he said. Playful but not light—sharp but not sour—imaginative but not dramatic—using common words with uncommon power—speaking to you as if he expected to convince you—full of earnestness—decided without dogmatism—witty but not vulgar. All his words strike you like the explosion of torpedoes.

Some preachers use a sort of air-gun. You hear no report—you see some effect. Others are real artillery-men—thundering and blazing. No objection to the artillery-men, if they will only throw balls, but it is rather funny, to fire loud guns, and to have very small shot. * * *

Let every man keep his own natural style. All children can't cry alike. Some cry easy—some make a great blubbering. All preachers can't preach alike. Personal taste should be rectified, and then become personal law. How would Milton's old Gothic architectural style suit simple-hearted Cowper? How would Charles Lamb look in Coleridge's Germanic idioms? How would Hall look in Chalmers' garb? How would Wesley appear in Hervey's gaudy robes? Let every man be natural, but let him take care what is natural. Nature is a very indefinite word now-a-days. If you have the volume of water of Niagara, then you may become a cataract, but a bucketfull wont answer. If you have electricity, you may afford to thunder, but not without.

MUSIC A PEACEMAKER.

One of the most delightful characteristics of music, is its pacificating tendency. It may be employed as a grand mediator or peacemaker among men. Harmony of sound produces harmony of feeling. Can it have escaped the observation of any reflecting man, when present at a crowded concert, or at any numerously attended musical festival, what a heterogeneous mass of human beings was before him? Competitors in business; rivals almost sanguinary in politics; champions of hostile creeds; leaders of conflicting schools in art or philosophy; in fine, a collection and full assortment of contrarieties and antagonism; and yet the whole company is fused into one by the breath of song! For the time being, at least, enemies are at peace; rivals forget their contests; partizans lay aside their weapons; and the bosoms that harbored acrimonious or vindictive feelings, over which time seemed to have no power, are softened into kindness. All respond alike, all applaud in the same place; and men whose thoughts and feelings, an hour before, were as far asunder as the poles, or as the east is from the west, are brought as near together in feeling as they are in space. Who will deny homage to an art that can make men brethren even for an hour! If music has such power over men, is it not evident that it will have still greater power over children? I have heard of a family whose custom it was, on the expression or manifestation of ill nature or untowardness by any one of the members, for all the rest to join instantly in a song; and thus the evil spirit was exorcised at once. Neither child nor man can be long angry alone. All but madmen will yield their passions, if they receive no sympathy from others while expressing them, or if they are not kept alive by an answering passion in an opponent. How extensively may this principle be applied in the management and discipline of children in school; and surely music is one of the best instrumentalities for so benign a purpose. [Mann's Report.

He who preaches without previous study, must either have a very high opinion of himself, or a very low opinion of his hearers. [J. Edmonson.

A preacher of the seventeenth century, having employed thirty divisions in explaining his text, says, "I shall not shred the words into unnecessary parts." "When I set under such preaching," says Dr. Watts, "I fancy myself brought into the valley of Ezekiel's vision—it was full of bones, and behold there were very many in the valley, and lo, they were very dry."

[Dr. Porter.

DR. CHALMERS.

"Dr. Chalmers ascended the pulpit stairs. could not well judge of his height or figure, because of the gown which he wore—but the countenance was daguerreotyped on my memory, and when I saw, a month or two since, in New York, Henry Inman's fine portrait of him, the man himself seemed as though he had voyaged across the Atlantic, and was standing before me.

His head was thinly covered with a short, and slightly curling grey hair; the forehead was extremely well shaped, exhibiting more breadth than height—his eyes were large, and of a greyish blue color, the nose short and thick, and the mouth hard in outline, and with rather a 'downward drag austere' at the angles. The brow was plowed with many lines—the inner angles of the eye-brows terminating in deep perpendicular grooves. The cheek bones were very high and prominent; taking the face altogether, it had a somewhat heavy appearance. But soon after he had named his text, and had fairly warmed up to his subject, the dull grey eyes flashed, the mouth assumed a hundred different shapes, and his teeth glistened between his parted lips, he seemed to labor with the strength of a giant to unravel the mysteries of his theme. He appeared, in argument to take his subject and tear it asunder, piecemeal. At times his vehemence was such that to Southern ears his broad, very broad, harsh Scotch dialect rendered many of his remarks quite unintelligible. How grand was that discourse! No one could have looked on and heard Dr. Chalmers, without feeling that he was in the presence of one of the giants of mind."

CONVERTED INDIAN.

"I understand," said John Sunday, the converted Indian chief, to a congregation which he was called to address at Plymouth, in the year 1837, "that many of you are disappointed, because I have not brought my Indian dress with me. Perhaps if I had it on, you would be afraid of me. Do you wish to know how I dressed when I was a pagan Indian? I will tell you. My face was covered with red paint. I stuck feathers in my hair. I wore a blanket and leggins. I had silver ornaments on my breast, a rifle on my shoulder, a tomahawk and scalping-knife in my belt. That was my dress then. Now do you wish to know why I wear it no longer? You will find the cause in second Corinthians, fifth chapter, and seventeenth verse: 'Therefore, if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature; old things are done away; behold all things are become new.' When I became a Christian, feathers and paint 'done away.' I gave my silver ornaments to the mission cause. Scalping knife, 'done away;' tomahawk 'done away.' 'That my tomahawk now,' said he, holding up, at the same time, a copy of the Ten Commandments, in the Ojibwa language. 'Blanket done away.' 'Behold,' he exclaimed, in a manner in which simplicity and dignity of character were combined, 'Behold all things are become new!'" [Alder's Wesleyan Mission.

A CHRISTIAN REPUBLIC.

"Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature."—JESUS CHRIST.

Since the adoption of our national constitution, the United States, exclusive of the cost of arming and drilling the militia, have expended $1,000,000,000 in preparations for war in time of peace. This sum would have put a Bible into the hands of every human being on the earth. It would have supported two millions of missionaries among the heathen for a year, and given a devoted minister of the gospel to every 300 of the unchristianized myriads of the human family! As a means of civilization and socializing commerce, it would have constructed forty thousand miles of railroad, at a cost of $25,000 per mile. How wonderfully has this Christian republic demonstrated their faith in the divine declaration, that "The earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof." E. B.

POWER OF THE GOSPEL.—A carpenter who was building the new church at Waimate, a missionary station in New Zealand, engaged a native convert to work in his garden, and promised to pay him for his labor. As soon as the native had finished, he went to the carpenter for his wages; another of the European workmen knocked the poor native down, and kicked him very cruelly while lying on the ground. The native bore it all most patiently, not murmuring or resisting, till the other had ceased his cruelties; but then, starting to his feet, he seized the other by the throat, shook him as though he had been a cat, and brandished a sharp tool over his head, with which he might have taken away his life. Now, said the native, you see your life is in my hand; you owe your life to the preaching of the gospel. My arm is quite strong enough to kill you, but my heart is not, because I have heard the missionaries preach the gospel. If my heart were as dark as it was before I heard them preach, I would strike off your head. You owe your life to the preaching of the gospel.

He then let the workman go, without having done the least harm to him. [Youth's Miss. Rep.

MISSIONARY COLLECTORS.—A kind-hearted friend, living in the country, said to a minister one day, "I am doing all I can for the Missionary Society; I am employing a great many collectors for it. I suppose I employ more in that good work than any body else." "Indeed," said the minister, "I should like to know how that is." "Come with me and I'll show you," she replied, and forthwith she took her friend into the garden, and there, amidst the honeysuckles, roses, larkspurs, and other fragrant flowers, she pointed out several bee hives, "There," said she, "all that honey I give to the friends of the Missionary Society, so that all the bees employed in collecting it I consider as my collectors for the Misssonary Society."

LIBERALITY AND SECTARIANISM.

It is quite common, in intercourse with good society, to meet with persons who are everlastingly protesting against sectarianism and singing the praises of liberality of sentiment. When one has time, he will generally find both amusement and instruction from analyzing the real character and feelings of such persons. In some cases he will find them to be men totally destitute of religious sentiments of their own, who hope by this course to cover up their ignorance and get the credit of uncommon wisdom and goodness. In other cases he will perhaps find them to be those good-natured religious men, who have sentiments of their own, but who have neither judgment to estimate their comparative worth, nor decision to carry them out to their practical results. But in no case will he find them to be men of serious and well-balanced minds, who have deliberately and prayerfully studied the principles of religion, until they have conscientiously adopted opinions for themselves. They are men who have taken their notions upon trust or haphazard, and who do not therefore deem it at all important to maintain the great truths of religion, or to oppose the errors by which those truths are assailed. Hence their outcry against what they call sectarianism, and their praise of what they call liberality.

Now if any person will take the trouble to follow one of these characters into the scenes of active life, we believe he will generally find him bigoted and self-willed to a high degree. There is something very suspicious in his frequent protestations of freedom from sectarianism. It is not common for men to be boisterous in affirming their innocence of a crime, unless they are conscious that their acts have furnished some ground for the charge of guilt. Suppose you were to hear a man in the vicinity of a grogshop repeatedly asserting that he was sober, and denying that he had ever tasted of the intoxicating cup; you would not need to see him reel and stagger to convince you that he had yielded to temptation and been overcome. Just so in regard to those men who are ever affirming their love of liberality and their hatred of sectarianism; you almost naturally expect to find them either totally careless about religious obligations or most uncompromising towards those who doubt their liberality, or deny the soundness of their views in regard to the evils of sectarianism. They are just the persons to make a man an offender for a word. They are just the persons to place their own opinions, and the time-honored arrangements of human invention, upon a level with the requirements of the Sacred Volume. They are the persons, in short, to make non-conformity to their prudential arrangements an impassable barrier to their fellowship and sympathy; which is, after all, more exclusive and bigoted than to read men out of any visible church.

An illustration of this, upon a large scale, was seen only a short time ago, in the churches organized to promote a union of all denominations.—Certain persons who professed to deplore the division of the Christian church into so many sects, organized what they called a Union Church as the only cure for this evil; in other words, they got up a new sect for the purpose of diminishing the number of sects. And it is well known, that in carrying out this doctrine, some of the advocates of union were severe, almost beyond precedent, in their denunciations of those who could not see and would not act with them. We do not doubt, of course, that great good would result from a union of Christians upon some liberal platform; and we most fervently desire it. But we have no hope that a lasting and profitable union will ever be secured by an agreement among differing denominations not to disagree, and that only for the purpose of saying they are agreed. A union, to be lasting, must be based upon a mutual and practical acknowledgment of the doctrine that the Bible is the only rule of faith. While this is practically denied by some sects, as it now is, a permanent union is out of the question.

For our part, we do not ask a man to be destitute of a love of sect—or of sectarianism, if that title is preferred. We would have him examine the Bible for himself in regard to every religious doctrine and duty; and when he has made up his mind deliberately and prayerfully, we would have him manifest due zeal in maintaining his opinions. This does not require that he should shut his eyes against the opinions and arguments of others, or that he should propagate his sentiments by concealing any portion of the truth or advocating any form of error. It allows him to give full weight to the different capacities and advantages of mankind to learn the truth. It permits him to exercise that generosity which the Christian religion inculcates. It is best adapted to promote the cause of religion. It is, in short, all the support which religion needs, and the only support from which it can receive any real benefit. If to hold such views is to be sectarian, then are we sectarian. We own that the sect with which we are connected is the one which it gives us the greatest pleasure to see advancing, because we believe it to be the most scriptural sect, and therefore most acceptable to God. At the same time, we can rejoice in the prosperity of any denomination breathing the spirit and following the example of Christ, and our joy will be precisely in proportion to the extent to which they manifest the Christian temper.

"Violation of Sunday."—Under this heading the Cincinnati Atlas of Thursday last, August 28, says:—"Thirteen Israelites were yesterday fined three dollars each, by the Mayor, for keeping their shops open and selling on Sunday last." In this we see how much more regard the Mayor of Cincinnati has for the law of the State than for the law of God. Out of regard to the law of God, these Israelites probably rested on the seventh day and then went about their business on Sunday. But the Mayor of Cincinnati probably went about his business on the seventh day, of which God has said, "in it thou shalt not do any work," and then fined these thirteen Israelites three dollars each for not resting on the first day, which he and his coadjutors have seen fit to pronounce sacred. That is consistency with a witness.

JEWISH COLONIES.

The "Voice of Jacob," a leading periodical of the English Jews, advocates the establishment of Jewish agricultural settlements in Palestine. The project is not new, but has been under consideration for some time past. Many of the Jews have manifested a decided taste for these colonizing enterprises, and they have generally succeeded when they have undertaken them. The people seem to be ready for something of the kind. Some of those on the continent say they would gladly emigrate—would go to the American colonies, or to Texas, if they could be sure of English protection. But they generally prefer Palestine above any other country. There is no real obstacle in the way of their possessing their old homestead. The present population of that country, is but a tithe of what the country could easily support, and there are large districts wholly uninhabited. In such circumstances, it is only necessary for some master spirit to rise among them, capable of taking comprehensive views of the work to be done, and the best modes of doing it, and he would soon lead them forth in triumph, conferring an immense benefit upon them, and deriving no inconsiderable advantage himself.

THE SECULAR PRESS AND THE SABBATH.

We hear a great deal said now-a-days about the interest of the secular press in promoting a Sabbath reform. And truly, if that interest might be measured by the number of words written on the subject, one would think the work of reform must go on swimmingly. But alas, there is great reason to fear, that the amount of matter published is no just measure of the interest felt. Any one who has given close attention to the subject will have noticed, that the secular papers which have talked most about Sabbath reform efforts are the very papers which care least for religious considerations and most for popular favor. They are the papers which will laud most freely any popular movement, and decry as freely any unpopular movement. They are, in short, the papers which live by advertising popular medicines, puffing worthless books, and keeping on the right side of every body. Now however desirable it may be to have the countenance of such papers, we think their voice is no just indication of the progress of reform, or the real condition of public sentiment. Their words only show us, in most cases, what they think it is most for their interest to say. Of course, therefore, no reliance can be based upon those calculations and prophecies which rest upon the favor of such a secular press.

It is not a little amusing to read some of the comments of these secular papers upon the Sabbath Lectures and Sabbath movements of the day. We have now before us a copy of the New York Express, giving an account of a lecture lately delivered by "the eloquent Dr. Lansing on the sacred observance of the Sabbath." Among other things which the reporter represents the Doctor as saying, to show the importance attached to the Sabbath in the Divine mind, we find the following, which will be new to some of our readers: "And in the wilderness, a miracle was wrought to secure its observance—the amount of manna given to the Israelites by Jehovah on Saturdays, being double that of any other day!" Now we have looked over that portion of the Good Book which treats of this matter, and find that Jehovah, instead of giving a double amount of manna on Saturdays, gave none at all on that day, but gave double on the preceding day, in order to secure the observance of Saturday, or the seventh day. It is not for us to say, nor do we care, whether the fault here lies with Dr. Lansing in so stating the matter as to leave an impression that the withholding of the manna was designed to sanction the observance of Sunday, or with the reporter in drawing an unnatural inference from the Doctor's language. It is not material with which the fault lies. All we wish, in referring to this case, is to show the consummate ignorance of some of those reporters for the secular papers about whose opinions such a great ado is made. For our part, we cannot see any very bright "signs of promise" in the professions of interest among such men—men who are so ignorant of the subject as to represent Jehovah as giving a double portion of manna on the day in which he gave none at all.

Lowell, Mass.—A history of this flourishing manufacturing city has recently been published, which gives a glowing picture of its religious condition. There are in Lowell twenty-three regularly constituted religious societies, which have erected nineteen places of worship, at a cost of three hundred and eight thousand dollars. These societies employ twenty-two ministers, and expend for the support of public worship about twenty-five thousand dollars annually. They have connected with them more than six thousand Sunday School scholars and teachers, constituting one-fifth part of the entire population of the city. The members of these societies are working people, and most of them factory operatives; yet their charities exceed those of many wealthy churches. It is not uncommon to take up a missionary contribution of four hundred dollars in a single church. Within the past year more than ten thousand dollars have been raised for benevolent objects, besides their ordinary expenses.

Theirs is an example worthy of imitation. When we hear religious societies talk about being too poor to support the gospel, and contribute to benevolent objects, we love to point them to some such place as Lowell, which has grown rich by its liberality. We pity the men who, having an abundance of every thing, yet think themselves unable to contribute for benevolent purposes, because we fear that their poverty will increase upon them. We have read somewhere, that "there is that scattereth and yet increaseth; and there is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty."

"HONOR TO WHOM HONOR IS DUE."

We notice in two or three Episcopal papers, that thanks are expressed to Dr. Potts—(of "Potts & Wainwright" notoriety)—for his influence in bringing one Rev. Phineas Smith, who has been a Presbyterian clergyman for the last eighteen years, to apply for orders in the Episcopal Church. Mr. Smith says he had always believed that the Presbyterians held to apostolical succession, until Dr. Potts' letters convinced him to the contrary, and led him to inquiry and a change of position.

—This circumstance reminds us of a plan we formed some time ago, of collecting together a number of instances in which men have been led to embrace the Sabbath of the Bible by the efforts of those who hate the Sabbath to conceal the truth or prevent the discussion of the subject.

One instance of the kind now occurs to us, which transpired in New York some years ago, in which an intimate friend and admirer of Rev. Wm. Parkinson wrote him a note expressing thanks for his letters to Mr. Maxson in favor of keeping the first day of the week, because they had fully convinced him that the seventh day ought to be kept, and had led him to commence observing it.

Another instance we remember, which occurred in Massachusetts. A man who had been sprinkled in his infancy, and brought up in the Presbyterian faith, was converted from his sins in middle life, and brought to embrace Baptist sentiments. This so exasperated his Presbyterian pastor, that he immediately preached a sermon on the subject of baptism, in which the Baptists were pretty roughly handled. Among other things, he asserted, that there was just as good authority for infant sprinkling as there was for keeping the first day of the week as the Sabbath; and that any man who would give up infant sprinkling because he could not find express authority for it in the Bible, ought also, if he would be consistent, to give up observing the first day of the week, for which there was no express authority in the Bible! "Very well," said our young Baptist brother, whose heart was yet tender and open to truth, "if there is no Bible authority for keeping the first day, then I will give that up likewise." True to his word, he immediately set about examining the subject, and after prayerful deliberation, he became not only a Baptist, but a Seventh-day Baptist.

There are many similar cases recorded on the pages of history, or the memories of those who were acquainted with the facts. We must take the first convenient opportunity to collect them together for the benefit of those who have been instrumental, though unwittingly, in bringing their fellow men to embrace the truth.

Harvard University.—A report has recently been drawn up on "diminishing the cost of instruction in Harvard College," which shows that there is abundance of room for reform. The tuition at Harvard is $75 per annum; while at Yale it is only $33. The common fund of Harvard is $107,356; while at Yale it is only $30,090.—The annual cost of governing and instructing 254 students at Harvard is more than $26,000; while the annual cost of governing and instructing 394 students at Yale is only $15,201. The report proposes various retrenchments in salaries, and the reduction of tuition fees from $75 to $33 per annum. This, it is thought, will greatly increase the number of students, and do away with that exclusiveness which has resulted from placing the tuition so high as to shut out all but the descendants of wealthy and aristocratic families.

Anti-Slavery Convention.—A great Eestern convention of Abolitionists favorable to political action is to be beheld in Boston, commencing on the first day of October, and continuing two or three days. Delegates are invited from the New England States, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania. There will undoubtedly be an immense gathering.

American Musical Convention.—Our readers will remember the account which we gave of the meeting of this convention in Boston last year. The next meeting is to be held in New York on the 7th, 8th, and 9th of October. The Convention in Boston was a feast for a musical soul, but it is thought that the one in New York, from its more central position and other advantages, will exceed in attractiveness any of its predecessors.

Rev. Dr. Yates, a Baptist, who has been for many years past engaged in translating the Scriptures into the Eastern languages, died on the 3d of July last, on a voyage to England, which he had undertaken by the advice of his physician.

The Case of Mr. Maxson.—We hoped before this time to have heard something farther from Mr Maxson, particularly upon the question what could be done to relieve him. But we have heard nothing, and therefore remain in suspense. We know, however, that something ought to be done, and done immediately, to meet the expenses which he has incurred. What say our friends in Rhode Island and New Jersey to taking up collections for the object on the next Sabbath, which will be the first Sabbath in September? They will all receive this paper before that time, and may act simultaneously and promptly. Will they do it? We trust they will, and that we shall hear something of the result before another week has passed. It is hoped, also, that our friends in other sections will take action on the subject as early as possible, and thus save Mr. Maxson the necessity of suffering on half of others.

☞ As our eastern friends may find difficulty in sending money to DeRuyter, we will volunteer to forward immediately anything which may be left at this office.

PROGRESS OF THE SUNDAY REFORM MOVEMENT.

"Observance of the Sabbath.—We learn from the best authority, that from and after the first of November next there will be no traveling on the railroads between Albany and Buffalo. Ever since the appointment of Mr. Brooks on the section of the road between Auburn and Rochester, that gentleman, we are informed, has been anxious to suspend the travel on the Lord's day. All the directors of the several sections have now come to the determination to run only six days of the week. It is generally believed, that at the next session of our Legislature an act will be passed to close the canals on Sunday." [Com. Adv.

Do our friends understand, that a desperate effort is now making to head off Sabbath-keepers in their efforts for a more general and scriptural observance of the Lord's Sabbath? If they do not, the above extract, which we clip from a paper of no mean authority, will apprise them of it. It is an old resort of the religious intolerant, when he cannot convince an opponent, to appeal to the law to compel conformity. So of our present opponents, the special advocates of Sunday observation; instead of meeting us at the bar of public opinion, and showing that the Christian Statute Book requires the observance of Sunday with any special regard, as we ask them to do, they appeal to the directors of the Railroad, Steamboat, and Transportation Companies, to the Commissioners of the State Canals, and finally to the strong arm of the law, to enforce the better observance of Sunday, and to make Sabbath-keepers ignoble at the same time that they compel them to labor under as many difficulties as possible in keeping the Sabbath and in getting others to do so. We trust, however, that our brethren will take timely warning, and make it the occasion of spreading more widely the true doctrine of the Sabbath, and of exposing the Romish and Jesuitical tendencies of such efforts. Who would believe, that men professing to have almost a monopoly of all the religion in Christianity, would stoop to such means to enforce their unscriptural dogmas—to enforce by statute law the sacred observance of a day which nine-tenths of them would admit, if in argumentation with us, possesses no sacredness above other days? Yet such is the case. And at the same time, these modern apostles are spending what remains of their breath after this effort, in declaming against the exclusive tendencies of Romanism—its persecuting, dogmatical, and unchristian spirit! It is a pity that the mirror into which they look to see the spirit and tendencies of Romanism, is not sufficiently large and true for them to see themselves.

We trust that our brethren, in being forewarned, will be forearmed. If we are wise, we shall not wait for the consummation of their pseudo-pious designs before we get up a counter mevement, and now is the time to act. If those who have undertaken to be public carriers to the exclusion of all other means of conveyance, (as railroad companies really do in effect,) are to be wheedled into such movements, and permitted to carry them out—and if the matter is to be brought up at the next session of the Legislature of this State for its sanction by also stopping the canals on Sunday—let us see to it that we have some body there able and willing to defend our rights. American Society for Meliorating the Condition of the Jews—23 Nassau St., N. Y.

The only Missionaries and Traveling Agents employed by this Society are those whose names appear from time to time as such in the Jewish Chronicle. They are at present as follows:—

Rev. Nehemiah Altman, Rev. John Neander, Rev. David L. Proudfit, and Messrs. James Forrester, Silian Bonhomme, Henry I. David, and Felix Pigot.

Still more effectually to guard against deception, it is hoped, that no application for countenance or aid, from parties claiming to act in either capacity for the Board, will be granted, except on the production of a letter of credentials, signed by the President and Recording Secretary, and certified by the Society's seal.

On behalf of the Executive Committee,

John Lillie, Cor. Sec.

Persecution in Syria.—The Missionary Herald, just issued, contains a deeply interesting communication from Mr. Bliss, giving an account of a late outbreak of persecution in Trebizond. The first overt act was the refusal of Christian burial, with circumstances of great dignity, to the body of a woman whose husband and sons were friends of "the new way." Simultaneously with this event, a letter from the Patriarch, "prohibiting all intercourse with the evangelical Armenians, in the way of trade, conversation, or even in giving or receiving salutation in the streets. Those of them who were occupying hired houses or shops, were to be thrust out, if possible; and every other similar method of injuring and harrassing them was to be diligently employed." These commands are promptly executed.

REWARDS OF LABOR.

The Tribune is publishing some statements of an interesting character in relation to the circumstances, conditions and rewards of labor in New York,' which we wish could be read by every father and every mother, that all might know how expensive, after all, are the cheap luxuries of living. We make room for the following extracts:—

The Amazone-braid Weavers, a large and ill. paid class of working females, begin work at 7 o'clock in the morning, and continue until 7 in the evening, with no intermission save to swallow a hasty morsel. They earn when in full employment $2 and $2 50 per week Out of this they must pay their board, washing, (for they have no time to wash their own clothes,) medical and other incidental expenses, and purchase their clothes—to say nothing of the total absence of all healthy recreation and of all mental and moral culture, which such a condition necessarily implies.

The Artificial-flower Makers present a greater variety. The trade, as will readily be perceived, is one requiring great skill and delicacy in the finishing part of the work. Girls who have served five years' apprenticeship at the business, and are very expert, if they work constantly, can make $3,50 per week. The flowers and wreaths which under the name of 'French Flower-work' sell so dear and are so highly valued by our fashionable ladies, are mostly made here, althongh many of the materials are imported from France. The principal part of the work is done by young girls from eleven to thirteen years of age, 'apprentices' as they are termed, who receive seventy-five cents, and a few one dollar, per week! Many a five dollar wreath and expensive flower purchased of the Misses Lawsons, Madame Deuel, or Madame Godfrey, has been wrought into beauty by these little fingers, for perhaps two shillings, or half a dollar!

A great many women who make Match-boxes receive but five cents a gross—or thirty boxes for a cent! We know of a mother of a family who supported her little children by this kind of work, who used to walk two miles to a starch factory to obtain the refuse for pasting the boxes—for which she paid a penny a pail. When she could succeed in procuring this, she said she could make a little profit, but when she had to buy flour to make paste with—then, she said, it was a losing business! Her little children thought so too.

We have already mentioned the Cap Makers, of which we suppose there are between one and two thousand. They earn on the average about two shillings per day, although there are many who do not make more than eighteen pence. They are thrust into a dark back room of a second, third, fourth or fifth story chamber, thirty or forty together, and work from sunrise to sundown. There is too often not a human being in the world who has the slightest care or responsibility over the morals, manners or comforts of these unfortunate girls. If many of them become degraded and brutalized in taste, manners, habits and conversation, who can wonder?

These facts and remarks apply with equal force to the hundreds and thousands of Shoe-binders, Type-rubbers and other girls employed on labor of this kind. In addition to the constant supply to the ranks of these classes furnished by the poor population of our City, poor girls continually flock to the City from every part of the country, either because their friends are dead and they have no home, or because they have certain vague dreams of the charms of City life. Arriving here they soon find how bitterly they have deceived themselves, and how rashly they have entered a condition where it is almost impossible for them to subsist, and where want and starvation are their only companions.

Foreign Mission Anniversary.—The thirty-sixth annual meeting of the American Board of Foreign Missions commences its sessions in Brooklyn, N. Y., the 9th of September, to be continued for three days. The Hon. Theodore Frelinghuysen is expected to preside, and the Rev. President Hopkins, of Williams College, to deliver a discourse, to be followed by other interesting exercises. The receipts of the Society for the past year have amounted to $255,000. It has now about 90 stations, occupied as so many important radiating points of Christian light and influence on the surrounding nations, and sustains at present 135 clerical Missionaries, besides 220 male and female Assistants; making in all, in connection with native Assistants, 494, with their numerous Schools, Churches, and Printing estsblishments, sustained by the Board. The Anniversaries of this Board have, from year to year, been regarded with constantly increasing interest. The one at Worcester, last year, was attended by about a thousand clergymen and others from a distance, who enjoyed the generous hospitalities of the town,—cordially tendered by families of all denominations.

China.—Rev. J. L. Shuck, with a number of other Missionaries, having recently removed from Hongkong to Canton, writes as follows:—

Dr. Devan and myself are permanent residents of this mighty city. Canton contains one million of immortal souls, speaking one dialect, and accessible to missionary effort. With ten native preachers, we are laying plans for the most vigorous operations—it is indeed and in truth a glorious field. The late American Treaty renders us and our converts secure. The people eagerly receives our books, receives us politely, crowd our chapels, and listen with attention to our messages. It is said that the Emperor has publicly sanctioned the introduction of Christianity into the empire. The present Governor of Canton province, who resides in this city, is a gentleman of uncommon abilities and good feeling. He signed the treaties made with China by England, France, and the United States. When on a visit of state to Honkong, I presented him with a copy of the New Testament in Chinese; he received it politely, and also a few tracts in Chinese, on the principles of Christianity; and on his return to Canton, sent me a splendid fan, with his own autograph upon it.

There is a minister in Nova Scotia by the name of Dimack, who is 76 years of age, has been a professor of religion 60 years, a preacher 55, and pastor of the church in Chester 52.

General Intelligence.

From the War District.—The New Orleans papers contain full accounts of the military movements in the south-west. The United States troops are rapidly concentrating on the Texan frontier, and large numbers of military companies in the Southern and South-Western cities are offering their services to government, in case they shall be needed. There are now concentrated at Pensacola, belonging to the American Navy, two steam frigates, the Mississippi and Princeton, the frigate Potomac, the sloops of war John Adams, Falmouth, and Saratoga or St. Mary's, and the brigs of war Somers and Porpoise. On the Western coast of Mexico, there are, or shortly will be, eight of our vessels of war, and this force will be increased by the vessels of the East India squadron, now on their way home.

Purser Ramsley arrived at Pensacola on the 20th ult. from Mobile, with $100,000 for the use of the squadron.

Delaware County in a state of Insurrection!—The Albany Argus of the 28th, contains a Proclamation from Gov. Wright, declaring the County of Delaware to be in a state of insurrection, according to the provisions and true intent and meaning of the act of the Legislature, entitled "An act to enforce the laws and preserve order," passed 15th April, 1845. Any person who shall, after the publication of this Proclamation, resist, or assist in resisting, the execution of legal process; or who shall aid, or attempt, the rescue or escape of any prisoner from lawful custody or confinement, or who shall resist, or aid or assist in resisting, any force ordered out by the Governor, in the County of Delaware, is, upon conviction of either of these offences, to be adjudged guilty of a felony; "and punished by imprisonment in the State Prison for a term not less than two years."

The Proclamation fills more than two columns of the Argus. It begins with a particular statement of facts already known, and which the Governor thinks sufficient to warrant him in complying with the request of the Sheriff, District Attorney, Judges and other officers of the Peace, that he would exercise the power conferred upon him by the statute above alluded to. It closes with direct appeals to the several classes of men concerned in the difficulties—to the freemen of the State, to the Tenants who disapprove of the disguised and armed force by which the violations of law have been perpetrated, to the Proprietors or Landlords of the leasehold estates, and finally to the disguised men themselves.

Rent Compromise in Sullivan County.—We are happy to learn from the Monticello Watchman that Commodore Ridgely, (on the part of his heirs,) and nearly eighty of the Ridgely tenants, some of them the most violent anti-renters of the town of Neversink, have entered into an arrangement which is mutually satisfactory, and by which the tenants will become bona fide owners of the soil; tenants to pay back rents, and the Commodore to sell the land and give deeds as soon as a decree can be obtained from the Chancellor, authorizing the sale, the heirs being minors.

Referees are to decide how much tenants must pay for the land, in case of disagreement upon the price. John Hunter, who probably owns more leased property than any one else in the County, has signified his willingness to sell, and anti-rentism and leaseism will soon be abolished in Sullivan. We hope to hear similar good tidings from other Counties. [Tribune.

From the Sandwich Islands.—The Express has a file of the "Friend" to May 16th, overland, by the Ann Louisa. We extract a few items of interest.

The papers give an account of the funeral ceremonies at the interment of T. Haalilio, of His Majesty's Envoys.

A late gale at Lahaina produced a great commotion in the whaling fleet at anchor in the roadstead. Between 30 and 40 ships put to sea, and only the Morea of New Bedford rode out the gale, and she came near going upon the reef.—Vermont of Mystic, lost chain and anchor, jib-boom and flying jib-boom and spritsail yard.—Nantasket was run into by Vermont, and carried away three topsail yards and three boats. Calumet, of Stonington, lost jib and flying jib-boom, chain and anchor. Isaac Hicks, fore-yard, three anchors and chains. We have heard the damage estimated at between 30 and $40,000 to the whole fleet. At Honolulu the gale was severe, but no damage.

Further Outrages in Lexington, Ky.—The Lexington Inquirer of 22d ult., says:—"After the peaceable and orderly termination on Monday last, of the excitement and difficulties growing out of the removal of the press and types used in the printing of an Abolition paper in this city, the citizens began to congratulate themselves upon the restoration of peace and quiet in the city, and the prospect of its continuing so. But they were doomed to disappointment, for on Thursday night our streets were the scenes of several most brutal and disgraceful outragas. A few of the choice spirits of the city, occupying a position in society not the most enviable, and not being satisfied with the peaceable termination of Monday's work, made an attack, during the night, upon several free negroes, and beat them in a most cruel and inhuman manner, tarring and feathering one of them on the public square!

The Press Arrived.—Yesterday morning there was quite a crowd of persons on the landing, looking at the Press and Types of the True American, which has just arrived from Lexington. According to the representation made to us, every thing was in a sad plight—the press was taken to pieces and tumbled out on the wharf, in complete disorder, in the dirt, and the boxes of type broken up and exposed. The "respectable" mobocrats did not execute their task in a very workmanlike manner. [Cincinnati Her., 23d.

The Pope.—The old gentleman is known by the title of Gregory XVI. He was elected to the pontifical chair in February, 1831, is now in his eightieth year, and is much afflicted with a cancer in his nose. The last advices from Europe say he has declared, once for all, that he will not allow railways to be established in the Pontifical States, for it would be dangerous to allow them in a country where there exists such political agitation.

Lightning Rods.—Professor Silliman, in an article respecting certain houses lately destroyed by lightning in New Haven, Ct., notwithstanding they had lightning rods, makes the following statements:

"Lightning rods cannot be relied upon unless they reach the earth, where it is permanently wet, even in times of the severest drouth, and the best security is afforded by carrying the rod or some good metallic conductor, duly connected with it, to the water in the well, or some other water that never fails.

"It is to be feared, that from neglect of this precaution many lightning rods are useless, or nearly so, and that the only reason why apparent is, because the lightning has never given them a trial.

"If their proprietors would not wish to invite such an ordeal, they would do well to examine the condition of their rods. The late occurrences here, do not in the least weaken my confidence in them when properly arranged and connected.

English way of Advertising.—The English have a new way of advertising that is quite worthy of Yankee invention. They have hit upon the time when men's eyes are idle—(when they are abroad in the street)—and you cannot walk now in London without knowing what amusements are going on, what new specifics are for sale, what is the last wonder, and a variety of other matters which send you home wiser than you came out. Mammoth placards, pasted on the sides of a structure as large as a one story house, are continually moving along on wheels at the same pace you walk—the streets really resembling a gorgeous pageant with the number and showiness of these legible locomotives. I observe one particularly, which moves by some mysterious power within—a large showy car making its way alone, without either horse or visible driver, and covered with advertisements in all the colors of the rainbow. An every day sight is a procession of a dozen men, in single file, each carrying on a high pole, exactly the same theatrical notice. You might let one pass unread, but you read them, where there are so many, to see if they are alike! Men step up to you at every corner and hand you, with a very polite air, a neatly folded paper, and you cannot refuse it without pushing your breast against the man's hand. If you open it, you are told where you can see a 'mysterious lady,' or where you can have your corns cut. In short, it is impossible to be ignorant of what there is to see and buy in London, and this applies also to the large class who could not, formerly, be reached, because they never read the advertisements in newspapers. Possibly the carriers of these signboards and the drivers of these vehicles might make a better use of their time and horse flesh in America, but otherwise I should think this a 'notion' worth transplanting. [Willis.

Electro Magnetism.—We learn that a gentleman of Pennsylvania has discovered a means of applying the force generated by Electro Magnetism to the propelling of railroad cars and trains, so as to reduce immensely the cost of motive power. The invention has the farther effect of preventing any running off the track, and so ensuring the safety of passengers from what has hitherto been a formidable danger, especially while in rapid motion. He is now taking out patents for this country, and intends to do so for all Europe, before the process is disclosed to the public. Should his sanguine expectations be realized, there is hardly a limit to the revolution which will follow, or to the profits of the inventor. [Tribune.

Ancient Religion of the South.—A copy of the "Impartial Herald" of Nov. 17, 1795, printed in Newburyport, contains the following, which we find in the list of Deaths:

Died, on the 9th of Oct. last, at Beaufort in South Carolina, the Rev. Matthew Tate, in the 46th year of his age.

In his will were the following paragraphs:

"I enjoin it upon my executors to publish in all the newspapers in Charleston, that I depart life under a full persuasion, that if I died in possession of a slave, I should not conceive myself admissive into the kingdom of heaven.

"Acquaint Dr. Rush, of Philadelphia, of my decease, and request him to insert the above in the papers of that city."

This was before South Carolina was wholly given over to tyranny—before the spirit of the revolution had entirely died out.

Troops from Old Point.—The bark Bachelor, of Richmond, has been chartered by the Government to transport troops from Fortress Monroe to Texas. She dropped down James river on Thursday evening, and probably went to sea from Hampton Roads on Sunday. She was to convey about two hundred men.

Industry.—Dr. Carey completed the translation of the entire Scriptures, in seven of the principle languages of India, viz. the Sanscrit, the Bengalee, the Hindu, the Ooria, the Mahratta, the Punjabee, and the Assamese. In addition he completed the translation of the New Testament in several others, besides superintending the printing of the translations in other languages still. These early translations, made in the first stages of acquaintance with the languages of the East, are necessarily very imperfect: but they show what a single individual may accomplish in very difficult circumstances, under the influence of the love of souls, when it becomes the master passion.

The Time to Blush.—"Blush not now," said a distinguished Italian to his young relative, whom he met issuing from a haunt of vice, "you should have blushed when you went in." The heart alone is safe which shrinks from the slightest contact or conception of evil, and waits not to inquire, what will the world say.

Every wharf commanding a view of our harbor was lined with spectators and the Battery was a mass of animated beings, while the river was alive with boats of every description.

It has been proposed to form a new State west of Arkansas, to embrace the Creek, Choctaw and Cherokee Indian tribes. If the Indians have arrived at a sufficient degree of civilization, this should be done, as it would give to the Indian inhabitants a new incentive to make further advances in education and civilization, and assimilate their government to our free institutions.

Another brilliant meteor was seen at New Haven in the South-East, about 8 o'clock on Thursday morning, larger in appearance than Mars in full lustre. The centre was of pale blue, the edges of an intense brightness and white, its shape seemed oval, and it was followed by a long liquid train of the usual tint, and resembling molten metal in its flow. It was visible three or four seconds.

Some rowdies undertook to create a disturbance; but the Republican rebukes them manfully for their conduct.

Col. Valentine Shuffler, a soldier of '76, died at Jonestown, Lebanon Co., Pa., on the 7th inst., at the advanced age of 93 years and 4 months. The Colonel began his career as Captain of a Volunteer Company in the Indian wars. He served at the Battle of Bunker Hill, where he was made a prisoner by the British. He soon made his escape and reached the American Camp, and afterwards served in the engagements at Trenton, at Brandywine, and at Germantown, as Sergeant, Captain, and Major.

Hester, John Hester, and Abner Smith. Pursuit was immediately made, however, by the owner, and the negroes were delivered to him. John Hester has been arrested and committed to jail.

Miscellaneous.

PASS ON, RELENTLESS WORLD.

Swifter and swifter, day by day,
Down Time's unquiet current hurl'd,
Thou passest on thy reckless way,
Tumultuous and unstable world.
Thou passest on! Time hath not seen
Delay upon thy hurried path:
And prayers and tears alike have been
In vain to stay thy course of wrath!

Thou passest on, and with thee go
The loves of youth, the cares of age;
And smiles and tears, and joy and wo,
Are on thy history's troubled page!
There, every day, like yesterday,
Writes hopes that end in mockery;
But who shall tear the veil away,
Before the abyss of things to be?

Thou passest on, and at thy side,
Even as a shade, Oblivion treads,
And o'er the dreams of human pride
His misty shroud forever spreads;
Where all thine iron hand hath traced,
Upon that gloomy scroll to-day,
With records ages since effaced,
Like them shall live, like them decay.

Thou passest on, with thee the vain,
Who sport upon thy flaunting blaze,
Pride, framed of dust, and folly's train,
Who court thy love and run thy ways:
But thou and I—and be it so—
Press onward to eternity;
Yet not together let us go
To that deep-voiced but shoreless sea.

Thou hast thy friends—I would have mine;
Thou hast thy thoughts—leave me my own;
I kneel not at thy gilded shrine,
I bow not to thy slavish throne;
I see them pass without a sigh—
They wake no swelling raptures now;
The fierce delights that fire thine eye,
The triumphs of thy haughty brow.

Pass on, relentless world! I grieve
No more for all that thou hast riven;
Pass on, in God's name—only leave
The things thou never yet hast given—
A heart at ease, a mind at home,
Affections fixed above thy sway,
Faith set upon a world to come,
And patience through life's little day.

FEMALE EDUCATION.

(Concluded.)

It is of great importance to a country, that there should be as many understandings as possible actively employed within it. Mankind are much happier for the discovery of barometers, thermometers, steam-engines, and all the innumerable inventions in the arts and sciences. We are every day and every hour reaping the benefit of such talent and ingenuity. The same observation is true of such works as those of Dryden, Pope, Milton, and Shakspeare. Mankind are much happier that such individuals have lived and written; they add every day to the stock of public enjoyment—and perpetually gladden and embellish life. Now, the number of those who exercise their understandings to any good purpose, is exactly in proportion to those who exercise it at all; but, as the matter stands at present, half the talent in the universe runs to waste, and is totally unprofitable. It would have been almost as well for the world, hitherto, that women, instead of possessing the capacities they do at present, should have been born wholly destitute of wit, genius, and every other attribute of mind, of which men make so eminent an use: and the ideas of use and possession are so united together, that, because it has been the custom in almost all countries to give to women a different and a worse education than to men, the notion has obtained that they do not possess faculties which they do not cultivate. Just as, in breaking up a common, it is sometimes very difficult to make the poor believe it will carry corn, merely because they have been hitherto accustomed to see it produce nothing but weeds and grass—they very naturally mistake present condition for general nature. So completely have the talents of women been kept down, that there is scarcely a single work, either of reason or imagination, written by a woman, which is in general circulation either in the English, French, or Italian literature;—scarcely one that has crept into the ranks of our minor poets.

If the possession of excellent talents is not a conclusive reason why they should be improved, it at least amounts to a very strong presumption; and, if it can be shown that women may be trained to reason and imagine as well as man, the strongest reasons are certainly necessary to show us why we should not avail ourselves of such rich gifts of nature; and we have a right to call for the clear statement of those perils which make it necessary that such talents should be totally extinguished, or, at most, very partially drawn out. The burthen of proof does not lie with those who say, increase the quantity of talent in any country as much as possible—for such a proposition is in conformity with every man's feelings: but it lies with those who say, take care to keep that understanding weak and trifling, which nature has made strong and powerful. The paradox is with them, not with us. In all human reasoning, knowledge must be taken for a good, till it can be shown to be an evil. But now, nature makes to us rich and magnificent presents; and we say to her—You are too luxuriant and munificent—we must keep you under and prune you;—we have talents enough in the other half of the creation;—and if you will not stupefy and enfeeble the mind of women to our hands, we ourselves must expose them to a narcotic process, and educate away that fatal redundance with which the world is afflicted, and the order of sublunary things deranged.

One of the greatest pleasures of life is conversation; and the pleasures of conversation are of course enhanced by every increase of knowledge: not that we should meet together to talk about alkalis and angles, or to add to our stock of history and philology—though a little of these things is no bad ingredient in conversation; but let the subject be what it may, there is always a prodigious difference between the conversation of those who have not enjoyed this advantage. Education gives fecundity of thought, copiousness of illustration, quickness, vigor, fancy, words, images, and illustrations;—it decorates every common thing, and gives the power of trifling without being undignified and absurd. The subjects themselves may not be wanted upon which the talents of an educated man have been exercised; but there is always a demand for those talents which his education has rendered strong and quick. Now, really nothing can be further from our intention than to say any thing rude and unpleasant; but we must be excused for observing that it is not now a very common thing to be interested by the variety and extent of female knowledge, but it is a very common thing to lament that the finest faculties in the world have been confined to trifles utterly unworthy of their richness and their strength.

The pursuit of knowledge is the most innocent and interesting occupation which can be given to the female sex; nor can there be a better method of checking a spirit of dissipation than by diffusing a taste for literature. The way to attack vice, is by setting up something else against it. Give to women, in early youth, something to acquire, of sufficient interest and importance to command the application of their mature faculties, and to excite their perseverance in future life;—teach them that happiness is to be derived from the acquisition of knowledge, as well as the gratification of vanity: and you will raise up a much more formidable barrier against dissipation than an host of exhortations and invectives can supply.

It sometimes happens that an unfortunate man gets drunk with very bad wine,—not to gratify his palate but to forget his cares:—he does not set any value on what he receives, but on account of what it excludes:—it keeps out something worse than itself. Now, though it were denied that the acquisition of serious knowledge is of itself important to a woman, still it presents a taste for silly and pernicious works of imagination; it keeps away the horrid trash of novels; and, in lieu of that eagerness for emotion and adventure which books of that sort inspire, promotes a calm and steady temperament of mind.

A man who deserves such a piece of good fortune, may generally find an excellent companion for all the vicissitudes of life; but it is not so easy to find a companion for his understanding, who has similar pursuits with himself, or who can comprehend the pleasure he derives from them. We really see no reason why it should not be otherwise; nor comprehend how the pleasures of domestic life can be promoted by diminishing the number of subjects in which persons who are to spend their lives together take a common interest.

One of the most agreeable consequences of knowledge is the respect and importance it communicates to old age. Men rise in character often as they increase in years;—they are venerable from what they have acquired, and pleasing from what they can impart. If they outlive their faculties, the mere frame itself is respected for what it once contained; but women (such is their unfortunate style of education) hazard every thing upon one cast of the die;—when youth is gone, all is gone. No human creature gives his admiration for nothing: either the eye must be charmed, or the understanding gratified. A woman must talk wisely or look well. Every human being must put up with the coldest civility, who has neither the charms of youth nor the wisdom of age. Neither is there the slightest commiseration for decayed accomplishments;—no man mourns over the fragments of a dancer, or drops a tear on the relics of musical skill. They are flowers destined to perish; but the decay of great talents is always the subject of solemn pity; and even when their last memorial is over, their ruins and vestiges are regarded with pious affection.

There is no connection between the ignorance in which women are kept, and the preservation of moral and religious principle; and yet certainly there is, in the minds of some timid and respectable persons, a vague, indefinite dread of knowledge, as if it were capable of producing these effects. It might almost be supposed, from the dread which the propagation of knowledge has excited, that there was some great secret which was to be kept in impenetrable obscurity,—that all moral rules were a species of delusion and imposture, the detection of which by the improvement of the understanding, would be attended with the most fatal consequences to all, and particularly to women. If we could possibly understand what these great secrets were, we might perhaps be disposed to concur in their preservation; but believing that all the salutary rules which are imposed on women are the result of true wisdom, and productive of the greatest happiness, we cannot understand how they are to become less sensible of this truth in proportion as their power of discovering truth in general is increased, and the habit of viewing questions with accuracy and comprehension established by education. There are men, indeed, who are always exclaiming against every species of power, because it is connected with danger: their dread of abuses is so much stronger than their admiration of uses, that they would cheerfully give up the use of fire, gunpowder, and printing, to be freed from robbers, incendiaries, and libels. It is true that every increase of knowledge may possibly render depravity more depraved, as well as it may increase the strength of virtue. It is in itself only power; and its value depends on its application. But, trust to the natural love of good where there is no temptation to be bad—it operates nowhere more forcibly than in education. No man, whether he be tutor, guardian, or friend, ever contents himself with infusing the mere ability to acquire; but giving the power, he gives it with a taste for the wise and rational exercise of that power; so that an educated person is not only one with stronger and better faculties than others, but with a more useful propensity—a disposition better cultivated—and associations of a higher and more important class.

In short, and to recapitulate the main points upon which we have insisted:—Why the disproportion in knowledge between the two sexes should be so great, when the inequality in natural talents is so small; or why the understanding of women should be lavished upon trifles, when nature has made it capable of higher and better things, we profess ourselves not able to understand. The affectation charged upon female knowledge is best cured by making that knowledge more general: and the economy devolved upon women is best secured by the ruin, disgrace, and inconvenience which proceeds from neglecting it. For the care of children nature has made a direct and powerful provision; and the gentleness and elegance of women is the natural consequence of that desire to please, which is productive of the greatest part of civilization and refinement, and which rests upon a foundation too deep to be shaken by any such modifications in education as we have proposed. If you educate women to attend to dignified and important subjects, you are multiplying, beyond measure, the chances of human improvement, by preparing and medicating these early impressions, which always come from the mother; and which, in a great majority of instances, are quite decisive of character and genius. Nor is it only in the business of education that women would influence the destiny of men. If women know more, men must learn more—for ignorance would then be shameful—and it would become the fashion to be instructed. The instruction of women improves the stock of national talents, and employs more minds for the instruction and amusement of the world;—it increases the pleasures of society, by multiplying the topics upon which the two sexes take a common interest; and makes marriage an intercourse of understanding as well as of affection, by giving dignity and importance to the female character. The education of women favors public morals; it provides for every season of life, as well as for the brightest and the best; and leaves a woman when she is stricken by the hand of time, not as she now is, destitute of every thing, and neglected by all; but with the full power and the splendid attractions of knowledge,—diffusing the elegant pleasures of polite literature, and receiving the just homage of learned and accomplished men.

A VISIT TO GRAND LIGNE.

The following account of a visit to the mission at Grand Ligne, Canada, is given by a correspondent of the Advocate of Moral Reform, under date of St. Johns, L. C., August 12, 1845:—

Grand Ligne, (the Great Line, so named because it is the grand division between extensive manors) is distant from this village about 9 miles. I had, on my passage down Lake Champlain, providentially met a teacher connected with the mission, from whom I received a polite and pressing invitation to pass the Sunday in the mission family. I needed but little urging; for ever since I first heard the name of Madame Feller, my heart has been with her and her devoted associates. I reached Grand Ligne about 8 o'clock on Saturday evening. The family were expecting me, and gave me a cordial greeting before I entered the house. The road from St. Johns is none of the best, and a thorough jolting in a Canada wagon had fatigued me not a little; but so welcome a reception as these disciples gave me was an abundant compensation for all my fatigue.

The principal missionaries are Madame Feller, M. Roussy, pastor, and M. Normandeau and lady. M. Gavin, also a clergyman, was on a visit to the mission, and will probably be connected with it permanently. Madame Feller, M. Roussy, and M. Gavin, were neighbors in Luzerne, Switzerland, and the two former came over to this country in company. M. Normandeau is a converted Catholic priest. The story of his conversion is a most interesting one, but I can only give the outline of it. It seems he had contracted the habit, pretty early in life, of thinking for himself—a habit quite common among Protestants—but considered very heretical, I believe, by most Romanists. He was a good scholar for a Catholic priest, and held at one time a professorship in the College at Quebec. Afterwards he was transferred to a poor parish, where there was a mere shell of a building for a church, and where he set himself to work resolutely to improve the spiritual and intellectual condition of the flock. The church edifice was repaired at the expense of some twelve hundred dollars, for which amount he gave his own obligation. Very soon after the repairs were made, the Bishop directed him to leave this parish for another in the same condition in which he found the first. M. Normandeau remonstrated with his reverence, but to no purpose. He begged the privilege of remaining until he could pay the debt he had contracted, but the Bishop was inexorable. The poor priest had the alternative, either to make the exchange in a specified time, or consent to be degraded. The freedom of opinion in which he had indulged had doubtless rendered him odious to the Bishop, and he took this course to humble him. M. Normandeau left his parish, but instead of settling down coolly and submissively in the other one, like a good Catholic, he directed his course to the city of New York. He could scarcely understand a word of English at this time; but curiosity led him to attend the services of several Protestant churches, where he was struck with the simplicity and apparent sincerity of the worshipers, and as he contrasted the worship with that of his own church, he was not slow in arriving at an inference somewhat discreditable to the church of Rome. He became an inquirer after truth. On his return home he called upon M. Roussy, at the Grand Ligne mission, and desired to receive instruction in the Greek language, with the view of becoming better acquainted with the New Testament Scriptures. The result of this visit was his engagement as a teacher at the mission; where, in a few months afterwards, it is hoped, he became really, what he had before been nominally, a disciple of the Lord Jesus. This was some three or four years ago. He has ever since been a most devoted missionary, and a very important helper in the work of evangelizing the Canadian French.

The wife of M. Normandeau is an American lady. She appears to be all that is desirable for the post she occupies. She is the only one of the missionaries who speaks the English language fluently, and on this account alone, she would be a valuable accession to the mission. I will not trust myself to say all I feel in relation to her and Madame Feller, for there is a spice of enthusiasm in my constitution; but I must say that I have seldom met two individuals, whom in so short a time I have learned to esteem so highly. Indeed, the image of Christ seems deeply impressed upon the hearts of all these disciples, and I shall long cherish their memory for the Christian spirit they exhibited while I was under their roof.

The present number of pupils in the institution is about 15 or 20; but the influence of the mission is felt for many miles around, and quite a number have, through its influence, been rescued from the power of the beast, and are now either adorning Christ's spiritual edifice on earth, or singing his praises in Heaven.

M. Roussy, the pastor, conducted the services on Sunday morning, in the chapel. Though unused to the French tongue, and able to understand but little either of the prayers or the sermon, I felt that it was good to be there. Never did I join in the services of the sanctuary more sincerely and devoutly; and as the man of God dwelt on the theme of redeeming grace, and the emotions of his soul were pictured in his countenance, I felt that there was something electric in the truth of the gospel, though clothed in a language to which I was almost a stranger.

I conducted the evening service, and preached in English. The number who understood me perfectly was small; but there is an anxiety on the part of all the pupils to learn the English language, and I had attentive listeners among those who could only understand here and there a word. I was amazed, as well as affected, by a remark of one of the young men, who said, in the simplicity of his heart, that he always loved to hear preaching in English; for he was converted in English, and spiritual thoughts seemed sweeter when conveyed in that language.

Madame Feller and her associates have endured great tribulation for Christ's sake since they entered upon their labors among the Canadians; and many times their lives have been endangered from the rage of the Catholics; but He who so long preserved his servant the Apostle of the Gentiles, has hitherto protected them from violence, and the opposition of the community in and about Grand Ligne is gradually diminishing.

There is a farm connected with the mission of some 80 acres, much of which is under cultivation. The mission house is built of the limestone obtained in the vicinity. It is a tasteful edifice, with a cupola and a bell. The building stands some three or four rods from the street, and is approached by a curved road wide enough for a carriage, on either side of an oval lawn, occupying the centre of the front yard. There is a commendable taste displayed about all the premises contiguous to the house, and particularly in one of the two gardens on either side. This garden is laid out in excellent order, and is adorned with a variety of beautiful flowers. Thanks to our Heavenly Father that he has spread these charming things all over the earth, and that they bloom as sweetly in the wilds of Canada as they do under the Southern Sun. Precious flowers! The world would be more cheerless than it is were it not for their smiling faces. I never felt the value of flowers so much before as I did when I saw them blushing in all their beauty and glory in the garden at Grand Ligne, to cheer those who had left their home amid the pleasant hills of Switzerland, for the toils and privations of missionary life in a strange land. Precious flowers! I do not wonder that the great prince of Epic poets, when he weaves a sad strain for our first mother as she turns to leave the fair scenes of Paradise, I do not wonder that he makes her weep for the flowers. Dr. Johnson has wondered at it, but he was a great man, and a great critic, and had a peculiar faculty for discovering microscopic defects and deformities. For myself, I think nothing is more natural than that Eve, leaving forever the garden where she had been so happy, should shed some tears over the flowers she had reared with her own hands, and which she had loved both for their beauty and the silent lesson they taught of the goodness of God. But criticism aside, one of these dear disciples observed to me that no one that had not been placed in similar circumstances could imagine what a blessing they found in these flowers. There is a large summer-house, built in the form of an octagon, in the centre of this garden, and one smaller in each corner, all covered with the foliage of the vine.

Madame Feller speaks English with difficulty; but I had a delightful conversation with her through the medium of an interpreter. Her whole heart is in her work. Never was missionary more devoted; and seldom, I am sure, was one more beloved. "Oh," said the Frenchman who was sent to conduct me back to this place, and who did his best to suit my English ears, "Oh Madame Feller bon dame, bon dame!" and as he said it, his eyes, "albeit unused to the melting mood," betrayed the emotions of his heart.

I left these brethren and sisters with real regret, though the regret, thanks to our Heavenly Father, was sweetened with the hope of soon seeing them nearly all at Montreal, where they go to attend a meeting of the friends of the mission, during the present week. The God of missions bless them ever in their labor of love. They have entered upon a great work. There are seven hundred thousand Frenchmen in Canada, nearly all of whom worship the mother of harlots. These are bound to their religion by the strong chain of superstition forged by the priesthood, and nothing but the Holy Ghost can break it. But these self-denying disciples are doing what they can in reliance on the Spirit. Their labors have been blessed. They have already reaped a golden harvest.

MISERIES OF THE FALLEN.

"Surely there are no sinners so earnestly commended by the loving-kindness of our Lord to the pity of Christians; for there are no sinners who by the usages of the world are so absolutely lost, so cast out of its sight, so abandoned to the bitterness of their own tormented soul. A fallen woman the world counts it righteous to forsake and scorn. Even her own kindred turn their backs, and shut the door of home upon her. None meet a harder judgment, or more unequal measures from the world. Great and deadly indeed their sin has been, and fearfully are they made to answer for it. None are to be pitied more; none are more sinned against. Even the most abandoned were once purer than the possessed being by whom they were betrayed. They were, perhaps, the weak and shrinking objects of temptation. It may be, some base superior, who held them in check by fear, and awed them into crime; or the vile example of a mother, or the hateful trafficking of a parent was their ruin. Multitudes may be said to perish against their will—decoyed or forced into the pit. Sometimes out of such beginnings, when the habit of inward chastity has as yet been hardly breathed upon, the whole is lost, and they are launched into a career of daring and reckless profligacy. Shame, fear, horror, bar up their return. The drop has fallen; behind them is a gulf they cannot pass; retreat is all cut off. There seems now to be nothing left but to hurry onward unto death; to fling themselves headlong upon the whirlpool, that they may stun the recollection of purity, the consciousness of guilt. God alone is the witness of the groanings which are breathed unknown, and the burning tears which are shed in the very depths of impurity. What harrowing recollections of faces dearly loved, last seen in anguish—of the fresh years of early childhood; and the hopes, and joys, and fair prospects of an innocent and gentle life, all seared and blasted, come back upon them in the hours of unholy revel to be their mockery and torment. No eye but His can read the visions of home and happy days, which rise upon their desolate hearts in the tumult and darkness of these crowded streets, and the agonizing dreams of a blessedness no longer theirs, by which their broken sleep is haunted. None other but He can know what unutterable agony goes up by day and by night from the loathsome chambers and pestilential dens in which these homeless, decaying mortals hide themselves in misery to die. And what a death is the death of a harlot!—when the baffled heart wanders in dreams of sickness to die in the home of its birth, and wakes up from the happiness of delirium to madden itself again in the sights and sounds which harass its miserable death-bed—when the eye strains itself in vain for the vision of a mother's pitying face, and the ear is sick with listening for the coming of brother, husband, child, whose footfall shall be heard never again! Then comes death; and after death, the judgment, and the great white throne, on which He sitteth from whose face both heaven and earth shall flee away. Lamb of God, that takest away the sins of the world, have mercy upon them and us in that day!" [Archdeacon Sinclair.

THE CHRISTIAN'S WORK.—The proper work of the Christian is, the extension of Christianity; the adding to the cloud of witnesses; the diminution of the sons of darkness; the accession of gems to the Redeemer's crown. It is to be imbued with holy, untiring anxieties to rescue beings like themselves from going down to the pit; and because time is short, to devote every power, to consecrate every talent, devise every means, employ every resource, to 'save souls from death,'—constantly to remember, that men are always perishing; that, therefore, we should be always laboring: and the season for activity is circumscribed—and that ere long, the night will come—it is coming—when our tongues shall be silent, our hands motionless, and our hearts pulseless; 'for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave whither thou goest.'

A WORD TO YOUNG MEN, AND YOUNG WOMEN.

"That women adorn themselves in modest apparel . . . not with broidered hair, or gold, or perals, or costly array;" 1st. Timothy 2d. chapter, 9th verse.

St. Paul addressed these words to women, but they will apply, well, to both sexes. That men and women, at the present day, do not regard the apostle's injunction, or exhortation, is a truth that cannot be denied. Pride and extravagance keep pace—yes, outstrip the age of the country For a considerable time, after our Pilgrim fathers landed in America, the people heeded the Apostle's injunction; but how is it in 1845? Modest and simple apparel (with the mass) has become obsolete. How much time is needlessly spent in adjusting and embroidering hair! How many undertake to adorn themselves with gold rings and gold watches, that are not, actually, worth a fourpence! How many people are determined to have fine and expensive apparel, when something simple and plain, would be much more for their interest and credit. "For loveliness needs not the foreign aid of ornament, but is, when unadorned, adorned the most." It is much to be lamented, that such a competition exists. A vast many are trying to outdo. It matters not whether they be rich or poor. Counting the cost is out of the question. The leading object is to get the things desired, as to the pay, they are very indifferent.

Now if the apostle be correct, then many are acting an unwise part. They are unwise, because finery and superfluity, instead of adding to people's good looks, greatly detract therefrom. They are unwise because it is a prolific source of embarrassment and injustice. They are unwise, because it is actually a sin. For the improvement of our time and money, we are assured we must render an account. If it shall appear, we have misimproved the talents committed to us, we must be considered unprofitable servants.

[UNUS POPULI

GETHSEMANE.

"And being in an agony he sweat as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground."

In contemplating the example of our Lord, what scene is more full of touching interest than that in Gethsemane. The hour of anguish, of conflict with the hosts of earth and hell was fast approaching. Jesus, the brightness of the Father's glory—the adored of Heaven—the hope of earth—was about to fulfil his mission of suffering. He stood alone—human sympathy was not offered—human wretchedness, and the sin of the self ruined, were the theme that induced that prayer of agony. Suppose he had fainted beneath the weight that was pressing upon him, and calling for legions of Angels, had with them ascended on high, leaving the work of our redemption incomplete. Man might have done thus, but not so our Saviour. Although he so well knew

"The price of pardon was his blood
His pity ne'er withdrew."

That hour in Gethsemane! How precious and hallowed the associations that cluster about it. Who can look upon the sufferer there, and realize why it was that prayer ascended and that blood oozed forth—without soul melting sorrow for the sin that cost the sacrifice? Who can look by faith within the veil and hear that same compassionate voice now interceding for the sinner, and then with an eye of love fixed on the soul saying, "come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden"—without flying at once with adoring gratitude to ONE thus able and willing to save.

For the tried and tempted no place is like the garden and the cross. No where else can the soul acquire such lessons of humility and love. How delightful is it to learn there that "Earth has no sorrow that Heaven cannot heal." In the light of Christ's sufferings and sacrifices for us, what can we endure worthy of the name of sufferings and sacrifices? What are earth's trials compared with that eternal banishment from his presence, that had been our doom but for his boundless love.

In sickness, in bereavement, amid persecutions, afflictions and the blight of every cherished hope—there is one unfailing panacea, viz., a view, such as faith gives, of a suffering, risen Saviour. With this mental vision, united with the remembrance of his own gracious words that come thronging in quick succession—

"A joy springs up amid distress,
A fountain in the wilderness."

"It pleased Him to make the Captain of our salvation perfect through suffering." Are we willing to tread in his steps by receiving with filial cheerfulness whatever cup his hand shall mingle, or permit to be mingled for us? Are we willing, if need be, to "resist unto blood striving against sin?" Of the company above it is said, "these are they that came out of great tribulation." Who of us shall join their number when a few more days are fled? Who of us are living near the cross—like Enoch walking with God—like David meditating daily upon his precepts—and like Job feeling—though he slay me yet will I trust in him! Who of us can count it all joy when we fall into divers temptations? Who of us have the spirit of the primitive disciples—live for others as they lived—rebuke sin as they rebuked it—seek to save the lost as they sought to save them, and realize the value of the soul as they realized it? With the same Saviour, the same gospel, the same commands and promises, why should we not, living or dying, imitate their holy example. Adv. Moral Reform.

WANDERING MUSICIANS.

Among the crowds of emigrants daily landing in New York, it is frequently the case with individuals, that they resort at once to street-begging—rag-picking—or strolling about with a dilapidated harp, organ, tambourine, or guitar; and of late the number of wandering musicians seems to have greatly increased. Pass along our principal thoroughfares when you will, except on the Sabbath, and you can scarcely miss the sight of healthy looking men, or robust masculine women, with a hurdy-gurdy of some sort, out of which they continue to bring sounds of discord as harsh as their own looks.

There are now several women dressed in Swiss costume, who go about singing and playing before the rum shops, and on board of the steamboats that ply between the city and the different landings on Staten Island, Long Island, and New Jersey; and some dressed less strikingly, generally accompanied by a little girl or two who solicit the contributions of by-standers. It is really heart-sickening to witness such modes of obtaining a livelihood, and well would our municipal police be employed in preventing it. The vulgar remarks, the obscene jests, the lewd gestures, bandied between the singers and their audiences are frequently revolting; and especially do these abound when the performers stop at the doors of those dens where liquor is sold. Aboard steamboats there is less impurity observable in their manner, doubtless because of the presence, amid their listeners, of respectable females, from whom they wish to win a trifle; but usually, obscenity is manifested in their manner, and not unfrequently in the words they sing.

Having occasion to go to Staten Island not long since the writer observed a woman and girl coming ashore from another boat that had just landed, with a harp, and saucer, and step on board the one on which she had taken passage. Immediately after leaving the wharf the woman struck the strings, (no other epithet would express her manner) and in a shrill voice burst out with a German song, the child chimed in, the passengers gathered about them, and after the singing of three German songs, the child (a girl of eleven or twelve) sang a humorous English song, accompanying herself on the harp, and then returning the instrument to the woman she passed her saucer among the crowd. Those who gave nothing she stared almost out of countenance; but scarce looked at those who dropped her a trifle.

Her saucer was soon filled, and emptying it in a satchel she carried, she came up to the writer, who had remained with some half dozen others, at a distance. As she extended her hand for a donation, the writer remarked, "I would rather give you and your mother work by which to earn a living, than alms for singing." She replied, "Humph, we can get plenty of work, but we don't want it, we can make money enough singing, and it is nobody's business if we prefer it;" and turned about as scornful as if she had been insulted; at the first landing they left, but not without an angry glance at the object of their displeasure. They no doubt collect many dollars in the course of a week, from those more industrious than themselves, and on the Sunday they may be found tricked out in their finery, amid every haunt of the dissolute.

Not long since a friend of the writer who understood the Swiss language, was crossing the ferry from Williamsburgh to New York, and there were several girls on board with baskets and bags of rags just collected. They were from fifteen to eighteen years of age, and of most beggarly appearance. They were remarking about the pride of some one who had formerly gone with them rag-picking, but whose mother had lately forbade her associating with them. Their conversation became very animated, and at length one remarked, "Why, her mother need not feel so, she cannot dress on a Sunday as well as I can by any means!" "No, no indeed," said another, "and the watch she wears, did not cost by twenty dollars as much as mine did!"

After a while the conversation turned upon the balls they attended on Sundays, the drives, and sails, interspersed with remarks of how few that met them then mistrusted that they were rag-pickers during the week.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' SEMINARY.

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, Principal, and Professor of Languages.
IRA SAYLES, Associate Principal, and Professor of Mathematics.
GURDON EVANS, Professor of Natural Sciences.
J. R. HARTSHORN, Professor of Anatomy and Physiology.
O. STILLMAN, Professor of Vocal and Instrumental Music.
Miss C. B. MAXSON, Preceptress, Instructress in French, Italian, Drawing and Painting.
Mrs. M. B. KENYON, Assistant in the Female Department.

From the very liberal patronage extended to this Institution during the past seven years, the Trustees have been induced to make arrangements for greatly increasing its facilities. The Chemical, Philosophical, Astronomical, and Mathematical apparatus is amply sufficient for a full illustration of the different departments of those Sciences. The apparatus will be farther increased at the commencement of the ensuing Fall Term, by the introduction of whatever may be necessary in other Sciences than those above mentioned, especially, by a MANIKIN of the most approved structure, now being imported from Paris, expressly for this Institution. This will enable the student of Physiology and Anatomy to pursue his studies with advantages nearly equal to those afforded by an actual subject, having this farther advantage of being divested of all those revolting circumstances ever attendant on the dissecting room.

THE TEACHERS' CLASSES, as usual, will be exercised in practical teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective Instructors. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. Daily Lectures will also be given during the Fall and Winter Terms; and the public may be assured that this department of the Institution shall be conducted upon the principles of the best regulated Normal Schools, in this, or any other country.

Finally, the proprietors pledge themselves, that the reputation of this Institution shall be sustained by the introduction of whatever may be necessary to meet the demands of an intelligent public.

The Institution is liberally endowed and subject to the visitation of the Regents.

Its Library is choice and extensive, and accessible, also, to all the students gratis.

THE ACADEMIC YEAR for 1845—6 consists of three Terms, as follows:—The First, commencing Wednesday August 13, 1845, and ending Thursday, November 20. The Second, commencing Wednesday, November 26, and ending Thursday, March 6, 1846. The Third, commencing Wednesday, March 25, and ending Thursday, July 2.

EXPENSES.—Tuition, per term, from $3 50 to $5 00. Board, per week, $1 00. Piano, (extra,) per term, $10 00. Washing, lights and fuel, per term, from $2 00 to $5 00. The entire expenses for an Academic Year, including board, washing, lights, fuel and tuition, (except on the Piano,) need not exceed $70 00; and may even be reduced much below this, where individuls board themselves, either separately or in clubs. For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense. SAMUEL RUSSELL,

President of the Board of Trustees

JOHN TOMBES.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:

As the New York Sabbath Tract Society is desirous of collecting a permanent library, and of gathering up the fragments that remain of the ancient defenders of the Sabbath, I send you the following facts respecting JOHN TOMBES, which I have recently gleaned from my cursory reading. Perhaps some of your correspondents may furnish other facts illustrative of the same person's sentiments and practice.

In J. Davis' History of the Welsh Baptists, published at Pittsburgh, 1833, is the following record, page 41:—

"In the year 1653 there was a public debate on baptism, at Abergavenny, between Mr. Tombes and Mr. Cragg—the former a Baptist, the latter a Pedobaptist. We do not know where Mr. Tombes came from to Abergavenny, how long he continued, nor what became of him. He nobly defended the Baptist principles, and most dreadfully irritated and mortified Mr. Cragg. Many were convinced that believers are the only subjects of baptism, and that immersion is the only mode; and more than forty persons were baptized and added to the church under the pastoral care of Mr. Pritchard. This is all we have ever read of him."

In Mr. Joseph Stennett's Answer to Mr. David Russen's Book on Baptism, first edition, published in London 1704, at page 249, is the following passage:—

"Some of them (i. e. persons holding Baptist sentiments,) have continued in the communion of the Church of England, particularly Mr. Tombes, concerning whom the House of Lords, in the Reasons they have published against some clauses in the Bill against Occasional Conformity, agitated in the last Session of Parliament, are pleased thus to express themselves: 'There was a very learned and famous man that lived at Salisbury, Mr. Tombes, who was a zealous Conformist in all points but one, Infant Baptism.'"

A short time since, I found in the possession of Br. Weedon Clark, of Hopkinton, R. I., an old book of nearly a thousand pages, in that old square size between our modern octavos and duodecimos. The title page was gone, but on a short perusal of it, I found it to be an able work on Christian Baptism, and written by Mr. John Tombes. An advertisement towards the end of the book showed that he was the author of fourteen other polemic works, published in England during the Protectorate of Oliver Cromwell. From pages 674 and 675, I extracted the following passages:—

"I find not where the term Sabbath day is meant or applied to any other than the seventh day of the week. I grant that other days are termed Sabbaths—Sabbaths of rest, as Lev. 23: 24, 32: 29—but no where that I yet find, is any day besides the last of the week, termed 'the Sabbath day.'" . . . "The blessing of the Sabbath day, Ex. 20: 11, was the same with the blessing, Gen. 2: 3, for it is a narrative of what God did in the beginning; and that day was the seventh day in order after the six days in which God created his work." . . . "Methinks the Evangelist Luke, 23: 56, when he says, 'they rested the Sabbath day according to the commandment,' (which commandment is that Ex. 20: 11,) and that Sabbath, being by the confession of all the last day of the week, doth plainly expound the fourth commandment of that particular Sabbath, which was the seventh day in order from the creation, and the last day of the week."

Whether an attentive perusal of the whole work would furnish any more testimony respecting his views of Sabbath-keeping I cannot tell. It is however worth your inquiry. At page 228 of his book on baptism, Mr. Stennett says:—

"Some Pedobaptists observe the seventh day, and some of them in the communion of the Church of England too; for when they hear the fourth commandment read, which declares the seventh day to be the Sabbath of the Lord, and requires the observation of it; and that prayer of the Church, immediately annexed to this command, as well as to each of the rest, 'Lord have mercy upon us, and incline our hearts to keep this law,' they think they should not be sincere, either in answering the obligation laid on them by God in the commmandment; or by themselves in this prayer, without observing the seventh day, which he there requires to be kept, and which they pray their hearts may be inclined to keep."

Was Mr. Tombes one of this class of Sabbath keepers?

THE PULPIT AND THE PRESS.

A great change has taken place in the public sentiment respecting the province and power of the press. It is now felt to be a most important instrument for disseminating religious intelligence and inculcating moral truth. Perhaps there has never been a time when the secular press was doing so much in this work as at present. We look upon this circumstance as an omen of good, and therefore rejoice in it. The eloquent Edward Irving once spoke on the subject in the following language, containing suggestions worthy of sober consideration:—

"It seemeth to me, that from the press there should at all times issue forth, amid its teeming company, some forms of religious truth to guide the course of those who are ever influenced by its novelties. On which account, though we should say nothing that has been better said before, we will, out of regard to the constant appetite of the age for novelty, and out of pure love to the good old cause, set forth our opinion.

I fancy that if the Spirit of God were to choose out twelve men from the house of God, with whom to finish the great work of converting men, especially the men of this country, and for that purpose were as on a second pentecost, to bestow upon them special gifts, the gift of writing powerfully would be a chief one; for the press hath come to master the pulpit in its power; and the ability to write powerfully seems to me a greater accomplishment of the soldier of Christ, than the ability to preach powerful discourses. The one sends a dart, which though well-directed, may fly wide of the mark, and having once spent its strength is useless for ever; the other is the ancient catapulta, which will discharge you a thousand darts at once in a thousand different directions; and it hath an apparatus for making more darts, so that it can continue to discharge them for ever. To use this most powerful of intellectual and moral instruments in the service of Christ is a noble ambition which should possess the soul of every Christian. He doth, in a manner, multiply his soul thereby, and give to his idle thoughts a habitation and a name."

HENRY COLLINS.

HENRY COLLINS was one of those rare characters, who, though in a peculiar manner qualified for the highest stations in society, yet deemed himself not above the responsibilities and humble duties of religion. He made a profession of religion in the year 1728, and joined the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Newport, R. I., then under the charge of Rev. ~~Wm. Gibson.~~ In 1729 he was elected a Trustee, and with Mr. Jonathan Weeden had the sole charge of erecting the house of worship which still remains entire, its curiously-wrought pulpit being at present occupied by Rev. Lucius Crandall. Mr. Collins seems to have participated with much zeal in the labors of his brethren, being always ready to act his part, sometimes as messenger to the scattered brethren, and often at home in the service of the congregation, not shunning the most humble and laborious duties to advance the prosperity of the church.

The character of Mr. Collins, as a citizen, is given in the following sketch from the Newport Mercury:—

"Among the wealthy and distinguished merchants of Newport, who flourished in her colonial glory, Henry Collins deserves to be remembered with gratitude and respect. He was a native of Newport, and born in March 1699. He was educated in England, and on his return to his native country, adopted the profession of a merchant, in which he was for some time eminently successful. He was a man of fine taste—fond of literature, he animated and encouraged kindred spirits, and in 1730 with seven associates formed a Literary and Philosophical Society in Newport, which was the first that was ever formed in the Colony, and probably was one of the earliest in America. This society afterwards comprised many of the prominent men in the Colony, and some in Massachusetts and Connecticut.

"He is said to have been the projector of the plan for a Library Association in Newport, for which purpose he gave the valuable lot of land on which the edifice of the Redwood Library was erected, and was for many years one of the Directors of the institution.

"He was a munificent patron of the arts, and to his patronage of Smybert, Alexander, Feeke, &c., we are indebted for many of the ancient portraits, which are still to be found in Newport. He formed a gallery of paintings, of which the venerable Dr. Waterhouse, who remembered to have seen them in his youthful days, (in a letter to the Rev. Mr. Elton,) thus speaks:—'Henry Collins, a wealthy merchant and a man of taste, the Lorenzo de Medici of Rhode Island, caused a painting to be made of Parson Callender, as well as some other divines, as Hitchcock, Clap and Dean Berkeley, which I have often admired in the Collins collection.' Smybert, who painted most of these portraits, was one of the persons who accompanied Dean Berkeley to America. He was an artist of great eminence from Edinburg, and was possessed of some choice paintings of the Italian masters; after residing in Newport a few years, he removed to Boston; it is said one of these pictures was seen by West, and a young artist named Copely, who both copied it so successfully, that both were fired with the ambition of going to England. The consequence is well known.

"Mr. Collins, affluent and generous, widely diffused around him those blessings he enjoyed; he educated at his own expense many poor but deserving young men, some of whom afterwards became prominent in our community. He appears to have been at the head of every public improvement in Newport—the extension of the Long Wharf, the building of the Brick Market and Granary, &c.

"The conversational powers of Mr. Collins were of the highest order, and the riches of his well stored mind, were dealt out with no unsparing hand; few ever left him without improvement, or shared his converse, without pleasure.

"The unbounded liberality of Mr. Collins led to a considerable diminution of his fortune, which was followed by ruinous losses under the application of the Admiralty rule of '56, and finally by bankruptcy in 1765. He lived but a few years after his misfortunes; and is understood to have died at the house of one of his friends about the year 1770.

"It is understood that there is a fine portrait of Mr. Collins still in existence, which is said to be now in possession of some one of the family of the late Dr. Henry Collins Flagg, of South Carolina. It ought to be placed in the Redwood Library."

THE LEPER.

"And he went out from his presence a leper as white as snow."—2 Kings, Ch 5, ver. 27.

Mr. Caunter, when in India, gives the following account of a leper with whom he met:

'One evening, as I was strolling along the seashore, I saw such an extraordinary object before me, that I could not take my eyes off it. A man was coming toward me, whose only clothing was a piece of cloth wrapped round the body from the waist downward. His skin was perfectly white, and perfectly glazed as if seared with a hot iron. His head was uncovered, and his hair, which was the same color as his skin, hung down in long strips upon his lean and withered shoulders. His eyes, except the eyeballs, were of a dark murky red, and he kept them fixed on the ground, as if it were painful for him to look up, which I found to be the case. He walked slowly and feebly, and was so frightfully thin, that he seemed to stand before me a living skeleton. He did not at first venture to come within several yards of me. I moved towards him, but he walked from me, beseeching me to give the smallest trifle to a miserable man, to save him from starving to death, as he was an object of universal scorn, an outcast from his home and friends. He told me not to come near a polluted creature, for whom no one felt pity. He told me he had, during many years, suffered dreadfully from the leprosy, and though he was now cured, it had left upon him these marks of pollution, which would prevent his ever being allowed to go among his fellow-creatures again. The color of his skin was changed to a corpse like white, and none could mistake that he had been a leper.'

THE FRUITS OF INFIDELITY AND THE BIBLE.

Rousseau, the French Infidel, on his return to Paris, (says Lord Brougham, in his Sketches of Men of Letters,) went to live at an inferior hotel, or rather lodging-house, near the Luxembourg, and there dining at the table with the family, he became acquainted with a female servant, a girl from Orleans, where her father had held a place in the mint, and her mother had been a shop keeper, but both were reduced to distress. Their name was Le Vasseur, and the girl's Theresa. She was about twenty-three, of modest demeanor, and so much without education, that, even after living with him for many years, she never could read the figures on the dial-plate of a clock, or tell in what order the months succeeded each other. He became attached to her; she cohabited with him and bore him five children, all of which he sent one after the other to the Foundling Hospital, regardless of the poor mother's tears; and after twenty-five years of this intercourse he married her. The mother, a vulgar and affected woman, lived with them; and the father, whom he could not endure, but of whom Theresa was very fond, was on the pretext of economy, sent at the age of eighty to the work-house, where the disgrace of this treatment immediately broke his heart.

Thomas Paine was another infidel, who, as some yet alive in this city know, yielded up his spirit in a tempest of agony and despair; alternately uttering fearful curses, and calling for help on the insulted name of Christ! An aged gentleman, well acquainted with him, says,—"One evening I found Paine haranguing a company of his disciples, on the great mischief done to mankind by the Bible and Christianity. When he paused, I said—'Mr. Paine, you have been in Scotland; you know there is not a more rigid set of people in the world than they are in their attachment to the Bible; is it not their school-book? When a young man leaves his father's house, his mother always in packing his chest puts a Bible on the top of his clothes.' He said it was true. I continued—'You have been in Spain and Portugal, where they have no Bible.' He assented. 'You have been in districts in Europe, where not one man in fifty can read; and you have been in Ireland, where the majority have never seen a Bible. Now you know it is an historical fact, that in one county in England or Ireland there are many more capital convictions in six months, than there are in the whole population of Scotland in twelve. Besides, this day there is not one Scotchman in the Almshouse, State Prison, Bridewell, or Penitentiary of New York. Now then, if the Bible was so bad a book as you represent it to be, those who use it would be the worst members of society; but the contrary is the fact; for our prisons, almshouses, and penitentiaries are filled with men and women whose ignorance or unbelief prevents them from reading the Bible.' It was now near ten o'clock at night. Paine answered not a word, but taking a candle from the table, walked up stairs, leaving his friends and myself staring at one another."

When such are seen to be the fruits of infidelity, contrasted with those of the Bible, can it be considered of no consequence what children read, or what a man believes? [N. Y. Telegraph.

INDUSTRY—A THOUGHT FOR THINKERS.

An Andover correspondent of the N. Y. Evangelist gives a striking notice of the Rev. John A. Sherman, a Missionary now on his return to Benares, upon the Ganges, 500 miles above Calcutta. While recently in Andover, though on a passing visit, and in a foreign land, where he wished to notice things around him, he read, during the ten days of his stay, Henry's Life of Calvin, a recent German work in three large octavos, besides much in periodicals, and besides spending considerable time in social intercourse, preaching twice, and delivering a most interesting lecture, of two hours length, on India.

About two years of his time in India has been spent in Calcutta, in translating and printing the Bible in the Hindostan language, for the British and Foreign Bible Society. While engaged on this translation, he applied himself from four in the morning till eight in the evening, notwithstanding the intense and sultry heat of Calcutta. And strange as it may seem to some, he assigns this very fact of his intense application, as a leading cause of his uninterrupted health and vigor. "The man who would live in India," he says, "must have plenty of work; if not, he will yield to the enervating influence of the climate, and lounge away his days on the sofa, and consequently be tossing all night on his sleepless couch, for want of the requisite fatigue. Then comes dejection of spirits, and utter prostration of the whole man."

This thought may well arouse many to aim at eminent usefulness; for it is the indolent and irresolute of both sexes, not the industrious, in study or business, that are incapable of enduring heat or cold, or truly enjoying life, with honor, in any country. But, to secure the highest benefits of industry, it must, as in the case before us, be prompted by true Christian benevolence, and sustained by proper views of human destiny and accountability. We would say then to the student—to the child of affluence—to every youth of spirit—

"Rouse to the work of high and holy love,
And thou an angel's happiness shalt know—
Shalt bless the earth, while in the world above:
The good begun by thee, shall onward flow
In many a branching stream, and wider grow:
The seed that in these few and fleeting hours,
Thy hands unsparing and unwearied sow,
Shall deck thy grave with amaranthine flowers,
And yield thee fruits divine in heaven's immortal bowers."

THINKING ON GOD.

"A friend once told me, that among other symptoms of high nervous excitement, he had been painfully harrassed for want of sleep. To such a degree had this proceeded, that if, in the course of the day, any occasion led him to his bed-chamber, the sight of his bed made him shudder at the idea of the restless and wretched hours he had to pass upon it. In this case it was recommended to him to endeavor, when he lay down at night, to fix his thoughts on something at the same time vast and simple, such as the wide expanse of the ocean, or the cloudless vault of heaven, that the little hurried and disturbing images that flitted before his mind, might be charmed away, or hushed to rest, by the calming influences of one absorbing thought. Though not at all a religious man at the time, this advice suggested to his mind, that if an object at once vast and simple was to be selected, no one could serve his purpose so well as that of God. He resolved to make the trial and think of Him. The result exceeded his most sanguine hopes; in thinking of God he fell asleep, as he termed it, in God. What began as a mere physical operation, grew, by imperceptible degrees, into a gracious influence. The same God who was his repose by night, was in all his thoughts by day. And at the time this person spoke to me, God, as revealed in the gospel of his Son, was "all his salvation, and all his desire." So various are the means and inscrutable are the ways, by which God can "fetch home the banished." [Rev. H. Woodward.

EXAMPLES OF TRUE HEROISM.

Among the teachers that went with Mr. Williams in the Camden, with the view of being placed on the New Hebrides, or some of the neighboring islands, there were two from Raratonga. Mr. Pitman and Mr. Buzzacott pointed out to them the dangers to which they would probably be exposed in landing among savages. They manifested the greatest willingness to hazard their lives in attempting to plant the standard of the cross on any island to which they might be appointed. When it was intimated that the loss of life might be the result, they replied, "Be it so; it is the cause of God; he will shield us from harm; if not, we can die in no work more glorious." One of them said to Mr. Pitman, "Look at these scars; these I got in heathen wars. I was marked out, and sought for as a sacrifice, but eluded my pursuers by secreting myself in the mountains. Often have I wondered how I escaped; but now it is all plain, the love of God, through Christ my Saviour. Cheerfully therefore will I devote that life to him who has redeemed me with his blood." His parting language to his son and daughter, who remained at Raratonga, was equally interesting and affecting. After giving them good advice in reference to their future conduct, he said, "Do not be cast down, nor allow of immoderate grief, should you hear I have been killed by the heathen, for I am willing to die in such a cause, if God calls me to such an end. Had not Jesus shown mercy to me, in leading my feet into the path of life, I should have perished. Willingly therefore do I go forth to this work of my Saviour. If I die by the hand of the heathen, it will be because God permits it. If I live, I purpose to do what I can to lead their souls to Jesus, who is the Saviour of the world." With such feelings did this good man go forth to prepare the way for better qualified teachers hereafter.

THE ARAB BOY AND THE LIONS.—The Baron de Bode, in his recently published Travels in Luristan and Arabistan, states that among the reeds and marshes which environ the ruins of Shush, lions are still found in great numbers, and Arabs are full of the stories of their ravages. An old man of the party, with vehement gestures and considerable volubility, detailed a personal adventure:

'When a lad, of eight or nine years old, I was sent one day by my parents to scare away birds from a plantation belonging to us, which lay close to the river. As I was sitting in a frail hut of rushes, I suddenly espied a lioness making her way to my place of concealment. My liver melted into water at the sight, (jighe ab shud,) and I became like one transfixed. The animal stopped short, then crouched, and rolling on the sand, appeared quite unconscious of an intruder. Although I trembled like a leaf, this afforded me some respite; but, presently, I became aware of another lion through the rushes, by the tremendous roaring which preceded him. They met, and apparently on very friendly terms, and for some time they gamboled like dogs together. But I felt that my situation was not the better for it, as their stay might be prolonged. I was more dead than alive, expecting every instant that they would discover my hiding place; and one stroke of the paw was more than sufficient to bring down the hut. I was afraid to breathe, lest the sound should reach their ears, yet I could not prevent my teeth chattering quite audibly. But whether it was that they were too much occupied with their own concerns, or that they were deficient in scent, I do not know; suffice it to say that after a short time, which to me appeared an age, they separated, each taking a different direction, and soon disappeared.

'It is many years since that event took place,' added the old man in conclusion, 'still I can never think of it without a shudder.' To me this narrative had a peculiar interest, as I was standing on the very spot which the traditions of the east point out as the scene, where twenty-five centuries ago, Daniel had his miraculous escape, and I could not but contrast the calm confidence of the prophet, with the agitated state of the Arab youth, who had not yet learned to place complete and implicit reliance on his heavenly Father.'

FEMALE INFLUENCE AND ENERGY.

I have observed that a married man falling into misfortune is more apt to retrieve his situation in the world than a single one, chiefly because his spirits are soothed and relieved by domestic endearments, and self-respect kept alive by finding that, although all abroad be darkness and humiliation, yet there is still a little world of love at home of which he is monarch. Whereas a single man is apt to run to waste with self-neglect; to fall to ruins, like some deserted mansion, for want of an inhabitant. I have often had occasion to remark the fortitude with which women sustain the most overwhelming reverses of fortune. Those disasters which break down the spirit of a man and prostrate him in the dust, seem to call forth all the energies of the softer sex, and give such intrepidity and elevation to their character, that at times it approaches to sublimity. Nothing can be more touching than to behold a soft and tender female, who had been all weakness and dependence, and alive to every trivial roughness, while treading the prosperous path of life, suddenly rising in mental force to be the comforter and supporter of her husband under misfortune, abiding with unshrinking firmness, the bitterest blast of adversity. As the vine which has long twined its graceful foliage about the oak, and has been lifted by it into sunshine, will, when the hardy plant is rifted by the thunderbolt, cling round it with caressing tendrils, and bind up its shattered boughs, so, too, it is beautifully ordered by Providence, that woman, who is the ornament and dependent of man in his happier hours, should be his stay and solace when smitten with sudden calamity; winding herself into the rugged recesses of his nature, tenderly supporting the drooping head, and binding up the broken heart. [Irving.

REPENTANCE ON A SICK BED.—Rev. Mr. Kinney of Whitewater, Wisconsin, says, that during the year he has visited four persons, who on their sick beds promised repentance and submission to God; and some of them appeared to be in deep anxiety about their souls, so that had they been taken away, he should have hoped of their salvation. But the Lord spared their lives and restored them to health. Now, not one of the number gives evidence of a change of heart.

Similar to this is the experience of nearly every faithful minister. No confidence is to be reposed in a sick bed repentance. It may possibly be genuine—but probably, God will "laugh at their calamity, and mock when their fear cometh."

[Vt. Chronicle.

SUBMISSION.—Health may be enjoyed; sickness must be endured; one body is the object of both, and God the author of both. If, then, he give me health, I will thankfully enjoy it, and not think it too good, since it is his mercy to bestow it; if he send sickness, I will patiently endure it, and not think it too great, since it is my sin that deserves it. If in health I will strive to preserve it by praising him; if in sickness, I will strive to remove it by praying to him. He shall be my God in sickness and in health, and my trust shall be in him in health and in sickness. So in my health I shall not need to fear sickness, nor in my sickness despair of health.

CONSCIENCE INDESTRUCTIBLE.—"Conscience," says a contemporary, "may be abused, but it is feared; it may be loaded down with weight, but cannot be crushed; the cauterizing iron may be applied, but though seared, it cannot be killed. You may shut your eyes, but it will whisper in your ears. You may stop your ears, but it will tremble in your nerves. When it cannot thunder it will whisper; and when it cannot whisper, its silence is often more dreadful than its utterance. It is dangerous to offend conscience, for it has a most tenacious memory, as well as a most tender sensibility. It is the more dangerous, because it does not consider your conduct a personal affront, but as an impious insult to the moral government of God."

LEARNING IN YOUTH.—Walter Scott in a narrative of his personal history gives the following caution to youth:

"If it should ever fall to the lot of youth to peruse these pages, let such a reader remember that it is with the deepest regret that I recollect in my manhood the opportunities of learning which I neglected in my youth; that through every part of my literary career, I have felt pinched and hampered by my own ignorance; and I would at this moment give half the reputation I have had the good fortune to acquire, if by doing so I could rest the remaining part upon a sound foundation of learning and science."

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, September 11, 1845.

ENFORCING SABBATHS BY CIVIL PENALTIES.

The newspapers have recently chronicled several instances in which men have been fined or imprisoned for laboring on the first day of the week, commonly called the Christian Sabbath. One of these instances occurred in the State of Vermont, where a man was fined two dollars for working on Sunday, and then, in default of payment, was thrown into prison, where he remained for a long time. Another instance occurred in Ohio, where more than a dozen Israelites, and many other persons, were fined certain sums for attending to their ordinary business on Sunday. In each of these instances, the persons implicated claim to have acted according to the dictates of their consciences, and not in violation of any divine law. Yet the administrators of the civil law have seen fit to lay hold upon them, and to inflict upon them summary punishment, as though they were really bad men, of whom it was necessary to make examples for the warning and protection of others.

Different opinions will of course be entertained by different individuals in regard to the policy and justice of these proceedings. For our part, we regard them as both impolitic and unjust.

They are impolitic, because they serve to weaken the sense of religious obligation to keep holy a Sabbath day, and to strengthen the impression that it is a mere social or civil arrangement. One of the greatest difficulties to be met with in all the efforts to promote a better sanctification of the Sabbath, has been to make men feel that they were under obligation to God, as well as to each other, to observe a season of sacred rest. There is a strong tendency in the human mind to disconnect these outward duties from divine authority; and just in proportion as this is done, the whole matter becomes one of indifference and uncertainty. There is nothing which could more effectually strengthen this tendency, than for the civil magistrate to take into his own hands the infliction of punishment upon those who neglect the popular Sabbath.

These proceedings are unjust, because they deny the right of private judgment in religious matters, which by the spirit of our institutions and the letter of our laws is guarantied to every individual. This right is inalienable; it cannot be forcibly taken from us, nor voluntarily surrendered by us. Hence the framers of our state and national governments have distinctly asserted and carefully guarded it. But what else is it than a denial of this right, for civil officers to inflict penalties for doing just what an enlightened conscience and mature judgment approve and require. It is nothing else, surely. We are told, it is true, that a vast majority are in favor of the opinions which the magistrates wish to enforce. But what of that? If there was but one individual of a different opinion, he ought to be respected—nay, he must be respected in order to carry out the principle which has been laid down, and secure its application in other cases as well as in this. We talk of the injustice of taxation without representation, or of being governed by those whom we have had no voice in electing, but what is this in comparison with being legislated for and punished by others in matters purely religious—matters wholly between individuals and their God? There can be no greater injustice, than for the civil authorities to establish a religious creed, by whatever process, and then go about to search out and punish those who can not conscientiously comply with it. That is the very spirit which gave rise to the inquisition, and which would revive it again if carried out to its legitimate results.

It was laid down as a maxim in the early Constitution of one of the New England Colonies, that "no subordination of one religious sect to another shall ever be allowed." The justice and wisdom of that maxim has often been acknowledged, and nearly all of the States profess to have formed their constitutions according to it. But is not this system of legislating in favor of Sunday, and inflicting penalties upon those who do not observe it, a practical subordination of one sect to another? With the Jews, for instance, it is a matter of conscience both to work six days and to rest the seventh. But when they have rested the seventh day according to the divine commandment, and are then compelled to rest on the first day also in compliance with the wishes of the larger religious sects, they are subordinated to those large sects. The same is true of all those who observe the seventh day. To refuse them freedom to rest on the day of their choice, or to compel them to rest on a day in which their consciences prompt them to go about their work, is to bid defiance to that maxim which is so universally approved, and so happy in its influence when consistently applied.

We cannot think, that the cause of our first day brethren will be advanced by the proceedings above alluded to. Such proceedings will only serve to prejudice the minds of unbelievers, and will lead to a great deal of inquiry among others, which the advocates of the first day are not able to meet. It is well known, that Christian Sabbaths were never enforced by the civil law in the earliest and purest ages of the Church. It was not until Constantine joined in himself the civil and ecclesiastical powers, that this course was resorted to—a course which was destructive of genuine piety and acceptable Sabbath-keeping. Now when men see Christians resorting to these same helps, will they not be likely to inquire for the reason? They certainly will; and the answer will be most unwelcome to those who have by their practice unwittingly raised the question.

Sunday-Keeping in Cincinnati.—The city council of Cincinnati is engaged in a crusade against work on Sunday. An ordinance was recently passed prohibiting all traffic and ordinary labor on that day, and requiring that all shops, except for the sale of medicines, should be closed. It so happened, that among the first persons arraigned for a violation of this ordinance were three members of the very council which passed it. One of them was a druggist, who was fined by the Mayor for selling soda; another was a mechanic; and the third was a Jew, who closed his store on the seventh day and opened it again on the first day. An appeal has been taken upon the latter case, and probably the result will be, that the ordinance will be pronounced unconstitutional so far as it requires those who conscientiously observe the seventh day to keep also the first day. Some of the daily papers, we perceive, express their decided approval of these measures, and publish long articles about the good which will be done by them. And yet we learn from good authority, that the type for some of those very articles were set up on Sunday. Be that as it may, we do not expect that much good will result from such proceedings. We have no very high opinion of enforcing any religious duty by civil fines and penalties—much less of enforcing by such means the observance of a human tradition at the expense of a divine commandment.

ANOTHER VICTIM.

The recent decision in several courts of the state of New-York, adverse to the interests of Sabbath-keepers, seems to have given new courage to their enemies. We learn that a brother in Preston, Chenango County, lately had a summons served upon him which was made returnable on the Sabbath, and that for the purpose, as was thought, of giving him trouble or securing advantage over him. It will be remembered, that the law on the subject was made in answer to petitions from Sabbath-keepers asking to be excused from attending to civil duties on the seventh day. But it so happened, that in drawing up this law, which was designed to meet their wishes, mention was made only of serving processes, and not of answering to them. Hence it is decided, that although a process may not be served on a Sabbath-keeper upon the seventh day, yet it may be made returnable on that day, and he may be compelled to attend court or lose his case by being absent. Such a decision may be legal, but it is certainly laughable in view of the design of those who framed the law. It reminds one of that Justice of the Peace before whom a man was brought on the charge of stealing a horse-blanket, whereupon the law-books were examined for the penalty against stealing horse-blankets. But alas, there was nothing said about horse-blankets in all the books, and therefore the thief must be discharged. So in this case; it is well known, that the law was designed to protect Sabbath-keepers against the annoyance of having to attend to civil duties on the day which they regard as sacred. But alas, the law only says serving processes; therefore they must answer to them on the Sabbath or suffer the consequences. But seriously, this business of petty persecution must have an end, either by an improvement of the law, or by a righteous decision as to its spirit and intent.

JEWISH RABBINICAL MEETING.

We noticed a meeting of German Jewish Rabbis last year to discuss certain questions about a reform in their liturgy and service. Another meeting was held this year at Frankfort, commencing on the 15th of July. The following notices of motion will show what kind of subjects were under discussion:—1st. There was a motion, that there be established two Jewish theological faculties in Germany; 2d. That all duties toward the State be allowed to be discharged on the Sabbath; 3d. For the abolition of all fast days, in these times of peace, except the day of Atonement; 4th. For an alteration of the reading of the Torah; 5th. For the establishment of a Jewish theological gazette.—These motions were followed by a discussion on the liturgy, in the course of which the following decisions were made among others:—1st. That German prayers should be introduced into the service, admitting the retention of some Hebrew prayers as a matter of expediency; 2d. That the name of the Messiah may be mentioned in prayers, but all prayers for the return to Palestine, or for the restoration of the Jewish state, are to be abolished; 3d. That the organ may be introduced in the Sabbath service, and a Jew allowed to play it. At an early stage of the meeting, a declaration was formally made, that the whole of its proceedings should be based on revelation, as opposed to rationalism. Some of the discussions, however, if not some of the decisions, evidently transcended this declaration. We notice that most of the Jewish papers express a decided hostility to many of the decisions of the meeting, and probably they will have but little influence upon the great majority of Jews.

Samuel Beebee's Answer to Mr Wadsworth.—Bro. Josiah W. Langworthy writes us, that he has found a complete copy of this old book in the possession of an aged sister in Rhode Island, Mrs. Polly Potter. It was printed in 1721, when the only Sabbath-keeping churches in this country were those at Newport, Hopkinton, and Piscataway. We hope before long to have an inteview with this representative of a Sabbath-keeper who spoke on the subject one hundred and twenty-four years ago. If we are not disappointed, our readers shall hear something more about the matter.

Sunday Travel.—The Syracuse Religious Recorder says:—"We regret to learn, that the statement which is going the rounds in regard to the suspension of trains on the Sabbath on the Railroad between Albany and Buffalo, is said to be entirely premature. The matter has been under consideration, but no such decision has been made."

New-York Sabbath Tract Society.—The Sabbath Tract Society of the city of New-York held its third Annual Meeting, on Sunday Evening last, at which the reports of the Board of Directors and other officers of the society were read. This society has within the past year resigned the business of publishing Tracts into the hands of the American Tract Society, and now devotes its attention mainly to the maintenance of a Sabbath Library and the circulation of Tracts in the city of New-York. From the report of the Board we learn, that the Society, though it has never embraced many members, has already circulated matter to the amount of nearly two million tract pages, the influence of which is seen in a wide-spread interest on the subject, and the conversion of many persons to the truth. The result of its labors are such as call for gratitude to God, and may well encourage us to continue our efforts.

PERSECUTION IN RHODE ISLAND.

Extract from a Missionary's Report.

"A Sabbath-keeping brother took a district school to teach, which he commenced in April. Soon the subject of the Sabbath came up incidentally for remark in conversation at intervals between the hours of study. One of the young ladies attending the school, who was a member of a Baptist church, of which her father was a Deacon, felt disposed to maintain that the first day was the Sabbath, and attempted to do so. Not succeeding to her satisfaction, she sought aid from her minister in the form of books and counsel, thinking, probably, that her failure to prove the first day to be the Sabbath arose from her not understanding the subject. She also talked with her father upon the subject, who rebuked her for doing so, but did not inform her how the first day could be proved to be the Sabbath, nor did her minister satisfy her mind on that point. She read, among other things, some of our Sabbath publications. The result of all this was a clear and firm conviction in the mind of the young woman, that the seventh day was the Sabbath, and that it was her duty to keep it as such. This she signified to her family, with a wish to close her week's work on the sixth day, that she might keep the seventh day. Upon doing so, her father, and mother, and family, strongly opposed her wishes, and refused to grant her request. Her father further informed her, that she must give up the idea of keeping the seventh day, and also attend to her work, or leave his house—that she could have a home there on no other condition. As she was attending school at the time, she left home for that purpose, and having been directed by her father not to return unless she should comply with the conditions he had prescribed to her, when the school closed she accompanied one of the other young ladies home and stayed with her that night. After spending a few days in this way among her young friends in the neighborhood, during which time she wrote home to ascertain whether some terms of reconcliation could not be obtained without a violation of conscience, yet without success, she returned to her father's house, having the company of two other young women, to see if any thing could be effected towards a reconciliation in that way, but it was all in vain. The only proposition that was made to her, on which she could have a home at her father's house, was that she must work on the forenoon of the seventh day. Accordingly she left her father's house, because she did not think she would be justified in disobeying God in order to obey her father. During all this period, this young woman suffered most intense anguish, which cost her many sighs and tears, while she thought upon the past, and remembered that she had been driven by her own father from beneath the parental roof, without even the sympathy of her mother to mitigate her woe; the other members of the family, in the mean time, not refraining to impute their sister's conduct to unworthy motives and depreciating causes.

"In this stage of the affair, a sister of the young woman, who was married and settled in a town near by, learning what was going on, went with a carriage and took her sister to her own house, where it was said she was offered a home and liberty to worship God as she pleased.

"The next step which was taken with this young woman, was to remove her to a boarding school about twenty miles distant, charging her at the same time not to mention the circumstances in connection with that step, and informing her that they should enjoin the same thing on another young lady in the neighborhood, who having knowledge of the circum tances in the case, was going to attend the same school to which this young lady was about to be taken. In pursuance of the above plan, and for the purpose, as it would seem, of beguiling the young woman of keeping what she believed to be the Sabbath, she was removed to the place assigned her; and the last I knew of her she was grieving and praying over her afflictions, and lamenting that her way was so hedged up and dark in regard to keeping the Sabbath and enjoying its privileges.

"I have given you so many of the particulars of this case as they came to me, that the character of the opposition made against the Sabbath by professors of Christianity in high standing in our Protestant Baptist churches may show for itself. I will only add, that this young woman is about nineteen years of age."

CIRCULAR.

DeRuyter, Sept. 1, 1845.

To the Seventh-day Baptists in the State of New York:—

At a special meeting of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in this place, the undersigned were appointed a Committee to aid Dea. John Maxson in settling the costs attendant on testing, in the Circuit and Supreme Courts, the sufficiency of the law passed in 1839 for the protection of the Seventh-day Baptists.

We therefore request those individuals and churches who are alike interested in the law, or who have given encouragement of aid in meeting the expense, to forward immediately to the Committee whatever their sense of duty or liberality may dictate, all of which will be scrupulously appropriated to the above-named object. The amount necessary is nearly two hundred dollars. Should there be a surplus sent us, it will be appropriated to secure such an amendment of the law as is needed for our full protection.

The peculiar circumstances of the case, to wit, the detention of Dea. Maxson from his family and business on the limits of the County Jail, render immediate action necessary.

The facts in the case have been set before you in the Recorder and otherwise so correctly that a recapitulation is deemed unnecessary. This expense has been incurred in testing the above-named law, from the advice and in accordance with the wishes of brethren generally.

The church in this place will cheerfully sustain their proper share of this expense.

American Slave Traders.—It appears from statements made by our minister in Brazil, that the slave trade between Brazil and Africa is carried on to a very great extent by ships and men from the United States, under the protection afforded by the United States flag. Mr. Wise estimates the number of slaves imported from Africa in American vessels during the last year at 64,000. These vessels are sent to Brazil with instructions or permission to the captain to get them chartered for the coast of Africa. There is nothing on the face of the charter to intimate that they will be engaged in the slave-trade. Yet they are almost invariably engaged either as tenders upon regular slavers, or to carry a cargo of miserable human beings. After making a few profitable trips on charter, they are frequently sold to slave-dealers on the African coast for a much higher price than they would bring in any other place or for any other business. Mr. Wise expresses his opinion, that if the people of the United States knew the extent to which this kind of piracy is carried on under their flag, and by vessels owned in this country, a law would immediately be passed forbidding all trade with the coast of Africa.

Increase of Crime in Boston.—It is stated that notwithstanding the unusual prosperity and the proverbial morality of the quiet city of Boston, crime has been on the increase there for a year or two past, particularly among the younger class of depredators. During the year which ended July first, there were three hundred more complaints before the Police Courts than during the preceding year. This fact certainly calls for watchfulness and for a thorough investigation into the cause of the increase.

A Work of Art.—There is now in New York a work of art which is spoken of in terms of the highest admiration by all who have seen it, and is said to exceed any thing of the kind ever exhibited in this country. It is a representation of Christ on the Cross, wrought out of a single piece of ivory two or three times as large as was ever seen before. The work was conceived and executed by an obscure Genoese monk, and has occupied his attention wholly for nearly five years. It was purchased and brought to this country by Charles Edward Lester, U. S. Consul at Genoa.

Col. Ethan Allen.—We published some weeks ago an incident in the life of Ethan Allen, setting forth that his daughter, on her death bed, asked him whether she should believe in her mother's Christianity or in his Infidelity, and was told to believe what her mother had taught her. Since then the editor of the Boston Investigator, "an infidel paper devoted to the promotion of universal mental liberty," has sent us what he calls a contradiction of that story, with a request for its publication. It will be seen, that this contradiction rests upon the authority of an editor of the Brother Jonathan. Whether his authority is better than that of the "histories and hundreds of memorabilia" into which the story has found its way, we leave the reader to judge. Here is the contradiction:—

"That our friend may see the utter falsity of this pious story, we will quote for his instruction the remarks made upon it by the editor of the New-York Brother Jonathan, in 1840. After relating the same narrative that appears in the [Recorder,] the New-York Editor says:—

'This is a very pretty anecdote, but not a single sentence of it relates to any actual occurrence. The hero of Ticonderoga [Col. Ethan Allen] never lost a daughter during his own life-time, and his wife was not a pious woman; at least, she pretended to have experienced no religious influences. The falsity of the story, which has found its way into histories, and into hundreds of printed collections of memorabilia, was asserted to us by the excellent daughter of the hardy chief, who yet survives, and who perhaps was the heroine of the tale.'"

The New York Observer gives a letter from the Rev. James Wood, of Maury County, Tennessee, in which he states that forty-three persons were converted during a recent protracted meeting.

Regard for Sunday—Omenous.—The following statement, copied from the New Orleans Picayune of August 26th, shows how much regard is paid to Sunday in the Crescent City, and by the officers of the United States army. Some folks think that battles fought on Sunday generally result unfavorably to the aggressors. How do they think a war will result to those who commence it with Sunday drilling?

"According to announcement, Maj. General Gaines, accompanied by General Lewis, reviewed on Sunday the regiment of volunteers raised by Col. Dakin, and which consisted of upwards of 250 men. The Orleans Eclaireurs, the Lone Star Guard, and a part of the Irish Brigade, were upon the ground. Gen. Gaines addressed the Volunteers, assuring them that they would soon be called into active service. This only has been wanting to induce the most active volunteering on the part of our enthusiastic population."

The War in Syria.—The Missionary Herald gives the following statement, as a compendious view of the results of the war between the Maronites and Druzes:—

"Through the intervention of the European consuls and Turkish authorities, a cessation of hostilities was effected about the 20th of May, twenty days after the war began. How long this truce will last, time only can show. The general result of the contest, thus far, is, that the Maronites have been defeated, and driven out of the Druze section of the mountains, and nearly all the villages are burnt. In some districts—particularly in the Metn, the border districts between the two sects—each party alternately prevailed, each plundering and burning the houses and villages of the other. In that district, therefore, which was one of the finest and most populous in Lebanon, the desolation is complete. Scarcely a village or a house, either Druze or Maronite, remains. Great numbers of villages have been destroyed in other districts also; for the war extended over the whole of that large portion of Lebanon, which embraces the mixed (Druze and Maronite) population.

The Maronites.—The Christian Secretary gives the following account of this people, in whom considerable interest has been felt because of the difficulties in which they have been involved with the Druzes:—

"The Maronites are Roman Catholic in their faith, and are governed by a Patriarch chosen by the bishops, and confirmed by the Pope. The Patriarch has nine dioceses, thirteen bishops, and nearly one thousand priests under his control. There are also quite a number of convents and nunneries. The Maronites have a civil ruler, but he is the mere tool of the Patriarch, by whom civil and ecclesiastical matters are managed pretty much in accordance with his own will, and of course is capable of giving just such a direction to the war as he pleases; the bishops and priests being as completely under his control as the officers of an army are under a commanding general.

"The Maronites number 220,000; of which 180,000 reside in Mount Lebanon. They speak the Arabic language, but are of Syriac origin, and their liturgy is still in the Syriac language."

Cassius M. Clay.—The Cincinnati Herald of Sept. 4th says—"In answer to the repeated and anxious inquiries respecting Cassius M. Clay, we are happy to announce that, although still an invalid, suffering with a kind of lingering fever, or irritation, he is slowly mending. As to his future course, it can hardly be expected that he has yet formed any definite plan. We think, however, we may venture to state, that Mr. Clay will never abandon but with life the work to which he has so often publicly and solemnly dedicated himself."

The monthly meeting of the American Bible Society was held on Thursday evening, and we learn from the Commercial Advertiser that its condition is prosperous. The Society has recently received a legacy of $10,000 from Mr. Waldo of Worcester, Mass., and another from Miss Elizabeth Waldo which will amount to $16,000. A donation of $1,000 was made on Thursday evening by a gentleman. The issues of the Society during the last month have reached nearly 48,000 copies.

Rev. Dr. Simpson, Rev. Dr. McLeod, and Rev. Dr. Norman McLeod, the deputation from the Church of Scotland to visit the congregations in connection with that Church in British North America, arrived at Montreal on Saturday last.

THE WATER CURE.

The details of this new system are thus briefly described by a correspondent of the Albany Evening Journal:

The Cold-Water process is calculated, by its severity, to startle the patients of weak constitutions or nervous temperaments. It commences daily between 3 and 4 o'clock in the morning, by being enclosed first in a linen sheet dripping wet with cold spring water. Then a woolen blanket is put round the body. Then a feather bed is thrown over you. Then the patient falls into a gentle slumber, from which, in fifteen minutes, he is awakened in a profuse perspiration, and smoking like a coal-pit. He remains for three quarters of an hour in this state, drinking two glasses of water in that time; and then goes wrapped up in the sheet and blanket to the bath-room, throws of his wrappers and plunges into a cold bath! After remaining a few minutes in the cold bath, he gets out, wraps up in a blanket, goes to his bed-room, and is rubbed dry, dresses, and then walks less or more as he has strength and inclination, returning at 7 o'clock with a fine appetite for breakfast.

At 11 o'clock, the Patient goes to a Fountain for shower bathing. Here a stream of water, from a hight of fifteen feet, directly from a cold spring, falls upon the neck and runs down the spine for several minutes, after which you are rubbed with the flesh brush or hair mittens, then wiped dry, dress and read or take gentle exercise till dinner. During the afternoon, patients take a "Hip Bath," and on going to bed, a "Foot Bath." Patients drink from twenty to thirty glasses of spring water daily. Some drink a dozen before breakfast. Strict attention is paid to diet. The breakfast consists of Bread, Butter, Milk and Fruit; dinner of a joint of fresh Meat, with Vegetables; Tea, of Bread, Milk and Fruit. Salt Meats, Spices, Wine, Coffee, Tea, &c. &c. are prohibited. Professor Longfellow is among the patients.

General Intelligence.

FIFTEEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The steamship Caledonia reached Boston on Wednesday, 3d Sept., with news to the 19th ult. The following summary embraces the most important items:—

The Queen has visited on the continent, and had a glorious reception—a London paper says, "The visit of the Queen to the Rhine has given rise to a world of jealousies and mistrusts—has made courts anxious and diplomatists busy."

The Cotton Market is pretty steady, with a fair demand. On some of the common descriptions of American a slight advance in price has taken place.

The probability of a war between the United States and Mexico has caused a decline of nearly 2 per cent. in Mexican bonds.

Sir Robert Peel has given assurance that he contemplates a change in the principle of the existing corn laws.

The weather has been more favorable for the crops. The stock of corn on hand in England is larger than was supposed.

The amount of specie in the Bank of England is no less than £16,000,000, an unusually large quantity. On this account the bank refuses to purchase the Chinese instalment of $2,000,000 in silver, and it will be publicly sold.

Parliament was prorogued on the 10th ult. by the Queen in person. During its session, it sanctioned the construction of 2,000 miles of new railways in England and Scotland, and 500 miles in Ireland. The capital authorized to be raised in shares for this purpose amounts to £31,680,000, exclusive of £6,800,000 required for the Irish lines, making in all £38,480,000.

IRELAND.—A great Orange demonstration took place at Enniskillen on the 12th ult. which seems to have passed off without any breach of the peace.

Repeal meetings are held weekly. The rent for the week ending on the 9th ult., was £267 17-11, and for that ending on the 16th, £377 8 3.

The grand-nephew of William Mills, a man in his hundredth year, has been convicted in Londonderry of robbing the patriarch of £45. The old man slept in the same bed with the thief, who during the night assaulted his relative, and cut a belt from his body in which he kept his money. The prosecutor is a traveling tinman, hale, and possessed of an eighth wife.

FRANCE.—A declaration of war by Mexico against the United States is the great point discussed by the Paris papers. La Presse regards that act as a puerile demonstration, calculates upon the support of Mexico by Great Britain, and recommends that France observe the strictest neutrality. The other oppositition prints discuss the matter much in the same strain.

There has been a most disastrous fire in a dependence of the dockyard in Toulon, in which marine stores and property belonging to the Government was destroyed to the amount of upwards of £100,000 sterling. Some accounts carry the loss up to a million, though, no doubt, they are exaggerated. According to general belief, the fire is the work of the convicts, who are employed in the dock yards; but at present it is not clear what they hoped to gain by it, for not one escaped or attempted to escape.

From Africa the news is of the usual character—crops have been destroyed, flocks seized, tribes put to flight, but Abd-el-Kader is as far from being taken, and Algiers as far from being tranquilized, as they were fifteen years ago.

Another tribe of Indians, the Ojibbeways, have arrived in Paris, and will, no doubt, give public exhibitions like the Iowas. Mr. Catlin, the great traveler among the Indian tribes, is still there, and his exhibition of Indian paintings and curiosities is still open.

SWITZERLAND is in a most agitated state, notwithstanding public order is, generally speaking, established and maintained. The exasperation that exists between the religious and the radical party is most intense, and there seems every probability that nothing less than fighting it out will put an end to it.

PRUSSIA.—Next to the Queen's visit, all the talk is about the inauguration of the statue to Beethoven at Bonn. There will be a series of gigantic concerts, in which all the musical professors of all the nations of Europe will take part, and which will be attended by the most distinguished personages of Europe. Queen Victoria and the King of Prussia are expected to attend also. The people at Bonn are reaping a splendid harvest, and they are fleecing foolish visitors in glorious style. One man, we understand, has sold a mass of dirty bricks and mortar at an incredible price, by stating that they came from the house of Beethoven. Every Englishman, woman, and child, has got a bit of brick, or a bit of mortar, which he, and she, and it, ought to prize dearly, for it has cost dear enough.

At Posen, there have been serious troubles in connection with the new religion. Czerski, who is one of the prophets of the new faith, only escaped assassination by the furious mob, by the merest piece of good luck. The Catholic Archbishop is also in disgrace with the Government for the part he took in the matter.

A fresh instalment of the Chinese ransom-money, which was brought to England by the Cambrian, arrived in London on the 4th ult. The whole of the ransom consisting of $2,000,000.

Bosio, the celebrated sculptor, has just departed this life, deeply regretted. He was certainly one of the most eminent sculptors of our times. His works occupy a foremost place in the public and private galleries of France.

It is reported that the agent of Mr. Barnum, in London, has purchased the Chinese Collection belonging to Mr. Dunn, and that he intends adding it immediately to his Museum in New York.

Mr. E. Escott has given notice, that early next session he will move a resolution that maize or Indian corn be imported into England free of duty.

Wilmer and Smith's Times states that the ceremony of the prorogation of Parliament was marked by a singular incident:

The old Duke of Argyle, who in virtue of his office had to perform a piece of manual drudgery—that of carrying the Crown on a Cushion, stumbled and fell at the foot of the throne, and his discharge—that the superstition and the awe with which the world invests the emblem of supreme power—lay sprawling like its bearer, on the floor, with its glittering diamonds and rubies scattered all around.

The manufactures of Ohio are said to exceed $20,000,000 per annum.

ANTI-RENTERS IN CANADA.—The Government of Canada has made a demand upon the occupiers and leasees of Clergy Reserves in the township of Augusta, C. W., for "Back Rents" and interest. Disputes about the rightful ownership of these lands have existed for years, and their proper management has therefore been neglected.

The Tenants held a meeting on the subject, and assumed a threatening attitude. They have "unanimously resolved" "never to submit to the payment of such an unreasonable demand," and invite all the occupiers of 'Clergy Reserves' "to resist by all constitutional means the payment of 'Back Rents' and interest on such lands," at the same time proffering to all disposed thus to act, their "cordial support and co-operation in the struggle."

ARRIVALS FROM OREGON.—The ship Inez, from the Sandwich Islands, arrived at New Bedford on Sunday. Among the passengers in this ship were Doctor J. L. Babcock, lady and two children, and the Rev. H. W. Perkins, lady and four children, of the Methodist Episcopal Mission at Oregon. A city government had been organized in the Willamette Valley, Oregon. The first Mayor chosen is Mr. George Abernethy, formerly of this city, steward to the Methodist Mission in that country.

The citizens of Oregon are anxiously waiting for the printing establishment which was sent out to them in the barque Toulon. This vessel arrived at Callao on the 19th of June, and was to depart in a few days for the Sandwich Islands and Columbia River. Mr. Abernethy, at this time, is probably acting in the double capacity of Mayor of Oregon and editor of the Star of the West.

BRAVERY OF A YOUNG LADY.—Two ladies from Boston, who were bathing at an inlet on Plum Island, on Monday afternoon, had a narrow escape from drowning. One of them having fallen down, the other attempted to get her upon the beach, and in the attempt both were carried out beyond their depth. The daughter of one of the ladies (Mrs. Oakes, of Boston,) about thirteen years of age, who was with them, with great presence of mind immediately put on the life preserver which she had with her, and boldly swam out to them, and succeeded in drawing them both ashore. One of the ladies she was compelled to draw through the water with the hair of her head. The ladies were so much exhausted as to require medical attendance. [Newburyport Her.

SUMMARY.

The Mammoth Steamboat Oregon made her initial trip on Wednesday night to Newport and Providence, to which places she is to run for a few weeks. She probably exceeds any other boat on our waters in the extent of her accommodations and the costliness of her furniture. Her engines are from the Novelty Works, N. Y., and bid fair to increase the reputation of that already noted establishment.

> What I gave, I have."

Jarvis, of Middletown, Conn., the inventor of a useful surgical apparatus for reducing dislocations, known as the "adjuster," has received from the hands of Prince Albert, as President of the Society of Arts, the largest gold medal ever bestowed by, or in the gift of the Society. The medal is of the value of £15 sterling. He is the first American on whom such an honor has been conferred.

It would be difficult properly to characterize the fiend who placed it there.

The chestnut has been successfully grafted on oak, at the Department of Correze, and produced excellent chestnuts. The trees were grafted about eight years ago, and the complete success of the experiment is deemed very important, as in many districts where the oak flourishes abundantly the chestnut is not found, and the fruit is very much desired as an article of food.

On Monday afternoon, 18th ult., William Kendall, eldest son of Amos Kendall, Esq., was shot by William Rufus Elliot, brother-in-law of James C. Rives. A dispute originated between them at a ten-pin alley, and continued for a time, when Elliot retired, went to his lodgings, and procured a six-barreled revolving pistol fully charged. On returning, he met Kendall near Fuller's Hotel, and angry words were exchanged. Kendall with a stick advanced upon Elliot, when the latter drew his pistol, and shot his antagonist dead upon the spot. A Mr. Baily who was in company with Kendall then advanced upon Elliot, and two barrels were instantly discharged at him, by which his right arm was dreadfully shattered.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' SEMINARY.

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, Principal, and Professor of Languages.
IRA SAYLES, Associate Principal, and Professor of Mathematics.
GURDON EVANS, Professor of Natural Sciences.
J. R. HARTSHORN, Professor of Anatomy and Physiology.
O. STILLMAN, Professor of Vocal and Instrumental Music.
Miss C. B. MAXSON, Preceptress, Instructress in French, Italian, Drawing and Painting.
Mrs. M. B. KENYON, Assistant in the Female Department.

From the very liberal patronage extended to this Institution during the past seven years, the Trustees have been induced to make arrangements for greatly increasing its facilities. The Chemical, Philosophical, Astronomical, and Mathematical apparatus is amply sufficient for a full illustration of the different departments of those Sciences. The apparatus will be farther increased at the commencement of the ensuing Fall Term, by the introduction of whatever may be necessary in other Sciences than those above mentioned, especially, by a MANIKIN of the most approved structure, now being imported from Paris, expressly for this Institution. This will enable the student of Physiology and Anatomy to pursue his studies with advantages nearly equal to those afforded by an actual subject, having this farther advantage of being divested of all those revolting circumstances ever attendant on the dissecting room.

THE TEACHERS' CLASSES, as usual, will be exercised in practical teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective Instructors. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. Daily Lectures will also be given during the Fall and Winter Terms; and the public may be assured that this department of the Institution shall be conducted upon the principles of the best regulated Normal Schools, in this, or any other country.

Finally, the proprietors pledge themselves, that the reputation of this Institution shall be sustained by the introduction of whatever may be necessary to meet the demands of an intelligent public.

The Institution is liberally endowed and subject to the visitation of the Regents.

Its Library is choice and extensive, and accessible, also, to all the students gratis.

THE ACADEMIC YEAR for 1845—6 consists of three Terms, as follows:—The First, commencing Wednesday August 13, 1845, and ending Thursday, November 20. The Second, commencing Wednesday, November 26, and ending Thursday, March 6, 1846. The Third, commencing Wednesday, March 25, and ending Thursday, July 2.

EXPENSES.—Tuition, per term, from $3 50 to $5 00. Board, per week, $1 00. Piano, (extra,) per term, $10 00. Washing, lights and fuel, per term, from $2 00 to $5 00. The entire expenses for an Academic Year, including board, washing, lights, fuel and tuition, (except on the Piano,) need not exceed $70 00; and may even be reduced much below this, where individuls board themselves, either separately or in clubs. For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The Guarded House.

When the year 1814 began, troops of Swedes, Cossacks, Germans and Russians, were within half an hour's march of the town of Sleswick; and new and fearful reports of the behavior of the soldiers were brought before the country every day.—There had been a truce, which was to come to an end at midnight of the 5th of January, which was now drawing near.

On the outskirts of the town, on the side where the enemy lay, there was a house standing alone, and in it there was an old pious woman, who was earnestly praying in the words of an ancient hymn, that God would raise up a wall around them, so that the enemy might fear to attack them.

In the same house dwelt her daughter, a widow, and her grandson, a youth of twenty years. He heard the prayer of his grandmother, and could not restrain himself from saying, that he did not understand how she could ask for anything so impossible as that a wall should be built around them, which could keep the enemy away from their house. The old woman, who was now deaf, caused what her grandson said to be explained to her, but only answered that she had but prayed in general for protection for themselves and their towns' people. "However," she added, "do you think that if it were the will of God to build a wall around us, it would be impossible to him?"

And now came the dreaded night of the 5th of January; and about midnight the troops began to enter on all sides. The house we were speaking of lay close by the road, and was larger than the dwellings near it, which were only very small cottages. Its inhabitants looked out with anxious fear, as parties of the soldiers entered one after another, and even went to the neighboring houses to ask for what they wanted; but all rode past their dwelling.—Throughout the whole day there had been a heavy fall of snow—the first that winter—and towards evening the storm became violent to a degree seldom known. At length came four parties of Cossacks, who had been hindered by the snow from entering the town by another road. This part of the outskirts was at some distance from the town itself, and therefore they would not go farther; so that all the houses around that where the old woman lived were filled with these soldiers, who quartered themselves in them; in several houses there were fifty or sixty of these half savage men. It was a terrible night for those who dwelt in this part of the town, filled to overflow with the troops of their enemies.

But not a single soldier came into the grandmother's house; and amidst the loud noises and wild sounds all around, not even a knock at this door was heard, to the great wonder of the family within. The next morning, as it grew light, they saw the cause. The storm had drifted such a mass of snow, to such a height, between the roadside and the house, that to approach it was impossible. "Do you not now see, my son," said the old grandmother, "that it was possible for God to raise a wall around us?"

Does not this story remind us of the words, "The angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear Him and delivereth them?" Does it not seem as if the snow had been gathering together as by angels' hands to form a defence for that house where one dwelt who thus feared God and trusted in Him?

The Moravian Victory.

During the rebellion in Ireland, in 1793, the rebels had long meditated an attack on the Moravian settlement at Green-Hill, Wexford county. At length they put their threat in execution, and a large body of them marched to the town. When they arrived there, they saw no one in the streets nor in their houses. The brethren had long expected this attack, but true to their Christian profession, they would not have resource to arms for their defence, but assembled in their chapel, and in solemn prayer besought Him in whom they trusted to be their shield in this hour of great danger.—The ruffian band, hitherto breathing nothing but destruction and slaughter, were struck with astonishment at this novel sight; where they expected an armed band; they saw it clasped in prayer. Where they expected weapon to weapon, and the body armed for the fight; they saw the bended knee, and the humbled head before the altar of the Prince of Peace. They heard the prayer for protection; they heard the intended victims asking mercy for their murderers; they heard the song of praise, and the hymn of confidence in the sure promise of the Lord. They beheld in silence this little band of Christians; they felt unable to raise their hands against them, and after lingering in the streets, (which they filled,) for a night and day, with one consent they turned and marched away from the place without having injured an individual, or purloined a single loaf of bread. In consequence of this signal mark of protection from Heaven, the inhabitants of the neighboring villages brought their goods, and asked for shelter in the Grace-Hill which they called "the city of refuge."

FORTY YEARS AGO.

Forty years ago, literature meant, learning, and was supported by common sense. Refined nonsense had no advocates, and was pretty generally kicked out of doors.

Forty years ago, there were but few merchants in the country, or insolvent debtors—and they rarely imprisoned for debt.

Forty years ago, young ladies of the first respectability learned music—but it was the humming of the spinning wheel, and learned the necessary steps of dancing in following it. Their forte piano was a loom, their parasol a broom, and their novels a Bible.

Forty years ago, the young gentlemen hoed corn, chopped wood at the door, and went to school in the winter to learn reading, writing, and arithmetic.

Forty years ago, there were no such things as balls in the summer, and few in the winter, except snow balls.

Forty years ago, if a mechanic proposed to do your work, you might depend on his word; it would be done.

Forty years ago, when a mechanic finished his work, he was paid for it.

Forty years ago, printers were paid, and were therefore enabled to pay their debts. What a falling off!

DR. NOTT'S ADVICE TO A PUPIL.

The following letter written some years ago by the distinguished President of Union College, to a Graduate who passed under the immediate eye and guardianship of Dr. NOTT, as he was about to take his seat in the Legislature of this State, having fallen accidentally, into our hands, we hope the writer and the friend to whom it was written will pardon us for giving a wider range to the golden rule conceived in abounding wisdom and expressed with such precision and compactness:—

UNION COLLEGE, 20th Jan., 1836.

Dear Sir—Since I did not find you in the other day when I called, the interest I feel in your success as a public man, will be my apology for troubling you with a few observations, the observance of which may be of some use.

Do not speak often, and only on important occasions. When you do speak be brief, pertinent, and stop when you have finished. Speak rather in the furtherance of your own objects than in defeating those of others. Endeavor to allay the prejudices which naturally exist between the city and the country. Be courteous on all occasions, especially in debate and to your immediate antagonists. Never indulge in personalities, never lose your temper, nor make an enemy if you can avoid it. Conquests may be made by conciliation and persuasion as certainly as by ridicule and sarcasm, but in the one case the chains are silken and sit easy—in the other, iron and gall the wearer.

Though you point your arrors, never poison them; and if the club of Hercules must be raised, let it be the naked club, not entwined with serpents.

These are hints merely, but a word to the wise is sufficient. And with Legislators or others, a man needs to live one life to know how to live another, and since this cannot be done literally, we can only do it in effect, by availing ourselves of the experience of others.

Wishing you every success, I am, in haste, very sincerely yours,

ELIPHALET NOTT.

RELATIVE DECAY OF THE SEXES.

Decay in the male sex is much more rapid than in the female. In the three years ending June, 30, 1840, the total number of deaths among males throughout England and Wales was 518,006, while the deaths among females were only 499,58, giving an excess of male deaths in three years of 18,048. After this statement, it cannot appear surprising that the number of females in any country should notably exceed the number of males. At the present time, in London, there are 996,000 females to 878,000 males, or an excess of 119,000 ladies. Coupled with this fact, and obviously depending on it, is the superior longevity of the female sex. There died throughout England and Wales, between the 1st July, 1839, and 30th June, 1840, 5247 females, aged 85 and upwards; whereas of the same age there died only 3954 gentlemen, leaving what is called a "balance" in favor of the old ladies of 1293. Among the females who died, 71 had passed the age of 100, but only 40 males.

There are only three diseases common to the sexes which carry off more females than males; they are consumption, cancer and dropsy. The deaths by childbirth form but a very small fraction of the mortality of the female sex. The proportion is only 8 per 1000 of the total mortality; and as half a million of children are annually born in England and Wales, and scarcely 3000 deaths take place in childbirth, so there is only 1 death to 170 confinements. The researches of the registrar-general have brought to light some singular results with reference to the proportion with which acute diseases affect the two sexes. In the zymotic tribe the uniformity is quite extraordinary. Thus, out of 8194 persons dying of measles in 1840, throughout England and Wales, 4143 were males, and 4051 females—a difference of only 92. Again, out of 17,862 persons dying of scarlet fever in the same year, 8927 were males, 8935 were females—a difference of only 8. On the other hand, it appears that out of 14,806 dying of pneumonia, 1877 were males, and only 6629 females. Out of 22,787 dying of convulsion, 12,689 were males, and only 10,098 females. The superior value of female life, which this and all statistical considerations tend to prove, and which our insurance offices, by their variation of rates, acknowledge, is not attributable to any difference in the original construction of the body, (for man is built of stronger materials than woman;) but first, to the smaller demand upon her vital power during the middle period of life; secondly, to the healthier condition and temperature of the female mind; and thirdly, to the lesser amount of toil and anxiety which, in a highly civilized country, falls to the share of woman.

[Dr. G. Gregory.

THE "HONEST AND GOOD HEART."

It is humble, because it feels how far its goodness is from extending unto God, and how much there is that belongs to the unprofitable servant even in its best services. It is submissive, because he that is of God heareth God's words, and receives them with implicit faith and thankful acquiescence. It glories not in its attainments, or in its spiritual progress, because it is written, that it is God that maketh it to differ from another's, and that he resisteth the proud, but giveth grace unto the humble. [Bishop Summer.

Early Rising.

The lark is up to meet the sun.
The Bee is on the wing;
The ant his labor has begun,
The groves with music ring.

And shall I sleep when beams of morn
Their light and glory shed?
Immortal beings were not born
To waste their time in bed.

Shall birds and bees and ants be wise,
While I my moments waste?
O let me with the morning rise,
And to my duty haste.

From the Youth's Cabinet.

Rules for the Behaviour of Children, with the Reasons for them.

1. Endeavor, in dependence upon God, to obey all his commands.

Reason. Because in keeping of them there is great reward; having the promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come.

2. Read the Holy Bible diligently every day.

Reason. Because it will teach you what God has commanded; and because it is 'able to make you wise unto salvation.'

3. Never do anything when alone, which you would be ashamed to confess to another.

Reason. Because God always sees you.

4. Do to others as you would have others do to you.

Reason. Because this rule, when duly observed, will always prevent you from injuring, and lead you to seek the welfare of others.

5. When you have done wrong, freely confess your fault.

Reason. Because if you acknowledge it with sorrow and intention of amendment, you may hope for forgiveness; but if you deny it you make your sin the greater.

6. Pray to God both night and morning for the pardon of all your sins, and whatever blessing you need; and humbly thank him for all the mercies which you have received.

Reason. Because he is the giver of every mercy.

7. Present all your prayers and praises to God in the name of Christ.

Reason. Because it is for the sake of Christ only, that God imparts any blessing to men.

8. Go constantly to public worship on the Sabbath, and be always serious when you are there.

Reason. Because God has commanded it; Christ has set us the example; and true Christians have always reverenced and delighted in the house of God: besides, it is certain, if you find no pleasure in the worship of God on earth, you will never dwell with him in heaven.

9. Never take God's holy name in vain.

Reason. Because this will evidently prove that you do not love him, and will bring great guilt and misery upon your souls.

10. Honor the Rulers of the Nation, and others in authority.

Reason. Because God has expressly commanded it: and good rulers are a great blessing to a nation.

11. Obey your parents, masters, and mistresses.

Reason. Because God has appointed them to direct and instruct you in all things for your good.

12. Love your brothers, sisters, and school-fellows.

Reason. Because this will prevent quarrels, and promote mutual happiness.

13. Speak evil of no one.

Reason. Because it will not make him better; and it may cause you to sin by saying what is not true, or by speaking in an improper spirit.

14. Be kind to all.

Reason. Because our Heavenly Father is kind to all; "to the just and to the unjust."

15. Be true and just in all your dealings,

Reason. Because the contrary practice is a breach of the eighth commandment, and may bring you to public disgrace in this world, and to eternal misery in the next.

16. Always speak the truth.

Reason. Because a liar is despised by men; and especially, because "lying lips are an abomination to the Lord."

17. Be diligent in business.

Reason. Because with the blessing of the Lord, it ensures success.

18. Shun evil companions.

Reason. Because it is a true proverb, that "A man is known by his company;" and because God has said, that "A companion of fools shall be destroyed."

19. When you are in health, be thankful to God for it, and take care that you do not destroy it by vicious practices and bad habits.

Reason. Because the blessing of God is the cause, and your own care and prudence are the means of preserving this valuable blessing.

20. When you are sick, be patient; remembering that it is the hand of God which afflicts you, and that he punishes you less than your sins deserve; and pray to God for his blessing on the means used for your recovery.

Reason. Because a submissive and prayerful disposition is honorable to God, and will lead to a happy event.

21. Remember that whether in sickness or in health at present, a time is coming when you must die; and that time may be near.

Reason. Because if you do not think of your latter end, and if you die without an interest in Christ, you will be miserable for ever: but if you live to God while you live, you will after death dwell with him in eternal happiness.

A MISSIONARY.—Mr. J. N. Mars has been sent by the Wesleyans as a missionary to the colored fugitives in Canada.—Many others are, or soon will be, needed in that field. The colored population is fast increasing there, to the grief of slaveholders.

A Caravan.

IN Arabia, Syria, Nubia, Persia, Asia Minor, North Africa, and other portions of eastern countries, where the routes from place to place are infested with wandering hordes of robbers, and long dreary tracts of sterile land are to be crossed; where the desert is like "a sea without waters, an earth without solidity, disdaining to hold a foot-print as a testimony of subjection," travellers are accustomed to associate in large numbers, and make their journey in a body, for safety and convenience. A travelling company of merchants or pilgrims (for commerce, or devotion, or both, may be the object of their journey) is termed a caravan, from the Persian word carawan.—It is needless to state that the camel, the "ship of the desert," is the only animal capable of enduring the hardships of a journey across the arid and sandy plains, and at the same time to carry on its back a considerable burden. Horses do accompany the caravans, but unless the patient camel bore skins of water for their use, they would perish of thirst. The camel is capable of enduring ten days' thirst, and is commonly three or four days without water, drinking only at the fountains and watering places, while one camel is requisite to carry water for each horse for its daily wants.

The earliest mention of commerce in the sacred writings shows the little alteration which has taken place in the East in the mode of carrying on commercial intercourse. When the brethren of Joseph had cast him into a pit, they beheld a company of Ishmaelites coming from Gilead, "with their camels bearing spicery, and balm, and myrrh, going to carry it down to Egypt;" and in the present day, the caravans of Egypt and Arabia are carrying on the traffic which they did in the patriarchal age and in the less simple days of Solomon; the merchandise being nearly the same, and the manner in which trade is conducted offering no striking difference. In these countries there cannot be a cheaper mode of transporting goods and objects of traffic. The house or chapel on his back." In addition to these camel splendors, there were horses with every variety of comparison; Mamelukes and pikemen, and Janizaries, and traveller Burckhardt says: "In countries where camels are bred in great numbers, land-carriage is almost as cheap as that by water. The carriage for a camel load of goods, weighing from six hundred to seven hundred pounds English, from Bagdad to Alleppo, a distance of six hundred miles, is £4." The caravans are designated light or heavy, according to the load which the camels bear. Six or seven cwts. is the average burden of a camel. They carry millstones nearly six feet in diameter to the large towns on the west of the Jordan; heavy goods in large panniers; and bales of merchandise are strapped on their backs, being fastened round the body with cordage or leather thongs. They are also made to carry a sort of litter in which women and children ride. The camels employed in the carriage of heavy burdens are to other descriptions of the same annimal what the dray-horse is to the hunter or the race-horse.

A pilgrim caravan, in crossing the African deserts, presents a most singular sight. A traveller who witnessed the setting out of one of them from Cario, several years ago, has given the following minute description of it. The cavalcade, he says, was six hours in passing him!

The most striking appearance was the camels in their splendid trappings, laden with provisions, and clothes, culinary apparatus, water-skins, tents, artillery, and holy Shieks and Mamelukes. There were camels "with two brass field-pieces each"—others "with bells and streamers"—others "with men beating kettle-drums"—others "covered with purple velvet"—others "with men walking by their sides, playing on flutes and flageolets"—others "handsomely ornamented about their necks, their bridles being studded with silver, intermixed with glass beads of all colors, and ostrich feathers on their foreheads"—and last of all "the sacred camel, with a fine bridle studded with jewels and gold, and led by two holy Shieks, in green,—a square agas, and the commander of the pilgrimage, in robes of satin—to say nothing of numberless "buffoons playing many pranks."

When it is safest to Run.

"Go the other way! Go the other way!" cried Mr. Grace, a thoughtful neighbor, as Samuel Hawkes was about to get over the fence into Mr. Benson's orchard. Sad complaints had been made of the boys for pelting the fruit trees, and Mr. Grace would have felt ashamed of any Sunday scholar who would dare to take what belonged to another.

Mr. Grace had a good opinion of Samuel Hawks, who was a steady lad; but he thought that the temptation might be too much for him, so he pursuaded him to take the other path. "Samuel," said he, "listen to me."

THE GLASS OF GIN.

"I once saw a man running from the door of a public-house, while two or three other men were hallowing after him. Ay, thought I, this fellow has been drinking, and is running away without paying for his liquor. Presently after, however, I overtook the man, and asked him what made him run away so fast from the tavern-door. 'Why, sir,' said he, 'not a very long time ago I was a sad drunkard; my wife and children were in rags, and I was about going to a jail, when a good friend stepped forward and agreed to save me from a prison, if I would promise never to drink another glass of spirits as long as I lived Up to this hour the promise I made has not been broken. Having walked a long way to-day, I called at the door of the public-house yonder, for a draught of water; but no sooner had I drank it, than an old companion of mine came up, and offered to treat me with a glass of gin. Having drank my glass of good pure water, and seeing the landlord pouring out the gin, I fairly took to my heels, for I knew too much of my own heart to trust myself. If I were to pause and stop to talk in a place of temptation it would be too strong for me; but so long as I can run away from it, I am safe.'

"Well, thought I, I must take example from this man, and run away from temptation whenever it approaches me. Now it will be a good thing, if you will do just as he did; for a boy is as likely to be tempted by a cherry-cheeked apple, as a man is by a glass of gin." [Youth's Penny Gazette,

Infant Piety.

How leaps the baby in its mother's arms, when the mysterious charm of music thrills through its little brain! And how learns it to modulate its feeble voice, unable yet to articulate, to the melodies that bring forth all round its eyes a delighted smile! Who knows what then may be the thoughts and feelings of the infant awakened to a sense of a new world, alive through all its being to sounds that haply glide past our ears unmeaning as the breath of the common air! Thus have mere infants sometimes been inspired by music till, like small genii, they warbled spell-strains of their own, powerful to sadden and subdue our hearts. So, too, have infant eyes been charmed by the rainbow irradiating the earth, that almost infant hands have been taught, as if by inspiration, the power to paint in finest colors, and to imitate, with a wondrous art, the skies so beautiful to the quick-awakened spirit of delight. What knowledge have not some children acquired, and gone down scholars to their untimely graves! Knowing that such things have been—are—and will be—why art thou credulous of the divine expansion of soul, to understand the things that are divine, [Professor Wilson.

A Brave Boy.

The Newark Advertiser mentions a Jersey boy, who at various times has saved four lives, although he is not ten years old. The brave little fellow deserves some appropriate testimonial. The winter before last, says the Advertiser, then a little over eight years old, he saw his younger brother break through the ice, where the water was four feet deep. He had to run 12 or 15 yards to reach the pond, and remembering having heard his mother read a story from one of Peter Parley's clever books of a person saving another's life, when the ice was not strong enough for him to walk upon it, by creeping, he laid down on the ice, crept to the hole where his brother had broken through, reached into the water and pulled him by the hair, when he had sunk for the third time. Creeping backwards he drew the rescued sufferer to the shore.—Last winter he saved the lives of three boys at the same pond; and in one of these instances, shewed as much coolness and presence of mind as any grown person could.—Seeing the ice was too thin to bear him, he tried to borrow a sled of a boy near by, who refused it: pushing the boy over, he seized the sled and pushed it to the sinking lad, who caught hold of it, and he holding on by the string, pulled him to the shore.—We have only to add that this clever child is as good as he is manly and brave."

TRUST IN GOD.

None ever trust in God without increasing in spiritual strength. None ever trusted in him without discovering more and more of the plans of his providence, and the depth of his unsearchable wisdom. None ever trusted in him without tasting largely of his bounty.

[Bowdler.

IMPORTANT CORRECTION.—The Charleston Mercury declares, "There is no truth whatever in the report that the clergyman of an Episcopal church in Mississippi killed the clerk with a bowie knife, during the service, for giving out 'Oh! 'tis a joyful sound'—immediately after the clergyman had announced his intention of going to Texas." We are glad to hear it.

THE ETHIOPIC CHURCH.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:

Some months since, I was much interested in the accompanying notice of the Ethiopic Church, which I extract from a review of Harris' "Highlands of Ethiopia," in the "North British Review," believing that your readers will be equally interested in it, as Eastern Africa has been selected as the field of labor for the Foreign Mission of the Seventh-day Baptist denomination, and to which we will look, for time to come, with much feeling and deep solicitude.—W. M. F.

While all over the plains they had been, as Christians, despised and insulted, and had found Mahomet every where reverenced as the only prophet of God, and the Koran as his law, they had now come among a nation of their own faith—a land of priests and monks, of crosses, churches, and monasteries—a land where every man bore, as a badge of his Christianity, a blue silk cord around his neck, and manifested his zeal for the faith, by refusing to eat or drink with pagan or Mahommedan.

It is this last circumstance—the Christianity of its inhabitants—that invests Shoa and Abyssinia in general, with peculiar interest. The churches of Africa fill a large space in the ancient history of Christendom. But they disappeared from European observation, when the southern shores of the Mediterranean were overrun by the Saracens; and for centuries, western Christendom was entirely ignorant, that behind Egypt and Nubia, there existed a great Christian kingdom. Even still, not a few will hear with surprise, that in that region there are not Christians merely, but a national establishment of Christianity, which dates from the earliest ages.

The Abyssinians trace their Christianity to the Ethiopian Eunuch, mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles; but authentic history fixes its introduction among them to the beginning of the fourth century, by Frumentius, its first bishop. In the next century, the Christian Church was established in the Abyssinian empire, and seems to have spread far into the heart of Africa. Frumentius derived his episcopal orders from the Patriarch of Alexandria; and the church which he founded has ever since kept its allegiance to the apostolic see.—When Dioscorus, the Alexandrian Patriarch, was condemned with Eutyches, by the Council of Chalcendon, in 481. for denying the human nature of Christ, the Abyssinians rejected the decrees of the Council; and for fifteen centuries the "Aboon," or Patriarch of the Ethiopic Church, has been invariably a Coptic priest, sent from Egypt, and ordained by the Father at Alexandria.

Of the state and fortunes of this Christian Church and kingdom during the middle ages, the notices in accessible history are extremely scanty. It appears that Abyssinia, politically considered, had undergone the expansion and contraction usual to nations, having at one time extended itself across the Red Sea into Asia, and having again not only drawn back into Africa, but shorn, by the spread of Mahommedanism, of the low provinces along the Red Sea coast. About the beginning of the sixteenth century, the Portuguese, from their possessions in the East, discovered and made known to European Christendom this hidden Christian kingdom. The intercourse forthwith established between them and the Abyssinians, was at first friendly; but the Europeans were soon shocked by the discovery, that their new brethren were living in the double criminality of heresy and schism; and every other consideration was forgotten in eagerness to subdue them to the faith and the dominion of Rome. This enterprise was assumed by the Jesuits as their special work. Then followed a contest, continued for many years, between the missionaries of Rome and the people of Abyssinia, in which the former made a full display of the persevering, crafty, merciless, daring, unscrupulous ambition, characteristic of their famous order. After many repulses, they succeeded in the early part of the seventeenth century, in converting the Negoos, or Emperor. The events which followed, remind us of the nearly contemporaneous story of our own Country, [England.] Edicts went forth, proclaiming that the nation had submitted to the Roman Pontiff, and commanding the people to adopt the faith, observe the rites, and receive the priests of the Romish Church. But they obstinately refused; force was called in to produce submission; popular insurrections followed one after another; all were quenched in deluges of blood. But in the end the inhuman labor of persecution disgusted the Emperor; and after a great victory over 20,000 of the peasantry, wherein 8000 perished, he relinquished the bloody task to which Rome had set him, yielded, like our Scottish legislators, to the "inclinations of his people," and by an edict, distinguished for its frankness and simplicity, restored religious peace to Abyssinia.—"Hear! hear! We formerly gave you the Roman faith, believing it to be true; but innumerable multitudes of my people having been slain upon that account, under the command of Julius, Guergis, Cerca, Christos, and others, as now also among the peasants; We do therefore restore the religion of your fathers to you, so that your priests are to take possession of their churches again, and to officiate therein as formerly."

The whole ended in the final expulsion of the Roman emissaries from Abyssinia. The result is gratifying, as a triumph of religious liberty, and as a check to the extension of the Romish despotism and superstition. It must be owned, however, that pure religion was little involved in the struggle. The religion of Abyssinia equals—it can scarcely surpass—that of Rome itself, as a corruption and debasement of Christianity. The passages in these volumes, descriptive of its tenets and usages, seem relations of some strange superstition, rather than of our own religion. Major Harris gives a "Confession" of the Ethiopic faith; but he does not state whence he derived it; and it bears, we think, internal evidence of being not official or complete. From his chapters, and other sources, we learn the following particulars which may interest the reader.

The Ethiopic Church agrees with other Eastern Churches, in holding the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father only; it maintains, besides, the Eutychian doctrine respecting the nature of Christ. In these respects it differs from all the Western Churches. But from the Romish Church it is farther distinguished by its doctrine in regard to the supremacy of the Pope, in which it concurs with Protestants; to the rule of faith, which it limits to Scripture (including the Apocrypha); to the Eucharist, which it administers in both kinds to the laity, and regards neither as a transubstantiation nor a sacrifice; to the celibacy of the clergy, who may be married; to the adoration of images, which it reckons unlawful, though its churches abound with rude paintings of God, angels, and saints; and to the state of the soul after death, rejecting purgatory, yet owning an intermediate state, not less gainful to the priesthood, wherein the happiness of the departed is affected by the fasts and alms of the living. But, like Rome, it invocates saints and angels as intercessors with God, surpassing all other Christians in the honors (if such they be) paid to the Virgin and St. Michael, and having a most copious calandar of saints, with a corresponding list of festivals and fasts. It enjoins, also, confessions to the priests, whose curse is dreaded by the people as the last calamity, while they confidently rely on the alms-giving and penances he imposes as an expiation of sin. Its most extraordinary peculiarities are certain usages and ceremonies, either borrowed from the Jews, or retained from the old Ethiopic faith. Their churches, which generally are small and mean, resemble precisely the Jewish temple. Like it, they are divided into three parts; the innermost is the holy of holies, and may be entered by the priest alone. Here the communion vessels are deposited, and the sacramental elements consecrated; and here is kept the "Tabot" or Ark, a mysterious box, inhabiting all their churches, the contents of which are carefully concealed from the vulgar eye, though "the gold of the foreigner"—(so Major Harris terms a bribe)—enabled him to ascertain that they are only a scroll of parchment, inscribed with the name of the patron saint. Save on certain occasions, the laity cannot pass the outer porch; unbelievers, and all subject to Levitical uncleannesses, are carefully shut out; all must be barefoot, and the threshold and the door must be kissed in passing. The service is in the Geez, or ancient Ethiopic, now a dead language; it commences with the Jewish Trisagion, and as David danced before the Lord, so their priests, armed with a cross and a slender crutch, the badge of their office, "caper and beat the ground with their feet, stretch out their crutches to each other with frantic gesticulation, whilst the clash of the timbrel, the sound of the drum, and the howling of harsh voices, complete a most strange form of devotion." They observe with equal strictness the seventh day and the first; the Sabbath of the Jews, and the Lord's-day of the Christians. They observe the Levitical prohibitions as to unclean animals; they wash their cups and platters as a religious duty; they will not eat or drink with pagan or Moslem; nor taste of flesh that has not been slain in the name of the Trinity. They practice circumcision; not asserting it to be obligatory, yet rigorously imposing it on every pagan converted to Christianity. They allow of concubinage. They are all baptized once every year, commemorating the baptism of Christ, at the Epiphany, by a religious procession to the river, into which men, women, and children, enter in a promiscuous and shameless crowd. Fasts, of extraordinary frequency, are observed with unexampled strictness; two every week, on Wednesday and Friday; while, reckoning all the holy-days together, one entire half of the year is consumed, by the command of the Church, in ruinous idleness. Mingled with these corruptions of Christianity, and remnants of Judaism, there exists, if not by the laws of the Church, at least in the usages of the people, many remains of heathenism. Ostrich eggs surround the cross that crowns every church, and they depend from the ceiling within; in times of sickness or danger, an ox, after being slowly led round the house or the village, is sacrificed with its face to the east; they believe in signs and omens, demons and sorcerers, and have undoubting faith in charms and amulets. To this imperfect sketch we add, that while the lessons and prayers of divine service are in the dead Ethiopic or Geez tongue, only four religious books are written in the Amharic, the present language of Christian Abyssinia; these are a tissue of absurd controversies and monkish legends; and while the legends delight the Abyssinian laity, the controversies compose the entire knowledge of the clergy, who exercise their intellect, expend their virulence, and are split into hostile sects, by disputes respecting the three births of Christ; and the knowledge of the human soul in the womb.

The country is overspread to excess with churches. And of the numbers of the professedly religious in all Abyssinia, an estimate may be formed from the statement, that they amount in Shoa to near one fourth of the population.* The Aboon is the ecclesiastical head; and the Ethiopic Church confines to his hands alone the grace or virtue that makes a clergyman; differing in this from other churches, called apostolic, which allow it to all bishops. Next in dignity is the Grand Prior of the Monks of Debra Libanos; then the Bishops (Comos), the Priests (Alaka), and the Deacons. The clergy may marry; but on the demise or divorce of the first wife, no second is permitted. Monasteries abound, and their sites in Abyssinia, as elsewhere, are generally distinguished for comfort and beauty. An easy ceremony admits to the monkish order, and as the life of the professed is one of ease and indulgence, and as the "putting on angel's clothing"—(so they term turning monk)—absolves from all debts, the land swarms with monks, friars, and anchorites, who roam through it as its pests and plagues. Certain revenues from lands and villages are set apart for every church establishment, and to these a large addition is made by baptism, funeral, and other fees, and by the voluntary donations of the superstitious people, who have a sacred reverence for the clergy, and think that the kiss of a priest's hand cleanses from sin. The result is, that the clergy are like the people, ignorant, superstitious, and immoral, jealous of innovations, hating heretics, and observing their routine of religious forms, some of them with the sincerity of devotees, others as the business-like followers of a gainful profession. We need scarcely add, that of those doctrines which Protestants regard as the power of Christianity, the ignorance is so entire, and they are so opposite to the rooted ideas of the people, that they can scarcely be so much as understood. It is possible, however, that there may be some misapprehension on this point. The sacred fire may still be burning, however feebly, even amid an atmosphere so impure—the Divine Inhabitant may still be present in this polluted temple. At all events, there is hope for the future, if it be true, that at the foundation of Abyssinian Christianity lies the holy Scriptures; and so long as there is there no infallible Church, consecrating with its authority the manifold corruptions from which it sprung, and by which it is nourished.

*This is accounted for by the fact mentioned by Mr. Gobat, that as they advanced in life, most men and women become monks and nuns.

ST. PETER'S CHURCH.

This wonder of the whole world is a wonder in truth. No nation on earth can boast of such a Temple, either Christian or Pagan. This immense pile is 610 feet long, 450 wide, and 448 in height. I ascended to the ball, and went into it with three others. This ball will contain at a time 26 grown persons. The exterior of this church appears rather mean; that is, the sides, but when you enter and walk up some 200 feet, you will then feel that you are in St. Peter's. All is colossal. Nothing half so small as life. After you have looked around for 30 minutes in silence, you venture to speak, and utter only this, "Wonderful! wonderful! wonderful! is the mighty Temple." Every place is filled with statues and paintings. But when you come to examine these paintings and find them all mosaics, the stranger is confounded. Everything of the finest marble, or bronze, or statuary, and mosaics in painting; but after all it is only a Pagan Temple, for the very statue of St. Peter, which they have so often kissed, that the toe nails are worn off, was found in one of the Pagan Temples—a statue of Jupiter. This great church is full of saints, and they are worshiped in preference to the Deity. Such is the custom in all the papal churches. The ceremony of the Pope's taking St. Peter's chair, was performed when I was in Rome, and they carried the old man round the church so often that he became dizzy and drunk. This was done by the cardinals and other officers of the church. During this idolatrous procession, at least 200 soldiers were present to preserve order. This great Temple, with the semi-circular colonnade, and the fountains and Vatican and open space, occupies 300 men daily to keep it in order. I told them to take special care of this church, for they would never find the world foolish enough to give their millions to erect such another building. The very atmosphere in this church is remarkable; it seemed as if moderately heated, and quite clarified, but it is difficult precisely to describe it.

The facade is built of the common stone of the country. It has three stories and an attic, eight columns, and four pilasters, of the Corinthian order, each story, and heavy balconies from which the Pope bestows his benediction, on Easter Sunday, on the people. The eight columns are each 8 1-4 feet diameter, and ninety-one feet long. It is the master-piece of all temples, whatever may be its faults of architecture. The circumference of the four great pillars that support the dome, is 232 feet. The diameter of the dome outside to outside, 193 feet. The height of dome, 430 feet, exceeding Paul's in length 84 feet, and in heighth 60 feet, diameter of cupola 48.

The next great object in this church is the grand canopy immediately under the great dome, supported by four spiral columns of bronze, highly ornamented and gilt. Under this canopy below, is said to be the tomb of St. Peter, the gilding of which is said to have cost 400,000 Roman crowns, and the columns 100,000 crowns, being formed of brass taken from the Pantheon. The weight of these columns is 186,000 lbs. Under this canopy is an altar of superb magnificence, at which the Pope alone performs service. In front is a sort of balustrade, and around it and underneath are burning continually 112 lamps.

The tribune contains the identical chair of bronze in which St. Peter officiated. This great church is filled with chapels; in one of them called the capalla della Colonna Santa, is a column said to be that which Christ leaned against in the temple at Jerusalem, when disputing with the doctors. But we know that Titus destroyed Jerusalem in the 79th year of Christ, and left not one stone upon another. How could the pillar Christ leaned against have escaped? Besides they have no authority for saying that he leaned against a pillar at all.

Immediately under St. Peter's is a kind of subterranean church called the Grotto Vaticano. This church was erected over the tombs of the early Christian saints, and contains many tombs of great men. The road leading to the top of the church, (query St. Peter's) is remarkable. It is paved, of a very moderate ascent, by which horses with loads upon their backs go up. The roof is a sort of a village, where the workmen live, some 15 or 20 of them. When at the top of the dome, you have a full view of the country for 25 miles around—the mountains, the sea, and the river Tiber, are in view for many miles.

The illumination at St. Peter's in holy weeks is beyond all description—it is lighted with 5875 brilliant lamps. There are great ceremonies about Christmas and at New Year's. At the purification of the Virgin, February 2d, the Pope says High Mass in person, and blesses the candles. On Ash Wednesday he sprinkles ashes on the heads of the Cardinals. On Palm Sunday he blesses the branches; at other times, the people; and on one occasion annually, he washes the feet of twelve of his oldest priests, and waits upon them at table. Before the Pope pronounces the benediction, one of the Cardinals curses all Jews, Turks, and heretics, by bell, book and candle. Next day, the Holy Cross of Fire is exhibited in the presence of the Pope and his Court. In fact, the whole winter is spent in the exhibition of idolatry—much more than in Nero's time. Vespers are offered, in presence of the Pope and Cardinals, for the dead. Rome contains many superb churches, particularly as regards their interior,—some 400 churches in all.

EDWARD CLEON'S BIBLE.

Passing down one of the crowded streets which intersect our ever busy metropolis, chance led me to the door of one of those odd recepticles for every variety of old traffic, a second hand auction shop. I was about turning away, when the sonorous voice from within poured into my ear these mystic words;—"Walk in, gentlemen, walk in; it is a real continentaler and no mistake—here it is, printed many a year before either of us was born: how much for it." The quaint binding of the old volume struck my fancy, and I bought the work. It proved to be a copy of the Bible, which had the appearance of having been well read and carefully preserved. On the first leaf was written in a female hand, Edward Cleon's Bible, from his mother, to be read every day. On inquiring, I learned that it came under the auctioneer's hammer on account of the recent death of its owner, an old man who was found dead in his chair a few weeks ago. The neighbors among whom he visited, crowded around me and related his brief history in the simplest manner; few of them but shed tears over his mournful story. He died in extreme poverty, but they said his Bible was his constant study. When he was first discovered, his hand was resting on the open volume, which he had apparently just been perusing. On the poor worm-eaten table, by his side, were found these lines traced by the trembling hand of age on a blank leaf, which had dropped from his time-worn treasure. Reader! 'tis a beautiful lesson, the death of that old man: he had seen better days, but he never forgot his God.

Search the Scriptures; seek and ponder,
Mighty thoughts in every line;
When the feet of childhood wander,
Toward the heavenly page incline.

Search the scriptures—daily, nightly—
Truth that on life's threshold stands;
Like a beacon, burning brightly,
They will warn of treacherous sands.

Search the scriptures—pray believing,
Aged men, with locks of snow;
Trust in God; go on receiving
Joy the world can never know.

Search the scriptures; Jesus taught them;
Way, and Truth, and Life are they;
Saints in heaven long humbly sought them—
Saviour teach us to obey. F.

SUGGESTIONS FOR THE MINISTRY.

BY THE LATE REV. DR. MASON.

Elegant dissertations upon virtue and vice, and upon the evidence of revelation, may entertain the prosperous and the gay; but they will not mortify our members, which are upon the earth; they will not unsting calamity, nor feed the heart with an imperishable hope. When I go to the house of God, I do not want amusement. I want the doctrine which is according to godliness. I want to hear the remedy against the harrassing of my guilt, and the disorder of my affections. I want to be led from weariness and disappointment, to that goodness which filleth the hungry soul. I want to have light upon the mystery of providence; to be taught how the judgments of the Lord are right—how I shall be prepared for duty and for trial—how I may pass the time of my sojourning here in fear, and close it in peace. Tell me of that Lord Jesus, who his own self bare our sins in his own body on the tree. Tell me of his intercession for the transgressors as their advocate with the Father. Tell me of his Holy Spirit, whom they that believe on him receive to be their preserver, sanctifier, comforter. Tell me of his chastenings; their necessity, and their use. Tell me of his presence, and sympathy, and love. Tell me of the virtues, as growing out of his cross, and nurtured by his grace. Tell me of the glory reflected on his name by the obedience of faith. Tell me of the vanquished death, of the purified grave, of a blessed resurrection of the life everlasting—and my bosom warms. This is gospel; these are glad tidings to me as a sufferer, because glad to me as a sinner. They rectify my mistakes, allay my resentments, rebuke my discontent, support me under the weight of moral and natural evil. These attract the poor—steal upon the thoughtless—awe the irreverent—and throw over the service of the sanctuary a majesty, which some fashionable modes of address never fail to dissipate. Where they are habitually neglected, or lightly referred to, there may be much grandeur, but there is no gospel; and those preachers have infinite reason to tremble, who, though admired by the great, and caressed by the vain, are deserted by the poor, the sorrowful, and such as walk humbly with their God.

Antiquity of Epitaphs.—Many instances of epitaphs, in prose and verse, may be collected from the old Greek poets and historians, who were yet but children compared to the Chaldeans and Egyptians. But the most ancient precedent of epitaphs must be recorded in the most ancient history, viz. the Old Testament, 1st Sam. vi. 18, where it is recorded that the great stone erected as a memorial unto Abel by his father Adam, remained unto that day in being, and its name was called "the stone of Abel," as it is called 4,000 years after Matt. 23: 35. And this is the origin of monumental memorials.

THE HAPPY BEGGAR.

A great Divine prayed to God, during the space of eight years, that he would be graciously pleased to direct him to a man who might teach him the true way to heaven. It was said to him at length, 'Go to such a church porch, and there you will find a man, who will instruct you in the spiritual life.' Accordingly he went, and found a beggar very neatly clad. He saluted him in these words, 'God give you a good day, my friend.' The poor man answered, 'Sir, I do not remember that I ever had an evil day.' The doctor said to him, 'God give you a good and happy life.' 'Why say you that?' replied the beggar; 'I never was unhappy.' 'God bless you, my friend,' said the doctor.' 'Pray tell me what you mean.' He replied, 'That I will willingly do. I told you first, that I never had an evil day; for when I have hunger, I praise God; if it rain, hail, snow or freeze, be it fair or foul; or if I am despised or ill-used, I return God thanks; so I never had an ill day; nor have I ever been unhappy, since I have always resigned myself to his will, being very certain of this, that all his works are perfectly good; and therefore I never desire any thing else but the good pleasure of God.' 'Then,' said the doctor, 'what if the good pleasure of God should be to cast you hence into hell?' 'If he would do so,' replied the other, 'I have two arms to embrace him with; the one whereof is a profound humility, by which I am united to holy humanity; the other is love or charity, which joins me to his divinity. Embraced with these two arms he would descend with me thither, if thither he ordered me; and there I infinitely rather be with him, than in paradise without him.' Hereby the doctor learned that a true resignation to the divine will, accompanied with profound humility of heart, is the proper way to attain God's love.

THE WASTED FLOWERS.

On the velvet margin of the rivulet sat a rosy child. Her lap was filled with flowers, and a garland of rosebuds was twined around her neck. Her face was radiant as the sunshine that fell upon it, and her voice was clear as the bird's which warbled at her side.

The little stream went singing on, and with every gush of its music the child lifted a flower in its dimpled hand, and with a merry laugh, threw it upon its surface. In her glee she forgot that her treasure was growing less, and with the swift motions of childhood, she flung them to the sparkling tide, until every bud and blossom had disappeared. Then seeing her loss, she sprung to her feet, and bursting into tears, called aloud to the stream—"Bring back my flowers!" But the stream danced along, regardless of her tears; and as it bore the blooming burthen away, her words came back in a taunting echo along its margin. And long after, amid the wailing of the breezes and the fearful bursts of childish grief, was heard the fruitless cry, "Bring back my flowers!"

Merry maiden, who art idly wasting the precious moments so bountifully bestowed upon thee—see in the thoughtless, impulsive child, an emblem of thyself. Each moment is a perfumed flower. Let its fragrance be dispensed in blessings on all around thee, and ascend as sweet incense to its beneficent Giver. Else, when thou hast carelessly flung them from thee, and seest them receding on the swift waters of time, thou wilt cry with the weeping child—"Bring back my flowers!" And the only answer will be an echo from the past—"Bring back my flowers!"

THE WONDERS OF PRAYER.

BY REV. J. RYLAND, OF NORTHAMPTON, ENG.

Abraham's servant prays—Rebekah appears. Jacob wrestles, and prays, and prevails with Christ—Esau's mind is wonderfully turned from the revengeful purpose he had harbored for 20 years. Moses cries to God—the sea divides. Moses prays—Amalek is discomfited. Joshua prays—Achan is discovered. Hannah prays—Samuel is born. David prays—Ahithophel hangs himself. Asa prays—a victory is gained. Jehoshaphat cries to God—God turns away his foes. Isaiah and Hezekiah pray—185,000. Assyrians are dead in twelve hours. Daniel prays—the dream is revealed. Daniel prays—the lions are muzzled. Daniel prays—the seventy weeks are revealed. Mordecai and Esther fast—Haman is hanged on his own gallows in three days. Ezra prays at Ahava—God answers. Nehemiah darts a prayer—the King's heart is softened in a minute. Elijah prays—a drought of three years succeeds. Elijah prays—rain descends apace. Elisha prays—Jordan is divided. Elisha prays—a child's soul comes back; for prayer reaches eternity. The church prays ardently—Peter is delivered by an angel.

Short Prayers.—One of the shortest and most comprehensive prayers of modern times, said Sir William Wyndham, is that of a soldier before the battle of Blenheim,—"Oh God! if there be a God, save my soul, if I have a soul." Bishop Atterbury, who was present, said he could produce a prayer as concise as that, and offered in similar circumstances, but he thought in a much better spirit. It was that of a pious soldier, uttered immediately before an engagement. "O Lord! if in the hour of battle I forgot thee, do not thou forget me."

Nothing so consistent as truth, nothing so lovely as virtue, and nothing so subduing as kindness; he who possesses all these can but triumph in the end.

PERSECUTION IN VERMONT.

We have before us a long letter written from the Jail in Chelsea, Vt., by one PLYMON SEAVER, who has been shut up there for some time past, because he refused to pay a fine imposed upon him for working on Sunday. It seems that last spring Mr. Seaver was engaged in clearing la d, and as the weather was very favorable, and he somewhat in a hurry, he worked two or three Sundays in succession at piling logs, burning brush, and making fence—without thinking, as he says, of disturbing any one, or attracting any special notice. But in the latter part of May he was visited by a Grand Juryman, who wanted to know the facts in the case, and to whom he told all he had done, but would not promise never to do the like again. A few days afterward another Grand Juryman visited him to say, that a complaint had been entered before him, which the law made it his duty to prosecute. Hereupon Mr. Seaver told him plainly what were his views respecting the Sabbath, what his practice had been, and what he intended it should be in future; and farther, that if he, the said Grand Juryman, felt bound to prosecute a man for doing what he considered to be his duty, he might do it in all conscience.

The next intimation Mr. Seaver had of the progress of matters, was by a visit from the Constable, with a command to arrest his body, and bring him before the authorities, to answer to the charge of having, on the 11th day of May, 1845, and on the first day of June, 1845, between twelve o'clock of the nights preceding, and the setting of the sun on the same days, worked at his business of clearing land and making fence, which was not a work of necessity or charity. The Constable also at that time read a warrant to his father, Ansil Seaver, indicting him for the same offence. They went down to court together, where some interesting discussion was had, and where the younger Seaver stated that he had done all the work specified in the warrant, and even more, which he claimed he had a perfect right to do. But notwithstanding this statement and plea, they were both fined two dollars each, besides the cost of prosecution, which was $5 33 more. The older Seaver agreed to settle up the affair; but the younger, refusing to do so, was after considerable delay taken to jail. Mr. Seaver's letter was written after fifteen days confinement, and assures his friends that he rejoices to suffer persecution for righteousness sake, and that he knows not how long he shall remain there, or by what means he shall go out. It closes with several questions and reflections, which ought to be seriously pondered by his persecutors and their supporters. He asks, "Why not prosecute men for disregarding other religious institutions as well as this? Why not compel a man to pray? Why not force a man into the water to be baptized? Why not summons a Sheriff to take a man by the collar, and march him up to the communion table? Can any possible reason be given why the one should be enforced, and not the others? I think not. But I tell them they are going the wrong way to work. If they want to save their Sabbath, they had better refrain from such measurers as these."

—And we think as much. Indeed, we believe that no step could have been taken which would more effectually strengthen the hands of those who hate the Sabbath, than this step of the Grand Jurymen in Vermont. It denies the right of private judgment, by imprisoning a man for believing differently from others and then practicing according to the dictates of his own conscience. It abandons the ground, that the Sabbath is a religious institution, the observance of which is to be secured, like the observance of all other religious institutions, by diffusing light and exerting a religious influence. It places the Sabbath before the world as a mere civil matter, which needs the support of civil penalties, and cannot stand without them. Let this become the prevailing opinion, and we shall soon see an end of all outward regard for the day of rest—much more of all that sacred regard for it which alone is acceptable to God or profitable to men. And yet this proceeding in Vermont is in perfect keeping with the efforts which are being made all over the country; it is a natural child of that movement which aims to secure a better sanctification of Sunday simply by conventional recommendations and legislative enactments. Suppose that all which this movement aims at could be accomplished, so that the post offices should be closed, and railroad cars, and steamboats, and canal boats, and all other public vehicles, should cease to run. What would this do to promote such Sabbath-keeping as the law of God requires—to make men 'call the Sabbath a delight, holy of the Lord, honorable, and honor him, not doing their own ways, nor finding their own pleasure, nor speaking their own words?' What would it do to promote such Sabbath-keeping? Just nothing at all. On the contrary, it would separate the whole matter so effectually from the law of God, that obedience to Him would be wholly out of the question. But we have no apprehension that the designs of this movement will ever be accomplished. God has so ordered things that when men go down to Egypt, and attempt to stay themselves upon artificial helps instead of their proper reliance, they will invariably be disappointed. It will be so in this case. Hence we think with Mr. Seaver, that if they want to save their Sabbath, they had better refrain from such movements as these.

ANTI-SABBATH LECTURE.—We learn from the Philadelphia papers, that William Lloyd Garrison delivered a lecture in that city on the 10th of August last, which they characterize as an anti-Sabbath lecture. According to their account of the matter, he commenced by denying that the precepts of the Old Testament are of binding authority, the whole of that book being now dead and in its grave. He then urged that the observance of the Sabbath, as contended for by Christians, is a great monopoly, by means of which the religious teachers contrive to keep the people in subjection. In conclusion, he denounced the ministry and the church as corrupt and unworthy of confidence. These positions, and the men who maintain them, are of course condemned without qualification by all the papers which have any thing to say on the subject. But is it not strange, that none of the avowed champions of Sunday-keeping ever venture to meet in public discussion those whom they denounce as enemies of the Sabbath? Some of these men, we cannot doubt, are candid and truth loving men. Why not meet them candidly, convass their objections, convince them if possible, and if not show up the falacy and hurtful tendency of their doctrines? We fear that the principal reason is, not a deliberate conviction that it is unwise to meet the enemies of Sunday, but a consciousness of inconsistency among the friends of that day. They have often been charged, by those who deny the authority of the fourth commandment, with making void that commandment by refusing to keep the seventh day, which the commandment requires. How then can they expect effectually to oppose such as carry out their own principles to their natural results?

PERSECUTION IN PENNSYLVANIA.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:

While deprecating the incarceration of Deacon John Maxson for conscience sake, as an act of barbarism in the nineteenth century, and sympathizing deeply with the young sister in Rhode Island, so cruelly treated by her unnatural and bigoted parents for fulfilling the commandment of God her Maker, I received a letter from the Society at Snow Hill, in Franklin county, Pa., apprising me of a persecution they are suffering under to a much greater extent.

Living in a retired part of the county, and their farm lying in a secluded valley, they have, for seventy years past, faithfully kept the Sabbath of God's own appointment, and quietly pursued their labor on the other six days, unmolested, until within a few weeks past. On Sunday, the 17th of last month, a vindictive person of the neighborhood, informed on nine of the members, before a Justice of the Peace, for laboring on Sunday, four of whom were fined four dollars each; and on the 24th of the same month, the same person returned thirteen more, nine of whom were likewise fined four dollars each—among the number Elder Andrew Fahnestock, than whom a more conscientious and peaceable man is not living on earth. They have been advised by legal counsel to carry it into Court, to test the validity of the law under which the penalty is imposed; until which is brought to issue, they will have to relinquish laboring on the first day of the week.

It is proper to state, that the above proceedings were instituted out of malicious feelings, to revenge the prosecution and imprisonment of some evil-disposed persons, who have been in the habit of disturbing the sacramental meetings of the Society by riotous and disorderly conduct, and who have recently met their deserts in the County Court, and are now in confinement. The following brief account of that affair, I extract from the letter just received from the Society:

"BELOVED BROTHER:—We send enclosed a copy of the report of the trial, which originated at our sacramental meeting on the 17th of last May. It is well known to you, that our meetings have been disturbed for many years past, which we have borne with patience, and would have continued to do, had not our neighbors interfered, and urged Benjamin Fahnestock (not a member,) to institute the prosecution. He consulted his father, (the good old pastor,) who advised him not to proceed. But as 'Squire Stover of Quincy threatened to lock up our meeting-house if such disorderly gatherings were continued, Benjamin Fahnestock returned the names of those he saw misbehaving. Several other persons gave in names, and fifteen were found guilty. Eleven were sentenced to thirty days' imprisonment, ten dollars fine, and costs of prosecution—four being boys, were fined five dollars and costs, and imprisonment till costs be paid. These transactions have caused much excitement. Threats, made previous to the trial, that suits would be brought against us for laboring on Sunday, have been put into execution."

Our brethren at Snow Hill, and at Ephrata also, so far from offending or giving any cause of offence to the communities around them, have been patient to a fault—to a great fault. Their forbearance, hitherto, has been culpable in the highest degree, in not making an example of evil-doers—not restraining the improper conduct of the large concourse of mischievous persons who congregate on those occasions, and maintaining the order which is essential to worshiping God aright. Forbearance, under such circumstances, is criminal; we are in duty bound to restrain the wickedness of such persons, and see that the service of the Majesty of Heaven, be conducted "decently and in order." Their trials arise from carrying out the principles of non-resistance to a mistaken extent—they conceiving it to be the duty of Christians to suffer reproach, contumely, and revilings, for the cause's sake, rather than retort or suppress any flagrant outrage on their rights and privileges. I have thought, for a long time, that they erred on this point—they are now beginning to feel the effects of their great leniency. Religion, like chastity, must be defended from external assault to preserve it from molestation.

Young Benjamin did a praiseworthy act. For this attempt, by the neighbors, to secure these plain, inoffensive Sabbath-keepers in the right of worshiping God, under their own vine and figtree, according to the dictates of their consciences, which is guarantied both by the Constitutions of the State of Pennsylvania and of the United States, they are now suffering this persecution; but I trust the difficulty will soon be removed. The Magistrate before whom the complaint was preferred, is father to one of the young men imprisoned for riotous conduct, and may have been biased in his decision by that circumstance. I am happy to add, that the movement had not the countenance of the orderly portion of the first-day observers, as most of the respectable neighbors, being conversant with the facts, and seeing the great injustice inflicted upon their seventh-day brethren, sympathize deeply with them, and will lend them their aid, to have them fully protected by the next legislature. I design to see you very shortly, as they have requested me to have an interview with some friends of your denomination, and enter into some arrangements of co-operation to secure to your brethren in the northern part of the State the same rights and immunities.

Yours fraternally,
WM. M. FAHNESTOCK.

MISSIONARY CONVENTION.

The Anniversary Meeting of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions was held in Brooklyn last week, commencing on Tuesday and continuing until Friday. Hon. Theodore Frelinghuysen took the chair, and after the organization of the meeting the reports of the Treasurer and Prudential Committee were read. The following statements, made from the reports, will show the present condition and prospects of the Board:—

"The receipts of the Board for the year ending July 31, were $254,112 96, and the expenditures, including the debt of last year, were $237,817 07; leaving a balance in the Treasury of $18,295 89. The Board has the care of twenty-six missions, embracing ninety-two stations, at which 488 persons are laboring as physicians, schoolmasters, printers, bookbinders, and assistant missionaries. These missionaries have under their pastoral care sixty-five churches, embracing 24,566 members. Connected with the missions are thirteen printing establishments, having five type and stereotype foundries, twenty presses, thirty fonts of type, and preparations to print in more than thirty different languages, while 475,795,294 pages have been executed during the year under review. At the mission seminaries, boarding and free schools, including those at the Sandwich Islands, now mainly supported by the Hawaiian government, though commenced and carried forward by the mission, and still receiving much care from it, there are 30,197 pupils. The reports from the various Foreign Missions are very encouraging."

Nine missionaries and assistant missionaries have died since the last annual meeting. There are now twenty-four missionaries under appointment, and the number preparing for the work is somewhat larger than heretofore.

On Tuesday evening an address was delivered by Rev. Dr. Hopkins, President of Williams College, which is highly spoken of. On each of the following evenings during the session of the Convention, public meetings were held, and addresses were made of an instructive and stirring character.

The subject of slavery came up on Wednesday morning, in connection with a report made by Dr. Woods as chairman of a committee appointed to prepare resolutions on that subject. The discussion was continued through the afternoon and evening of Wednesday, all of Thursday, and into Friday, and was finally concluded by passing a series of resolutions, condemning slavery in the abstract, but asserting that there might be very good Christians among slaveholders.

The deliberations of the Convention were generally harmonious, and the meeting is spoken of as one of uncommon interest.

HISTORY OF THE BAPTISTS.—From a Circular just received, we learn that the Rev. David Benedict, of Pawtucket, R. I., is engaged in the preparation of another History of the Baptists. His plan is to give, in the first place, a history of Baptism, including a description of the works of those who have written in favor of Baptist views, a statement of their main positions, and selections from their most striking arguments. In the second place, he will give a history of Foreign Baptists, embracing all who, in the opinion of the most learned and candid men, would, if now alive, be ranked among Baptists—this article to bring us down to the period of the Reformation at the beginning of the sixteenth century. Then follows a history of the German, British, and other European Baptists, from the Reformation to the present time. Lastly comes a history of the American Baptists—an article which will occupy by far the largest space, and has been prepared with immense labor. The whole work, when completed, will form a most perfect picture of the origin, opinions, early customs, and present condition of the Baptist denomination. We are glad that the preparation of the work has been entrusted to Rev. David Benedict, and that its publication is to be directed by Rev. Lewis Colby, of the Baptist Book Store, New York; because we are sure that coming from such hands it will be full of instruction and presented in a neat and attractive form. We shall await its appearance with much interest.

CURIOUS MISTAKE.—Rev. Mr. Pauli, who has been laboring at Amsterdam for a time past as a Jewish missionary, tells how his enemies whipped one of their own friends instead of him. It seems that in the evening a Jewish gentleman from the country was passing through the Jews quarter, and was mistaken for "Dominie Pauli;" whereupon they rushed after him, beat him unmercifully, and left him half dead, notwithstanding his protestations that he was no "Dominie."

JEWISH INTELLIGRNCE.

DR. ADLER, the recently elected Chief Rabbi of the United German Congregations of England, was installed on the 9th of July, at the great Synagogue in Duke's Place, London. Extensive preparations were made for the occasion, and the whole ceremony was of the most expensive and imposing character. Since his installation, the new Chief Rabbi has preached in the various synagogues of London, where he has secured much approbation from his Jewish brethren.

SIR MOSES MONTEFIORE has sent a small party of Jews from Jerusalem to Preston, England, for the purpose of learning the art of weaving, which he is determined to introduce into the holy city. The efforts of the knight ought to secure for him the gratitude and love of his brethren. We are glad to see that they are generally appreciated.

A NEW SYNAGOGUE has been founded at the Cape of Good Hope. Ten adult males are necessary to organize, and at the formation of the synagogue these met together for the first time in that remote corner of the earth. A German physician, who had for some time been established at the Cape, but had not been previously known as a Jew, came forward and united with his brethren.

THE JEWS' HOSPITAL, London, had an anniversary dinner recently; at which the liberal sum of $10,000 was contributed to the funds of the institution.

THE DISABILITIES, civil and political, which have borne so heavily upon the Jews in various countries, have been greatly modified of late. We notice among other movements, that the British Parliament and the Rhemish Assembly have recently passed bills for their relief by large majorities.

THE GREEK PATRIARCH of Jerusalem, who has for the last hundred years lived at Constantinople, has been directed to take up his residence at Jerusalem.

ALEXANDER, Episcopal Bishop of Jerusalem, has visited Damascus; and in a letter from that place, he states that he was very kindly received by the Jewish authorities.

JOHN B. GOUGH.

Considerable excitement was created in New York on Thursday last, by the circulation of handbills stating that John B. Gough, the eloquent temperance lecturer, came to this city from New Haven on Friday the 5th inst. and put up at the Croton Hotel; that he went out in the evening with the intention of going to Brooklyn; that he was to have met his wife at Albany on the Monday following to proceed to Montreal; but that nothing had been heard from him since he left the hotel, and accident or foul play was feared. The mystery was partly explained on Friday the 12th inst., by his being found at a vile house in Walker street, where he had remained for several days, in a most deplorable state from the effects of liquor, or opium, or both. It is stated in some of the papers, that soon after leaving the hotel, Mr. Gough was met by an old shop-mate, who persuaded him to drink a glass of soda-water, which proved to have been drugged, and which almost instantly deprived him of his reason; that in this state he was decoyed into the vile house, where he was plied with liquor and kept in a state of stupor until he was discovered. Other papers doubt or deny this story, and think that he fell into bad company and drinking from the mere force of his own depraved appetite. It is hoped that when Mr. Gough completely recovers his sences, he will be able to recall the events of that week, and make a consistent statement of them. Meanwhile the enemies of temperance are rejoicing over his fall, and using it as an argument against all such measures as he has been engaged in promoting. We cannot so look upon it. It matters not whether he was seduced by an enemy, or fell by the uncontrolled strength of his own appetite, he is a proper object of sympathy and commiseration; and his fall, so far from being an argument against temperance, is an awful warning not to touch or taste that horrible poison which is such a cruel tyrant over its miserable victims.

THE NEW YORK MEDICAL INTELLIGENCER, or Eclectic Magazine, is the title of a semi-monthly journal, of which the first two numbers are before us. It is made up of selections from all the European Medical Journals of such practical matter as carries with it evidence of authenticity and merit. A work of the kind cannot fail of being acceptable to the medical profession, as it furnishes in a convenient form, and for a low price, all the valuable matter of a large number of scientific journals. Edited by D. S. MEIKLEHAM, M. D. Published by J. W. WADLEIGH, at No. 563 Broadway, N. Y. Terms $2 per annum, payable in advance.

NEW YORK ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE.—A new weekly publication with this title is to be issued from New York on the 20th inst., under the editorial care of Lawrence Labree. Each number will be embellished with a steel engraving, together with other beautiful illustrations. Its contents will be of a high order, and no pains or expense will be spared to make it richly deserving of patronage. Published by Robinson & Co., 123 Fulton street.

LETTER FROM CASSIUS M. CLAY.

Lexington, Ky. Sep. 4, 1845.

Benj. Urner, James S. Glascoe, Jacob Ernst, Oliver Lovell, George W. Phillipps, R. G. Mitchell, Jas. Calhoun:

Gentlemen—I have just received your letter of the 27th ult. enclosing the proceedings of the citizens of Cincinnati and their resolutions in public meeting.

Their words of kindness and generous appreciation and noble and dignified avowal, have moved me more than all the studied cruelties and wrongs of my enemies, though I was unnerved by disease, and threatened, for long days and nights, with a horrible death.

I thank you, that you have not allowed the calumnious manifesto of the revolutionists of the 18th of August to weaken your confidence in my loyalty to the Constitution and laws. I thank you, that you have seen nothing in the past to cause you to lose confidence in the future, that my "measures and means" will be "safe, practical and peaceable." I thank you, that you deem my "work high and holy," and for the reverent and soul-sustaining invocation of Divine protection on me and on it.

You, gentlemen, have taken me upon trust; the time for my defence will come with my re-established health, when, I venture to say, yonr sentence will not be revoked by "Kentucky and the world."

I shall allude to only one charge going the rounds of the papers—that there was a compromise between me and the Rebels of the 18th, and that I agreed to discontinue the publication of the True American provided they would spare the press. It is unnecessary for me to say to you, who have seen my letter addressed to the meeting, as well as my previous handbills addressed to the people, that this story is calumnious and morally impossible. It is enough that the Committee of Sixty have authorized the Lexington Observer and Reporter to state that no such proposition came from me or any of my friends. This attempt, therefore, to degrade me, on the part of those who failed to destroy me, is of a piece with this whole outrage of cruelty and wrong, as I shall be able to show as soon as my health will allow.

I hope I shall be able to show that I am neither a "madman" nor a "lunatic."

They who sent back from Thermoplæ the sublime message, "Go tell it at Lacedœmon that we died here in obedience to her laws"—the Roman who returned to captivity and to death that his country might be saved—Sydney, Hampden, and Russell—Emmett, who uttered the mighty instincts of a great soul, "the man dies but his memory lives"—Adams, who exclaimed "Survive or perish, I am for declaration"—Henry, who cried "Give me liberty or death," were all, in the eyes of these men, "madmen" and "lunatics."

It was necessary that some one should bear the standard of Liberty into the enemy's camp, and by so doing, whether he stood or fell, arouse this great nation from the lethargy and death, which have come over the spirit of a once free people. It has been the policy of wise statesmen in all ages, to clothe the humblest citizen with the concentrated power and inviolability of the whole empire. It was enough for one amidst the wildest barbarians to say, "I am a Roman citizen," and he was safe. No country in Europe is so careful of individual and national glory as France, the first nation of Europe, and England, but a few years ago, was ready to peril her thirty millions of lives on the rescue of a single subject. It cannot, therefore be less than madness in the American people, if they expect long to live as a nation, and not to fall easy sacrifice to foreign aggression, or internal anarchy and despotism, to look coolly on, when even the humblest of those contending for constitutional liberty and national honor are overborne and trampled down in the battle. Surely that nation cannot live long, far less be free, that sees time after time, whatever of spirit and manly independence may anywhere exhibit itself, crushed and utterly extinguished.

I thank you then and the people of Cincinnati, my fellow-citizens, men gathered under the same national Constitution, to which I owe allegiance, and which owes me protection, brothers of the same blood, inheriting the same proud recollection of the past, and looking in the future to the same inseparable destiny, that you have not cowered before the slave power; but that you stood by the friendless, the powerless, the fallen, and dared to speak out for constitutional republicanism and eternal justice, which have been violated in my person.—Above all, am I deeply affected by the fact, that you assembled in "mass meeting" without distinction of party; and as both parties here lost in overwhelming subservience to slavery, so you of the Free States begin to unite in the defence of your own rights and in the cause of national liberty.

If the Whigs and Democrats and Liberty Men shall become really what they assume, then is half my "work" accomplished, and the Republic safe—for though my State should sink into irrevocable despotism, there will be left somewhere on this wide continent, a home for the exile and the oppressed.

With regard to the Press, I would briefly remark, that my banner "God and Liberty," will never be struck.

Though overpowered by numbers, I have the same unconquerable will and defiant spirit, as though the day had not gone against me. It is for those who fight for the wrong, to despair in defeat.

I shall not "die through mortification" as my enemies would have it. I trust I shall yet live to see those who, on the 18th of August, 1845, rose in arms, overpowered the civil authorities and overthrew the constitutional liberties of the State, and established on its ruins an irresponsible despotism, hurled from their usurped places of fancied security, and Kentucky yet made free.

If, however, this be a vain hope, still I will not repine, for I should feel prouder to have fallen with her honor, than to have ingloriously triumphed with my enemies over the grave of the liberties of my country.—With gratitude and admiration, I am your friend and obedient servant,

C. M. CLAY.

General Intelligence.

THE OREGON.—This magnificent steamer, which has been justly termed, a "gorgeous dream realized," made her first trip to Providence in ten hours and a half, which was more than one hour the shortest trip ever made. She has created quite a sensation in the places which she has visited, and has drawn crowds of spectators, who are unbounded in their admiration of her beautiful model and fixtures. The following details taken from the N. Y. Tribune will give some idea of her construction and furnishing:—

She measures 1100 tons, 330 feet long, 35 feet beam, 68 feet wide over all, draws 6 feet water, loaded; was built by Smith & Dimon; engine, 1000 horse power, by Stillman, Allen & Co. at the Novelty Works. Her joiners work was done by Chs. G. Simonson; painting and decorating by Wm. Holmes. Her cylinder is 72 inches, with 11 feet stroke. Her wheels are 35 1-2 feet in circumference and 11 1-2 feet face. Her saloon is 200 feet long, and contains 50 state rooms containing two berths each, and 4 containing 4 berths. There are also state rooms in the ladies' cabin magnificently fitted up, and bearing the names of Mrs. Embury, Mrs. Sigourney, Mrs. Hale, Miss Leslie and Miss Sedgwick. The cutlery is of Rodgers' best; and, as well as the French china ware, was imported for the boat. All the table furniture is of the most valuable description. The draperies of the ladies' and gentlemen's cabin are of heavy satin delain damask. The carpet of the ladies' cabin is Imperial Axminster, and cost $5 per yard. The chairs are rosewood covered with crimson silk velvet and cost $20 each. The Sofas cost $200 each. Each length of two berths cost $225 for the hangings, &c. These items give some idea of the sumptuous luxuries of this apartment. The coup d'oeil of this boudoir is certainly as brilliant as the most lavish expenditure could make it. Indeed the splendor of all the apartments of this boat can only be realized by their being seen.

The cost of the Oregon is about $130,000, including $25,000 for the furnishing.

REVOLUTION AT TOBASCO.—By the brig Joseph Atkins, Capt. Higgins, we have received news from Tobasco to the 20th ult., the day of sailing. Ten days previous a Revolution had broken out in Tobasco, the people having declared themselves independent of Mexico. There was a force daily expected from Vera Cruz to attack the leader of the people of Tobasco—Don Miguel Bruno. All commercial intercourse between Tobasco and Vera Cruz had been suspended.

FROM SPANISH HAYTI.—By the Danish brig Clara, Captain Dunham, from Port au Platt, 2d inst., we learn that the Dominicans, or Spanish Haytiens, are still involved in war with the Haytien government. The Dominician president had ordered out all the male inhabitants to repel the invading forces, and several engagements had taken place, without any decisive result. The Dominicians forcibly seized the late New York pilot boat Virginian, trading there under American colors, and converted her into a man of war, intending to invade the Haytiens by sea. This outrage upon our flag will no doubt be promptly enquired into by our government on receipt of authentic details.

AN IMPROVED TELEGRAPH.—The New Orleans Courier announces an improvement on Morse's Telegraph, which is about to be patented by the inventor, Mr. A Carbonel. By adding to the metalic wire of the principal line one or more branches of the same metal, even though these branches form sinuosities like those of railroads, the same results will be obtained at all the different stations with equal celerity and exactness, that are now obtained on the principal line. The same results will be obtained in transmitting signals from one branch to another.

TRANSATLANTIC LITERATURE.—The following is the verbatim et literatim direction of a letter received at the New York Post Office, by the steamer from England:

Mr. Charles Prowdley
To Newyork
then to Bufflo
then to Monroe
then to hilldale
then to Jones Vile
then enquire for Mr. Charles

THE CASH PRINCIPLE.—An amusing story is told in the Portland Bulletin. A party of Millerites went on an excursion to some of the Islands in Portland Harbor. By some accident, milk for the coffee was overlooked, and the consciences of some would not allow them to milk one of the many cows grazing near the scene of the feast, but the inventive genius of one of the ladies suggested a plan to obviate the difficulty, satisfactorily at least to themselves. She tied some change fast in a bit of cloth, then fastened it secure to the cow's horn, and a companion milked away, till he thought he had obtained his money's worth.

NATURAL HISTORY OF NEW YORK.—The Secretary of State has authorized the Argus to give notice that "such of the academies, public libraries, and literary associations of this State," as are entitled, under the provision of the act "in relation to the Natural History of New York," to copies of that work, can now procure the first ten volumes, and the Geological Map, on making application at the Secretary's office. The Governor and Secretary have concluded to make a distribution of the unbroken sets of the remaining copies of the work and map, not otherwise appropriated and disposed of, among the several counties of the State; and the Secretary is now preparing to forward the books and maps to the several county treasurers, to be sold in the counties, at the price of one dollar per volume, and the map for one dollar per copy.

'THE SCHOOLMASTER ABROAD.'—The last we heard of him he was in Tennessee, and the following notice (copied by a correspondent in Haywood Co.) will show that he had not arrived there a day too soon:

State of Tennessee, ——— County: This day have we the under naimed subscribers doth engage with R—— D—— to teach a school for us the undersubscribers for the term of five Month; twenty days in each month which he binds himself to teach the English pronunciation to Wit speling Reading Wrighting And Arithimatic to the best of his skill and to give due attendance in the Moring and to dismiss in due time in the Eveing and we the undersigners do promis to pay the sum of five Dollars a scholer at the end of the term for his servis and to find cartin potion to wit 15 with opin school to 25th; and then close and give him every saturday to himself the school to commace the ferst Monday in Aprill whare we set our hands this BURNING WELL.—A correspondent of the Cleveland Plain Dealer, gives an account of a burning well, that may be seen at Southington Centre, in Trumbull county, Ohio. The well is 91 feet deep, all but 24 feet through sandstone, quicksand and hard rock, which the augur used for boring could not penetrate. When it was withdrawn, a peculiar odor, accompanied by a rushing sound, was perceived. Suspecting the presence of inflamable gas, the owner of the well lowered a lamp into it. A violent explosion, that did some injury to the bystanders, was the consequence, and the gas still continues to burn. It is doubtless carburetted hydrogen.

AMERICAN AUTHORS.—A work was some time since published, entitled American Facts, in which it is stated that the Harpers of New York are said to have paid Mr. Prescott $7,500 (£1,500) for the first edition of his "Conquest of Mexico," and to have offered double that sum (which was declined) for the entire copy-right. In two years the sale of "Barnes' Notes" yielded the author alone more than $5,000. President Day has received more than $25,000 (£5,000) for an Algebra; and Dr. Webster had about the same sum for a spelling book (!) and all these retained their copyright in future editions.

CONNECTICUT CLOCKS.—Mr. Jerome, of New Haven, says the Courier of that city, makes about every part of the clock with machinery.

He yearly consumes of the various articles used in the manufacture of clocks, the following enormous quantities:

500,000 feet pine lumber; 200,000 feet mahogany and rosewood veneers; 200 tons of iron for weights; 100,000 lbs. of brass; 300 casks of nails; 1,500 boxes of glass, 50 feet per box; 1,500 gallons of varnish; 15,000 lbs. of wire; 10,000 lbs. glue; 30,000 looking glass plates.

$1,400 are paid yearly for printing lables, and for screws, saws, coal and oil.

Workmen employed, 75; paid wages yearly, $30,000; clocks made per day, 200; yearly, 50,000.

DEATH OF JUDGE STORY.—This eminent man is no more. He died on Wednesday evening at his residence in Cambridge at a quarter before 9 o'clock. His pulse had ceased to beat and his hands were cold before 8 o'clock. His disease was stoppage of the intestines, or internal strangulation, which two years ago caused the death of Hugh S. Legare, Attorney General of the United States, then on a visit to Boston.

Joseph Story was born in 1780. He graduated at Harvard University in 1798. He was appointed Associate Justice of the United States, by President Madison, in 1811. In addition to the duties of Judge of the Supreme Court, he devoted much of his time to the Cambridge Law School as Dane Professor of Law in Harvard University. His commanding talents as a Lawyer, and the peculiar felicity with which he imparted to others the rich stores of his own mind, gave Harvard Law School a preeminence over all other similar institutions.

It is a painful coincidence that the principals of our two great Law Institutions, should have passed from the scenes of their labors to the world of spirits with but a few days intervening between their deaths. [Tribune.

LEAD ORE IN AUSTRALIA.—The immense quantities of lead found in our Western States, have been thought capable of supplying, and must ultimately supply, the chief part of the world with that article. But it appears that a mine of great richness has been found in New South Wales, containing 70 per cent of lead to the ton of ore, and 17 ounces of silver to the ton of metal. In comparison, however, to our own lead mines, this cannot be considered very productive ore; but, should the mine prove abundant, it will evidently interfere with our China trade in this article, and England will, of course, supply herself from them, should she require it.

AMERICAN LOVE OF OCCUPATION.—There is probably no people on earth with whom business constitutes pleasure, industry and amusement, in an equal degree with the inhabitants of the United States of America. Active occupation is not only the source of their happiness and the foundation of their national greatness, but they are absolutely wretched without it. Business is the soul of an American; he pursues it not merely as a means of procuring for himself and his family the necessary comforts of life, but as the foundation of all human felicity. From the earliest hour in the morning until late at night, the streets are thronged by men of all professions, each following his own vocation, as if he never dreamed of a cessation from labor or the possibility of becoming fatigued. Neither is this hurry of business confined to the large cities; it communicates in every village and hamlet, and extends to and penetrates the western forests. It is as if all America were but one gigantic workshop, over the entrance of which there is the blazing inscription, "No admittance except on business."

D. D.'s—We are glad to see that our Colleges are forbearing this year, more than ever before, in the distribution of "Semi-Lunar Fardels." The great number of manufactories of Doctors of Divinity, and the curious characters who sometimes get them, with the other objections, have brought the title into absolute disgrace. It ranks now very much with "Capting" in the militia, that is, a good deal below Mr. It is a singular accident, if such it was, that the only thing in our country which has any resemblance to a title of nobility, should have been bestowed upon the ministers of a religion whose honor is all in its humility, and whose author forbade them even to be called Rabbi. The degree of L. L. D. is to be sure in a few cases conferred on literary men and civilians, but not with the design of giving a title. Even this had better be omitted. But to set about decorating the parties with D. D.'s, because they stand in certain relations to the officers of the College, or to rich donors, or even have money of their own to give, or have rendered some little service to a party, or need to have a questionable character white-washed, or have reached a certain age, is not very reputable to any body, and causes the same thing, when conferred on real merit, to be rather a derogation than an honor.

The firemen in Philadelphia, renewed their disgraceful conflicts on Friday night. The Weccacoe Company attacked the Hope, destroying the tender of the latter, and the greatest excitement prevailed there among the firemen. The riots were again renewed on Saturday night, without serious results. The police force was strengthened Sunday morning, and every preparation made to save the place from a repetition of these disgraceful scenes.

Among the property destroyed by the late fire in New York, was a large quantity of intoxicating liquors, which cannot be much regretted. It is announced that 912 pipes of brandy, 200 pipes of gin, 100 puncheons of rum, 2000 pipes, half and quarter pipes of Maderia wine, 3000 casks of port wine, 1000 Malaga, 1500 Marseilles, 1000 claret, and 5000 baskets of Campaigne were consumed. How much more that is not told of, on account of the litle sympathy the tale would excite, is not known. The operations of sundry large wine merchants are also rudely put a stop to.

The Nashville Union publishes a letter from Powers, the Sculptor, in answer to an application of Mr. Harris, of Tennessee, giving an estimate of the probable cost of a bronze equestrian statue of Gen. Jackson, sixteen to eighteen feet from the base to the head of the rider. He thinks that the casting alone, would amount to between 12,000 $15,000, and that $30,000 in all, would not be too much for the total expense of the work.

Thos. H. Bradley, on behalf of a portion of the citizens of Tennessee, has presented to the National Institute at Washington, the Military Coat worn by Gen. Jackson at the battle of New Orleans. The donors ask that it be placed by the side of Washington's Coat.

A Constitution, it is said, has been adopted by the voters of the nation, and every preliminary step taken for submitting it to Congress, and this distinguished chief selected as their representative."

CASSIUS M. CLAY.—A private letter from this gentleman to the editor of the N. Y. Tribune says positively, that the True American will be continued, although it is not yet determined where it shall be printed. The letter also contradicts the statement that Mr. Clay offered to stop the True American if his office was left unmolested. He offered no terms to the rioters, and thinks that he is indebted for his own safety, not to the leniency of adversaries, but to the defensive array of his personal friends around his sick bed.

IRA SAYLES, Associate Principal, and Professor of Mathematics.
GURDON EVANS, Professor of Natural Sciences.
J. R. HARTSHORN, Professor of Anatomy and Physiology.

From the very liberal patronage extended to this Institution during the past seven years, the Trustees have been induced to make arrangements for greatly increasing its facilities. The Chemical, Philosophical, Astronomical, and Mathematical apparatus is amply sufficient for a full illustration of the different departments of those Sciences. The apparatus will be farther increased at the commencement of the ensuing Fall Term, by the introduction of whatever may be necessary in other Sciences than those above mentioned, especially, by a MANIKIN of the most approved structure, now being imported from Paris, expressly for this Institution. This will enable the student of Physiology and Anatomy to pursue his studies with advantages nearly equal to those afforded by an actual subject, having this farther advantage of being divested of all those revolting circumstances ever attendant on the dissecting room.

THE TEACHERS' CLASSES, as usual, will be exercised in practical teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective Instructors. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. Daily Lectures will also be given during the Fall and Winter Terms; and the public may be assured that this department of the Institution shall be conducted upon the principles of the best regulated Normal Schools, in this, or any other country.

Finally, the proprietors pledge themselves, that the reputation of this Institution shall be sustained by the introduction of whatever may be necessary to meet the demands of an intelligent public.

The Institution is liberally endowed and subject to the visitation of the Regents.

Its Library is choice and extensive, and accessible, also, to all the students gratis.

THE ACADEMIC YEAR for 1845—6 consists of three Terms, as follows:—The First, commencing Wednesday August 13, 1845, and ending Thursday, November 20. The Second, commencing Wednesday, November 26, and ending Thursday, March 6, 1846. The Third, commencing Wednesday, March 25, and ending Thursday, July 2.

The entire expenses for an Academic Year, including board, washing, lights, fuel and tuition, (except on the Piano,) need not exceed $70 00; and may even be reduced much below this, where individuls board themselves, either separately or in clubs. For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense. SAMUEL RUSSELL,

OH, SOME OTHER TIME.

Oh, some other time, but not now, not now!
And he dashed off the tears from his sorrowful brow!
I am young, I am strong, and my hopes they are high,
There is plenty of time to repent ere I die!

Oh, not yet; not yet! I have much to plan,
And religion is not for so active a man!
I will think, and reflect, and return, by-and-by—
There is plenty of time to repent ere I die!

Alas, there was time, but 'twas all in vain,
For Repentance had left, and she came not again!
As in glad days of youth, so in days of old age,
Other thoughts, fears, and hopes, his wrapt spirit engage.

His heart is cold, and his dreams are of earth,—
There is plenty without, but within there is dearth.
There was time, dear, indeed, but alas, it was vain,
For Repentance had left, and she came not again!

YORKE.

THE UNION OF THE SAINTS ON EARTH WITH THOSE IN HEAVEN.

As there is a perfect union betwixt the glorious saints in heaven, and a union, though imperfect, betwixt the saints upon earth; so there is a union, partly perfect, and partly imperfect, between the saints in heaven and the saints on earth; perfect in respect of those glorified saints above, imperfect in respect of the weak returns we are able to make to them again.

Let no man think, that because those blessed souls are out of sight far distant in another world, and we are here toiling in a vale of tears, we have therefore lost all mutual regard to each other: no, there is still and ever will be, a secret but unfailing correspondence between heaven and earth. The present happiness of those heavenly citizens cannot have abated ought of their knowledge and charity; but must needs have raised them to a higher pitch of both. They therefore who are glorious inheritors, cannot but retain a general recollection of the sad condition of us poor travellers here below; panting towards our rest, together with them; and in common, wish for the happy consummation of this our weary pilgrimage, in the fruition of their glory.—That they have any perspective, whereby they can see down into our peculiar wants, is what we find no ground to believe. It is enough that they have a universal apprehension of the state of Christ's wayfaring church upon earth; and as fellow-members of the same mystical body, they long for a perfect glorification of the whole.—Rev. vi. 10.

As for us wretched pilgrims, that are yet left here below to tug with many difficulties, we cannot forget that better half of us, now triumphant in glory. Oh, ye blessed saints above, we honor your memories so far as we ought: we recount your virtues, we magnify your victories, we bless God, for your happy exemption from the misery of this world, and for your being instated in that blessed immortality: we imitate your holy examples, we long and pray for a happy association with you. We dare not raise temples, dedicate altars, or direct prayers to you. We dare not finally offer anything to you which you are unwilling to receive; nor put any thing upon you, which you would disclaim as prejudicial to your Creator and Redeemer. It is abundant comfort, to us, that some part of us is in the fruition of that glory to which we, the other poor laboring part, desire and strive to aspire; that our head and shoulders are above water, while the other limbs are yet wading through the stream.

ON REGULARITY IN PRAYER.

Stated and regular seasons are indispensable to the regular performance of all business. Method, proverbially styled the "soul of business," cannot exist without such seasons. Irregularity, which is the preventative or ruin of all valuable efforts, grows of course, out of irregular distribution of time. That which is done at accidental occasions only, is ultimately not done at all. No business demands regularity and method more than prayer. There is in all men naturally a strong indisposition to pray. Stated seasons, therefore, returning at regular periods, are peculiarly necessary to preserve this duty in its full vigor. He who prays at such seasons will always remember the duty; will form his schemes of life, so as to provide the proper place for performing it, will be reproached by his conscience for neglecting it; will keep alive the spirit of prayer from one season to another, so as to render the practice delightful; and will be preserved uninterruptedly in the practice of the strong influence of habit. He who prays at accidental seasons only, will first neglect, then hate, and finally desist from duty.

CHRISTIAN JOY.

We are not only allowed indeed, but we are commanded to rejoice in the Lord. No joy has so good or firm a foundation as that which is to be found in the Lord, who has bought us, and with whom we are blessed with all spiritual blessings purchased for us by Jesus Christ, must be in him, intimately united to him by faith, renouncing sin, and all the false pleasures of the world. This true union and communion with Christ is the source of joy, the only source. Hence will follow a willingness to love, to obey, and glorify him as long as we live. But if instead of trusting in Christ, and his consummate atonement, we rely on our own virtue, and consequently, try to stand upon our own foundation, we shall never enjoy one moment's peace of mind. Our virtue and holiness are, and ever will be imperfect; we shall, therefore, always have reason to confess before God,—"If thou wilt mark what is amiss, Lord, who shall stand before thee?" Let us therefore seek for pardon, peace, and joy in Jesus Christ; and having found them, let us be grateful and obedient. But though we should be as holy as any of the apostles, let us beware lest we put our confidence in any thing except the sufferings and atoning death of Jesus Christ.

[Swartz.

PREPARATION FOR DEATH.

When you lie down at night compose your spirits as if you were not to awake till the heavens be no more. And when you awake in the morning, consider that new day as your last, and live accordingly. Surely that night cometh, of which you will never see the morning, or that morning of which you will never see the night; but which of your mornings or nights will be such you know not. Let the mantle of worldly enjoyments hang loose about you, that it may be easily dropt, when death comes to carry you into another world. When the corn is forsaking the ground, it is ready for the sickle; when the fruit is ripe, it falls off the tree easily. So when a Christian's heart is truly weaned from the world, he is prepared for death, and it will be the more easy for him. A heart disengaged from the world, is a heavenly one, and then we are ready for heaven, when our heart is there before us.

[Barton.

A GOOD CONSCIENCE.

A good conscience shows the evil, guilt, and desert of sin; it condemns precisely as God condemns; it condemns at the bar of justice and acquits at the bar of mercy; it echoes the whole of divine truth; it receives it as the wax receives the impression of the seal; it possesses freedom from the guilt of sin, and peace with God through faith in Jesus Christ; it is at first purged and perpetually kept pure by the overflowing of the stream of that fountain which was opened for sin and for uncleanness; it is alive to self-examination, which is its element; it is armed by the power of the Spirit of Christ to carry his truth into the inmost recesses of the soul; it evinces itself in gratitude to God for the blessings of the Gospel. "Thanks be unto God for this unspeakable gift," was a song prompted by a good conscience; and it evinces itself in love to man.

SLING.

"Give us a nip of sling," said a young man in the school of rum drinking, as he bristled up to the bar of a village groggery: "give us a nip of sling, to wash down the 'tee-total' lecture we have just been hearing!"

"Nip of sling," thought I, as I walked away musing and trying to analyze the cognomen—how appropriate!

1st. "Sling," as a verb, means to throw or cast out. And so thought I, his 'Sling' will 'throw' the remnant of his money to the winds,—if he has a family it will 'throw' them

1st. Into discouragement.
2d. Into wretchedness, and
3d. Upon the town.

It will probably 'sling' himself
1st. Into Idleness.
2d. Into debt.
3d. Into crime.
4th. Into the ditch.

II, Sling as a noun means,
1st. Something to 'throw with' and
2d. Something to 'hang in.'

If my analysis of it as a verb is correct, the first definition is true; and when the sheriff, the judge, the jury, the hangman and the gallows, came rushing into my mind, surely thought I, there is more truth than fiction in its second definition.

And there is this gratifying word 'Nip.' This means 'to bite,' 'to blast,' and 'to pinch.' The first agrees with Solomon's description of intoxicating drinks—'it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder.' It blasteth the fondest hopes of parents, wife and children; and how often has the drunkard, as he stood npon the hangman's scaffold, pointed to the 'nip of sling,' as the procuring cause of his awful and final Nip of the Sling.

Thus musing, I felt constrained to warn the young man to 'sling' his 'nip' into the fire; and go and wash down his 'Tee-total Lecture' with a hearty draught of cold water practices.

Anecdote of a Dog.

In Yonatt's Humanity to Brutes, is recorded the following anecdote of a Newfoundland dog:

"A vessel was driven on the beach of Lydd, in Kent. The surf was rolling furiously; eight poor fellows were crying for help; but not a boat could be got off to their assistance. At length a gentleman came on the beach, accompanied by his Newfoundland dog. He directed the animal to the vessel; and put a short stick into his mouth. The intelligent and courageous fellow at once understood the meaning, and sprang into the sea, and fought his way through the waves. He could not, however, get close enough to the vessel, to deliver that which he was charged; but the crew joyfully made fast a rope to another piece of wood, and threw it towards him. He saw the whole business in an instant: he dropped his own piece, and immediately seized that which had been cast to him, and then, with a degree of strength and determination almost incredible, he dragged it through the surf and delivered to his master. A line of communication was thus formed, and every man on board was rescued from a watery grave.'

POWER OF INDUSTRY.—It was a beautiful expression of a sage, that by time and industry the mulberry becomes a silk shawl; but if the following statement be correct, and I have no reason to doubt its truth, it affords a still more striking proof of what human ingenuity can accomplish—such a one indeed our oriental philosopher would never have dreamed of. In the manufacture of steel, an article may be raised in value from a half-penny to 35,000 guineas; from one cent to $200,000! A pound of crude iron costs half a penny, it is made into watch springs, every one of which is sold for half a guinea, and weighs only one tenth of a grain; after deducting for waste, there are in a pound weight 700 grains; it therefore affords steel for 70,000 watch springs, the value of which, at a half guinea each, is 35,000 guineas.

An Orphan Indeed.

The following is from a late report of a teacher of a Sabbath School in London. We have orphans and the poor in all our large cities in this country—but few, we trust, in the condition of distressing penury, described in this paragraph:

A lad was asked his name, which he gave. "Where do you live?" inquired the teacher. There was no answer, but the boy turned his face away. A little fellow in the same class remarked, "Please, sir, he don't live no where!" "Indeed, how is that?" "His father and mother are both dead, and he has had no one to take care of him for two years, he sleeps under carts or sheds, or wherever he can. A man in our street let him sleep in the place where he used to keep pigs, but he cannot always allow that." The bereaved lad made no remark, but wept. He was nearly naked, the upper part of his body being covered with a small piece of brown holland. "He always comes down our street at night," observed the boy, "and I give him a bit of my supper, or he'd have none at all." "That's true," replied another, "and though he is so poor, he keeps himself clean, for he goes down to the Thames early in the moring, and well washes himself." These details deeply affected the teacher.

The Praying Child.

A little girl six years of age, was a scholar, in the Rev. H. Stowell's Infant School, at Salford, near Manchester, England. Her father was an infidel, and despised the Holy Scriptures. The child would take him by the hand, and press him to go with her to hear the minister preach, but he always refused. He returned home one evening, and inquired where his child was? The mother said, "she is in bed." "I'll go and give her one kiss," said the father; but as he approached the chamber, he heard the voice of prayer. It was little Jane; he heard her say, "O Lord, do lead my father to hear Mr. Stowell preach." This artless prayer touched the father's feelings; but he was unwilling to go with his child; her perseverance at last succeeded. He went with her, and heard a striking and an alarming sermon from Mr. Stowell. On leaving the place of worship, the penitent, but now believing father, said "Jane, thy God shall be my God, and thy minister shall be my minister." This man has become a true disciple. He is usefully employed as an infant school master; and has been the means of guiding many children to the Shepherd and Bishop of souls.

TOLERATION.

When Abraham sat at his tent-door, according to his custom, waiting to entertain strangers, he espied an old man stooping and leaning on his staff, weary with age and travel, coming towards him, who was an hundred years of age; he received him kindly, washed his feet, provided supper, and caused him to sit down; but observing that the old man ate and prayed not, nor begged for a blessing on his meat, asked him why he did not worship the God of heaven? The old man told him that he worshipped the fire only, and acknowledged no other God; at which answer Abraham grew so zealously angry that he thrust the old man out of his tent, and exposed him to all the evils of the night and an unguarded condition. When the old man was gone, God called to Abraham, and asked him where the stranger was? He replied, I thrust him away because he did not worship thee: God answered him, I have suffered him these hundred years, although he dishonored me, and couldst thou not endure him one night, when he gave thee no trouble? Upon this, saith the story, Abraham fetched him back again, and gave him hospitable entertainment and wise instruction: "Go thou and do likewise," and thy charity will be rewarded by the God of Abraham.

"SHIPPED IN GOOD ORDER AND WELL CONDITIONED."—The following remnant of the early times, when women were willing to get married, and not ashamed to own it, is a letter accompanying a shipment of marriageable ladies, made from England to the colony in Virginia. It is dated LONDON, Aug. 21, 1621.

"We send you a ship; one widow, and eleven maids, for wives of the people of Virginia; there has been special care had in the choice of them, for there hath not one of them been received but upon good commendations.

In case they cannot be presently married, we desire that they may be put with several householders that have wives, until they can be provided with husbands. There are nearly fifty more who are shortly to come, and are sent by our Lord and Treasurer, the Earl of Southampton, and certain worthy gentlemen, who, taking into consideration that the plantation can never flourish till families be planted, and the respect of wives and children for their people on the soil, therefore have given this fair beginning; re-imbursing of whose charges, it is ordered that every man that marries them, give 120 pounds of best leaf tobacco for each one of them.

We desire that the marriage be free, according to nature, and we would not have those maids deceived and marry to servants, but only to such freemen or tenants as have means to maintain them. We pray you, therefore, to be fathers to them in this business, not enforcing them to marry against their wills."

Captain Walker's Branded Hand.

Our readers doubtless are all acquainted with the history of the branded hand. If any have never heard it, or forgotten it, we will say that Captain Walker consented to take into his boat seven slaves, with a view of landing them at New Providence, a British Island, where they would have been free had they been able to set their feet on that shore. After being out fourteen days and enduring much bad weather, during which Captain Walker was sick most of the time, they were taken up by a vessel and brought back to Florida whence they started. Here Mr. Walker was cast into a damp and filthy prison and bound with irons. He was subsequently tried and convicted of slave stealing, and sentenced to stand in the pillory one hour, be branded in the hand with a hot iron, pay a fine and be further imprisoned. The standing in the pillory and the branding were soon over with, but he was detained in prison about eleven months, when by the payment of between four and five hundred dollars he got his final discharge, and returned to the North. He landed in this city, and we had the pleasure of a call from him at our office, when we shook that branded hand. The cut representing that hand with which we present our readers above, serves as an occasion for us to say a few words on the subject, which if it does no other good, will relieve our own heart.

1. We wish our readers to understand that the branding iron was applied to Captain Walker's hand under United States authority. It is true, that it was by the action of Florida law that he was branded, but Florida being a Territory, Congress has power to nullify its laws, and no law can be rendered binding but by the sanction of Congress. Slavery itself was under the control of Congress, and Congress is under the control of the Northern states.—Who then is responsible for that brand? How many times shall it be asked with these facts before us, "What has the North to do with slavery?"

2. The act for which Captain Walker wears that brand, intended as a badge of infamy, was a virtue in the sight of God and all enlightened and just men. God has issued his command saying, "deliver the spoiled out of the hand of the oppressor." And surely, there could be no way of doing it more peaceably and with less injury to the oppressor, than that in which Captain Walker attempted it, he was therefore only obeying God. We say it is a virtue in the sight of all enlightened and just men. If a man denies that it is right to assist a slave to escape from his intended owner, he is either dishonest or ignorant of moral right. If it be morally wrong to hold men as slaves, it must be right to get them out of slavery by any means in themselves peaceably and harmless.

3. Error often defeats itself, and we think this affair presents one of those cases. The design was to put a brand of infamy upon Captain Walker, but it is a badge of honor. S. S., designed to be read "slave stealer," are only the initials of the Sin and Shame of slaveholders written by their own hand in letters of fire. Are the scars of the veteran soldier an honor? So shall that branded hand be an honor; it is the memorial of a more noble warfare. They hung our Saviour upon the cross to stamp him with infamy and thereby ruin his cause, but that cross soon become the glory of his followers and the terror of his enemies; and so shall that branded hand become the watchword of liberty, and those letter written with fire shall yet be displayed to the terror of slaveholders.

PERSONAL APPLICATION OF THE SCRIPTURES.

The great question between a soul and God, is, not whether we admit the truths of the Scriptures into our understanding, but whether they are so applied to our hearts as to have wrought a change, and become principles of faith and patience. Nothing short of this can afford evidence of a saved and safe condition.

[Rev. Leigh Richmond.

"I CAN'T DO IT."—On the northern coast of Ireland, a friend of Dr. Darwin saw above a hundred crows at once preying upon muscles; the mode of doing this was remarkable—each crow took a muscle up in the air twenty or forty yards high, and let it fall on the stones; and thus, by breaking the shell, got possession of the animal.

"I can't do it,"—is often a very silly speech. One trial more, and the thing perhaps may be done. But should this fail, it may be done in another way. The crow who could not open the shell with its beak, broke it by a fall, and so got the muscle; and the little boy or girl who is told to do any thing, should not give up till all ways are tried.

TIGHT LACING.—This abominable fashion, as we learn from the Paris correspondent of the National Intelligencer, has at length yielded to the loud and oft repeated intimations of physical science and common sense. The shackles of whalebone, steel springs, and cords, are at length broken.—The French have discarded tight lacing. All the fashionable world can now do so in safety. They take much exercise in the open air, and do not suffer their food to stagnate. They will, therefore, be mothers of well formed and healthy children. Let the bells ring and the guns fire, and the pealing organ strike the loud anthem, for the time of their deliverance from bondage has come. At length the stay tape has broken, and the women are free. Instead of being pressed into the shape of an hour glass, they may now regain the fair proportions of nature, taking for models the female form as carved by the Grecian masters, and make their dresses correspond.

HOW TO KILL BURDOCKS.—A correspondent of the Cultivator says,—"I have pursued an effectual method of exterminating burdocks. I leave them to grow until warm weather is fully set in, and the plants filled with sap. I prefer having the middle stalk set, but am careful to take them previous to budding. With a strong spade I cut the roots two or three inches under the surface, drawing the spade directly back without removing the earth, plucking the top part up with my hand, and stamping the earth firmly over the remaining part to prevent a free circulation of air; but few of them will sprout. Such as do, will be only a weak and sickly progeny, and a repeated application of the spade will prove a cheap and successful extermination.

POTATOES FOR FATTENING ANIMALS.—We have repeatedly expressed a favorable opinion of potatoes for fattening stock,—an opinion, which though opposed to the theories of some, we believe to be based on fact. The following extract from a letter of a gentleman of extensive practice as a farmer, corresponds generally with our own experience.—"Those persons who are of opinion that potatoes cannot fatten either hogs or cattle, are very much mistaken indeed. I know of no food I would prefer to fatten hogs upon than cooked potatoes, mixed either with a little meal or bruised oats, mashed and made into balls as large as a man's head, and laid on a shelf for twenty-four hours, to become a little sour. It will produce firm and transparent meat, and lard of a very superior quality, and at a cheaper rate than corn at 12 1-2 cents per bushel, fed in the ears."

[Cultivator.

RING-BONE IN HORSES.—Ring-bone commences in the lower pastern, and usually in the joint, but it rapidly spreads, and embraces not only the pastern bones, but the cartillages of the foot. There is at first a slight enlargement or bony swelling on each side of the foot and just above the coronet. It is more frequent in the hind foot than in the fore, because there is more violent exertion in these than in the fore feet; yet the lameness is not so great, because these bones are not liable to so much injury. In its early stage it is not impossible to remove the disease by active blistering, or by the hot iron. Ring-bones is the most serious lameness with which horses can be afflicted. It is unsoundness when existing in the slightest degree—for when the bony deposit begins to spread, the disease is incurable. In slight cases, rubbing the swelling night and morning with a drachm of mercurial ointment, rubbing it well in, and after applying a blister, and in two or three weeks another, will be of benefit.

[Practical Farmer.

FEEDING HORSES ON THE ROAD.—Many persons in traveling feed their horses too much and too often—continually stuffing them, not allowing them to rest and digest their food; of course they suffer from over fullness and carrying unnecessary weight. Some make it a rule to bait every ten miles, which is very inconsistent, as in some cases with fleet animals, good roads, favorable weather and load, this distance may be traveled in one-third the time that it can under favorable circumstances as to speed.—It would be better to regulate the feeding by time rather than distance.

PROSPECTUS
OF THE
LITERARY EMPORIUM.
A COMPENDIUM OF
Religious, Literary, and Philosophical Knowledge

We shall be modest in our pretensions, while we give as true a description of our intended course as we can, in plain English. In the first place, light literature will find no place in its pages, i. e. love tales, literary trash, &c. In the second place, sectarianism will not be admitted into the Emporium; that is to say, it will favor no particular denomination of Christians; but we do not mean by this that it will not advocate the religion of the Bible. It is intended that it shall do this, and in the strongest terms. It will urge the necessity not only of a change of heart, but of a virtuous and holy life, in order to be truly happy in this world, and to be prepared for that which is to come. It is intended that its religious matter shall be of such a nature as will be calculated to cultivate, to inspire and please a good and correct taste—that which will inform, expand, and elevate the mind, and also excite in the soul love to God, holiness, virtue, and humanity In regard to its literary character, it is designed to be of such a nature as to water the thirsty soul that is studiously endeavoring to acquire a knowledge of man in his past and present condition; also, some information in relation to the different sciences and arts, and the variety of the works of nature, with such miscellaneous reading as will invigorate the faculties of the mind, give scope to the imagination, while it shall address itself to the good sense of all who desire to be truly elevated by reading.

Each Number contains 32 pages of handsome paper and type; it also contains splendid plates; is published monthly, at $1 a year, if paid in advance. One third allowed to persons who procure subscribers for the work. Good agents wanted to circulate the Emporium. All letters, orders, &c., should be addressed to

THE PRESENT RELIGIOUS DECLENSION.

"Wo is me! for I am as when they have gathered the summer fruit, as the grape gleanings of the vintage; there is no cluster to eat; my soul desireth the first ripe fruit. The good man is perished out of the earth; there is none upright among men."—Micah 7: 1, 2.

How pathetically the man of God laments the decay of true religion which he witnessed in Samaria and Jerusalem! He compares himself to a man in a vineyard, when the vintage is passed, and when the poor people of the land have been through and gleaned what the grape-gatherers had left, so that there was not a full cluster of grapes left on the vines. "The good man is perished out of the land; there is none upright among men." The general depravity of manners had so overspread society, that scarcely any were to be found who exhibited the full-grown piety of holy men. A few individuals excepted, the mass of his countrymen in Samaria and Jerusalem had gone heart and life with the world.

If we cannot say quite as much as this of the church in America, we may at least say, it appears to us that the American church is in the highway to such a condition. The present almost universal declension, the withering apathy that every where prevails, is justly a subject of complaint among the few vigilant watchmen that remain. And many, many are they who admit that it is so, but who scarcely ever reflect upon the causes that have produced this state of things in themselves and others, or think seriously of what is needed to remove it.

"We want another revival," say they. "Revivals are the life of the church," they exclaim. May the Lord speedily restore them, is the response of the good man's heart. But hold! let us think of these things. We have had revival follow revival for fifteen years past; and such has been the awakening in some districts, at some times, that individuals have thought that the outpourings of the Spirit for the bringing in of the latter-day glory had come. But these have been alternated with sad seasons of declension in the church; and apostacies of individuals have afflicted the godly with sorrow of heart, and encouraged the wicked to mock the efforts of God's people. These revivals have occurred only with the most arduous and painful efforts to awaken the church from its slumbers, and alarm the world with its dangers. And every successive effort to effect these changes in society, has cost a great deal more than the preceding. Every successive departure from the revival spirit, has left the community in which it occurred more and more callous to divine things; and the church more and more sear, like the leafless trees in November; so that some places where the greatest efforts have been made, have, in the language of a certain class of professors, acquired the appellation of burnt districts. Fifteen years ago, four days were commonly deemed sufficient to expend in successive extra labors, to call up the attention of a people to the solemn realities of religion. Now, four weeks is thought too little time to effect much in that way; and not unfrequently four months is found necessary to effect the people to a degree which would lead to the conclusion, that the work intended is accomplished, so far as human instrumentalities can effect it. And yet, in these districts it is as common for the church and the world to relapse into more than their former apathy, as in any other.

Let not the church be deceived, for it is certain that there must be something wrong in a course of procedure which so commonly results in this state of things. We know that inconstancy is a concomitant of fallen human nature; but the great principles of true religion are fixed and permanent, and it is just to expect that a man's character will be staid and enduring, in whom they have been truly and correctly implanted. "The righteous shall flourish like the palm tree; he shall grow like a cedar of Lebanon. They that be planted in the house of the Lord, shall flourish in the courts of our God." Ps. 92: 12, 13. Much as we feel the need of divine aid—and we do know and feel that "unless the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it,"—we believe also, that as in the natural world, so in the moral world, there are great governing laws which cannot be disregarded or violated without injury to the objects that are sought to be accomplished. "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." "They have sown the wind and shall reap the whirlwind." "He feedeth on ashes; a deceived heart hath turned him aside, that he cannot deliver his soul, nor say, Is there not a lie in my right hand?"

It were well, then, to inquire if there has not been something in the character of past teaching, and the extra efforts that have been made to convert men from the error of their ways, which has had a tendency to produce the present results as the legitimate fruit. There surely must be a cause why men can at one time be wholly absorbed with concern for their salvation and the interests of religion, and anon, in a few weeks, or at most months, so absorbed with the concerns of the world, the fashions of society, or the pleasures of carnal indulgence, that they have no interest left for religious duties, and little or no concern for the salvation of other men's souls, or the eternal welfare of their own. We would by no means set ourselves up for discerners of spirits above our brethren; nor are we disposed to pass judgment upon the extra efforts that have been made to turn sinners to the way of righteousness, as faulty above all other means. We have been accustomed to rejoice in the apparent effects of these efforts, and to regard them as happy instrumentalities for good to men who are hastening to the judgment of Jehovah. We have, however, often thought that there is a course of religious teaching, which, whenever it predominates, can never make men any better than superficial, unstable professors of a heartless religion. It appears to us, that these ought to be regarded as matters of vital importance to the welfare of the church and the salvation of souls; for he, and he only, shall be saved, that endureth unto the end.

1st. That course of religious teaching leaves men without sound and enduring principles, which persuades men to embrace religion chiefly from the consideration of its present enjoyments and advantages. We have heard some sermons, and many hortatory harangues, in which all the passions and sympathies of men, women, and children, have been appealed to, by no other considerations than the imagined enjoyments and advantages which they experience who have given themselves up to a certain routine of religious affections. In these appeals, we have seen religious men determined not to be outdone by their brethren in their enthusiastic expressions of pious enjoyment; and sometimes men, especially youth, have become emulous of getting religion, that they too may exult in being as happy as their friends and associates. Now, while it is a glorious truth, that pure religion and undefiled makes men happy, this fact needs presenting by a scribe well instructed in the things of the kingdom of heaven; for if the mental pleasures of religious employments and associations, are mistaken and substituted for the joys of faith on God, and an understanding and cordial acquiescence in the holy and life-giving doctrines of Christianity, that soul goes away deceived; his emotions all arising and centering within himself, he has no preservative principles. When exposed to a preponderance of adverse influences, he is as sure to be carried away as a ship loosed from her moorings yields to every breeze that rises above its own gravity. That there are many professors of this class, may be seen from the innumerable lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God with which the churches abound; and we are persuaded, that to a great extent they are the dupes of that kind of teaching which has appealed chiefly to a selfish love of pleasure which is common to fallen humanity. "Wo unto the foolish prophets, that follow their own spirit and have seen nothing!"

2d. Religion inculcated and embraced upon the sole consideration of personal safety and future happiness, may leave the possessor destitute of all sense of personal obligation to God or interest in man, except what the sympathies and social relations awaken. Although the doctrine of "eternal judgment" is a foundation doctrine, it is not the superstructure; and that man has a very immature character, and is in an unsafe condition, who is moved principally by the dread of a judgment to come. At best, as water can rise no higher than its fountain or its impelling power, so this dread can exert but a negative or restraining influence upon the mind. Hence there is in all such persons a want of the higher attributes of the Christian character, which result from a fixed and habitual contemplation of the divine glories as presented by a living faith in the higher doctrines of the divine word. Men of this stamp are very apt to cast off fear, and give loose to all the natural biases of an unsanctified nature, intending to repent again ere they die. "Can the rush grow up without mire? Can the flag grow without water? So are the paths of all that forget God."

3d. Where there is an excessive reliance placed upon the strength of human purpose, the chief elements of Christian perseverance will be wanting. Doubtless there may be a crisis in the religious experience of individuals, where something like the decision of Esther, the Queen of Persia, when she resolved upon presenting herself before the King, may be requisite and proper; but to urge a company of thoughtless, inexperienced, ignorant mortals to resolve, from the mere impulse of a few serious emotions, to take the place of penitents, and even of believers in the Lord Jesus Christ, is, to say the least of it, a hazardous experiment. Such may be brought subsequently under so healthful a course of religious instruction as to implant enduring principles in the soul; but should this not follow, the preponderance of other strong emotions may carry away every religious resolution they have ever had. After fond dalliance with some Delilah, the individual may possibly think, 'I will go forth as at other times,' when it will be said, 'The Philistines be upon thee, Samson'; and then, shorn of his strength, he will be the prey of the adversary.

4th. Where advantage is taken of the ignorance and simplicity of inexperienced persons, to surprise, or beguile them into a compliance with certain religious usages, such persons enter upon a religious life without any adequate sense of its responsibilities or requirements. Having never counted the cost, they have not prepared themselves for the battle. How shall they endure the contest with a wicked world? Instead of girding on the Christian armor, they strike their flag and make terms with the adversary. They are like a man who built his house upon the sand; when the floods came and the winds blew, it fell, and great was the fall of it. Against this sort of religious profession, our Lord gave the most solemn warnings, teaching men to count the cost; and against that course of religious proselytism, the Apostle of the Gentiles made the most solemn protestations; saying, 2 Cor. 4: 2, "We have renounced the hidden things of dishonesty, not walking in craftiness, nor handling the word of God deceitfully; but by manifestation of the truth, commending ourselves to every man's conscience as in the sight of God."

In short, unless we sow good seed in the field, we cannot justly expect to see it produce the plant of righteousness; and although for a time we may seem to have success, in the end our labor will be lost. It is our fear, that as a whole the Protestant churches were never less fitted to endure any violent onset upon their principles than at the present moment. What could we hope of vast numbers of modern professors, if a storm of persecution should arise? They cannot practice self-denial in the smallest matters which Christian consistency requires. What if some popular national project should enlist all the passions of worldly men against all the stricter requirements of Christianity; how many would stand by the holy requirements of Jehovah unto death? A periodical election, a national festival, or a party celebration of a political triumph, has sufficient weight in it to induce thousands of professors to lay aside for the time all the be one with the men of this world! To all such we must say, in the language of Jer. 12: 5, "If thou hast run with the footmen and they have wearied thee, then how canst thou contend with horses? and if in the land of peace, wherein thou trustedst, they wearied thee, then how wilt thou do in the swelling of Jordon?"

The weight of wealth and power and numbers and literature, is yet in unsanctified hands; hence it is no far-fetched fancy to suppose it probable, that a fiery trial may yet come to try the churches. On what side will the multitude of Christian professors then be? If we mistake not, the present declension marks the outlines of what we might then expect to see! Men who are the mere converts of popular impulses now, it is highly probable, would be the converts of popular impulses THEN. We need a revival of religion that shall put the law of God into men's minds, and write it in the heart. To such God has promised to make good his covenant, and adopt them for his people. Heb. 8: 10. Of the good man it is said, "The law of God is in his heart, and none of HIS steps shall slide." Ps. 37: 31. Whenever, then, we pray and labor for a revival, this is the great object we should studiously seek. Without it, God may say unto the converts, "Ye have turned, but not unto me."

FAMILY PRAYER.

Family prayer, as to subject, should not include everything of which we can think, but have special reference to the members of the family—not fully confined to them. A traveler once being entertained in a religious family, knelt with the rest at evening prayer. The good man of the house commenced—noticed one thing after another as subjects of petition—the prayer continued—the traveler thought the close was at hand—other and still other subjects were brought in, the world was well-nigh explored, but still the course was onward; at length, turning to one of the servants, he whispered, "Is not your master about to close?" "Has he got to the Jews yet?" was the reply. On being answered in the negative, he rejoined, "Then he is not half done yet." This is an extreme case, but I fear that many fail in accomplishing what otherwise they might, because they tread so nearly in the above steps. A word to the wise is sufficient.

[Zion's Herald.

HOW TO GET HEARERS.—Avoid, says Dr. Clark, the error of those who continually find fault with their congregations because more do not attend. This is both imprudent and unjust—imprudent, for, as men do not like to be forced in what should be a free will offering, so they are infallibly disgusted with those who attempt it—unjust, it being contrary to both reason and equity to scold those who come because others do not attend. I have known this conduct to scatter a congregation, but I never knew it to gather one. Indeed, it savors too much of self-love and pride. It seems to say, "Why do you not come to hear me? Am I not a most excellent preacher? What a reproach it is to your understanding that you keep away when I am here!!! Bring Christ with you, and preach his truth in the love thereof, and you will never be without a congregation, if God have any work for you to do in that place.

MIDNIGHT MUSIC.

BY MRS. L. H. SIGOURNEY.

The Rev. Mr. George Herbert, in one of his walks to Salisbury, to join a musical society, saw a poor man with a poorer horse that had fallen under the load. Putting off his canonical coat, he helped him to unload, and afterward to load his horse. The poor man blessed him for it, and he blessed the poor man. And so like was he to the good Samaritan, that he gave him money to refresh both himself and his horse, at the same time admonishing him, that "if he loved himself, he should be merciful to his beast."

So, leaving the poor man, and coming unto his musical friends at Salisbury, they began to wonder that Mr. George Herbert, who used always to be so trim and clean, should come into that company so soiled and discomposed; but he told them the reason, and one of them said to him, "he had disparaged himself by so mean an employment;" his answer was, that "the thought of what he did would prove music to him at midnight, and that the omission of it would have made discord in his conscience, whenever he should pass by that place." "For if," said he, "I am bound to pray for all who are in distress, I am bound as far as it is in my power, to practice what I pray for. And though I do not wish for the occasion every day, yet, let me tell you, I would not willingly pass one day of my life without comforting a sad soul, or showing mercy; and I bless God for this opportunity. So now let us tune our instruments."

What maketh music, when the bird
Doth hush its merry lay,
And the sweet spirit of the flowers
Hath sigh'd itself away?
What maketh music, when the frost
Doth chain the mountain rill,
And every song that summer woke,
In winter's trance is still?

What maketh music, when the winds
To hoarse encounter rise,
When Ocean strikes his thunder-gong,
And the rent cloud replies?
When no adventurous planet dares
The midnight arch to deck,
And in its startling dream the babe
Doth clasp its mother's neck?

But when the fiercer storms of life
Do o'er the pilgrim sweep,
And earthquake voices claim the hopes
He treasured long and deep?
When loud the threatening passions roar,
Like lions in their den,
And vengeful tempests lash the shore—
What maketh music then?

The deed to humble virtue born,
Which nursing memory taught
To shun the boastful world's applause,
And love the lowly thought—
This builds a cell within the heart,
Amid the weeds of care,
And tuning high its heaven-strung harp,
Doth make sweet music there.

A CONVERTED ROMANIST'S NARRATIVE.

L. R—— was educated in the Roman Catholic faith, and continued a firm adherent of that church for thirty-three years. At a suitable age (in 1819) he entered the army, where he continued eight years. There he became intemperate, like many others around him. In 1828 he emigrated to America, landing in Philadelphia, and pursuing a wicked life there for more than a year. He knew that his course led to ruin, but as he had been taught to believe that he could make up for delinquencies in this life in purgatory, its refining fires were his ground of hope, and his only consolation in reference to the future. Still his conscience was unquiet. He wished to reform, but he knew not the way. He had never read the Bible. He removed to P——, with the hope of recovering his health, and lay sick there for a long time. His physician gave up his case as hopeless, and the sacrament of extreme unction was administered. During his illness he reflected on his hopeless condition, and became anxious for his soul's salvation. So wedded was he still to the superstitions of the church of Rome, that he thought the reading of a great many masses would save him from his sins, and afford relief to his troubled soul. He sent thirty francs at one time, and fourteen at another, to Germany to procure masses read, the priest in P—— asking fifty cts. for each mass, while each franc would procure one in Germany. He also prayed to the saints, and repeated again and again the forms of prayer prescribed. But all would not avail. His distress of mind increased.

As he recovered, he resolved to get a Bible, and see if he could not get comfort there. He went to the priest and told him he must have a Bible. The priest refused. He offered him ten dollars for a copy, but he still refused. Poor as he was, he offered him twenty dollars, but the priest told him he could not have one on any terms—"the Bible was not made for the common people." R. told him he must have a Bible, and if he would not let him have a copy he would get a Lutheran Bible. The priest appeared to be angry, opened the door, and drove him out of the house; telling him to go to church and hear the gospel from his lips.

R. met a woman with a Bible in her hand one morning, which he purchased after Luther's name had been torn from the title page. From this he obtained much light. He read it day and night. He sought for the company of German Protestants, thinking that all Protestants who had the Bible were good people. But he found many as ignorant and Christless as his old associates.

In 1833 he removed to Cincinnati, hoping to find some one to instruct him, but soon encountered some of his old Roman Catholic associates, who offered him the whiskey bottle. He refused to drink, and they called him a Methodist. He knew nothing before of this people, whom he afterwards sought out. He discovered from his Bible that there was no warrant for Romish superstition, and he went from house to house among the Catholics, telling them that they had all been wrong, and that they must change their manner of living or be lost. About five weeks after he came to C., after thus speaking with a family, the burden of his sins rolled away, and like the man who had been healed by Peter and John, he could leap for joy and praise God for his goodness. His only Christian instructor had been the Bible. He went on from house to house telling the people what had been done for him in the pardon of his sins. The avails of his daily labor, beyond the expenses of his family, he expended for German Testaments, which he carried to Roman Catholic families, and exhorted them to read and seek the salvation of their souls. Nor were his labors in vain.

MAGNIFYING GOD.

The ensuing passage is said to have been at times recited by Rev. Dr. Backus, of Bethlehem, Con., and always with solemn interest.

Early after his settlement as successor to the renowned Dr. Bellamy, he was returning on horseback from abroad, and overtook, just before reaching the village, a venerable negro; whom, without being recognized, he at once identified as a godly member of the Bethlehem church. Anxious, as we may suppose, to know how his own ministrations were relished after the distinguished labors of his predecessor, he accosted the humble parishioner beside him, and a dialogue, substantially the following, occurred.

Mr. B.—What place is this before us, my good friend?

Negro—Bethlem, massa.

B.—Ah, Dr. Bellamy used to preach there; who have you to succeed him?

N.—Massa Backus.

B.—And what sort of a man is he?

N.—Bery good, massa—bery good. Massa Backus he nice man.

B.—Well, but which do you like best for a minister, the new or the old one?

N.—(With a shrug) Ah, massa, massa Backus he good preacher, he bery good man; but massa Bellamy he MAKE GOD SO BIG! SO BIG!!

This sublime and just comment on the preaching of his venerable predecessor, dwelt ever on the heart of Backus. "I felt in it," said he, "what must be the grand scope of my ministry."

THE MASS AND THE BIBLE.—In Grenoble, a young girl, I believe 18 years of age, lived with her uncle and aunt. She had received a New Testament, and had been reading it some time. you not go to mass to-day?" "No." "Why?" "Because I do not understand mass—it is in Latin." "Oh, but you must go." The neice then went, but took with her the first book that came to hand, which proved to be the Testament. While in the church, the priest was reading the mass, and she was reading the Testament. She came to the Revelation of John, and said to herself that she must read that. She read eight chapters, and when mass was finished she shut her book and returned home. The aunt said, "Did you understand to-day?" "Oh yes, aunt." "What did you understand?" "I have understood that Rome is the great Babylon; that the Pope is the Man of Sin; and that every one who has the mark of the Pope in his head and in his heart, will go with him into the second death." "Oh, my dear, where did you find that?" "In the Word of God; and it is the Word of God, and the religion of that Word, shall be my religion. I will go no more to mass." She has been faithful to that declaration; she is now a true Christian, and is beloved by every one around her.

PRAYING WITHOUT GIVING.—The native Christians of Polynesia have their missionary meetings, as regularly as the friends of the heathen in England or the United States. On one of these occasions, a dark-browed man arose and said; "We have not hitherto collected much property, but let us add our prayer to that which may have been given. The Gospel cannot be conveyed to distant lands without means. This is the way; pray with the mouth and give with the hands. To pray without giving is a lying prayer." Are there not many in Christian lands who show more zeal for the heathen by their prayers than by their alms?

ATTAINMENT OF KNOWLEDGE.—Dr. Olinthus Gregory says: "With a few exceptions, (so few, indeed, that they need scarcely be taken into a practical estimate,) any person may learn any thing upon which he sets his heart. To insure success, he has simply so to discipline his mind as to check its vagrancies, to cure it of its constant proneness to be doing two or more things at a time, and to compel it to direct its combined energies simultaneously to a single object, and thus to do one thing at once. This I consider as one of the most difficult, but one of the most useful lessons that a young man can learn."

MAR YOHANNAN.—Mr. Stocking writes that Mar Yohannan has manifested increased interest in the cause of truth. They went together some miles into the mountains, to a place never before visited, where the Koordish chief asked Mr. Stocking for his sword. To which Mr. Stocking replied, that he was a man of peace and never carried a sword, which answer much gratified the chief. They found there an old church, in dimensions 91 feet by 57, divided into six rooms. Mr. S. went there to preach, and so many gathered to listen, that there was not room in the church, and they had to stand in the yard. Mar Yohannan also preached. They went farther on to another village and held similar exercises. On their return, they visited the whole of Mar Yohannan's Diocese, including every church. Mr. S. preached nineteen times in five days, to many thousands. Mar Yohannan preached from three to five times a day for six days, beginning at sunrise and closing at sunset.

FRUITS OF SCEPTICISM.

After the multiplied illustrations which have been given of the natural fruits of scepticism, one would suppose it difficult to find new victims. Yet facts of every day occurrence admonish us, that victims still abound, and that the battle between them and the truth is now waging as truly, if not as fiercely, as ever. Of course the real cause of scepticism is to be found in man's alienation from God, and his hostility to a holy and eternal government. But there are many secondary causes, which operate according to the mind to be influenced, or the obstacles to be overcome. The man of ardent temperament and proud spirit, is plied, perhaps, with notions of the independence and freedom of doubting, or the servility of confiding faith. He dwells upon what is represented as the narrowness of mind and meanness of spirit among those who bow to the authority of revelation, or the honorable and magnanimous dispositions of those who deny it. Perhaps for a time he is enchanted with the glitter of these representations, and yields himself up to unbelief. But soon he is left to compare the fruits of faith and unbelief as they are seen in the active walks of life. Then he discovers the infinite difference between the two, and sees that while a belief in the truth is generally followed by virtue and happiness, unbelief blasts the brightest prospects for this life, and gives no certainty respecting the life to come.

"By their fruits ye shall know them," is the rule of judgment laid down in the Scriptures; and it is a just rule to apply in this case. Let scepticism and Christianity be tried by it, and few can doubt the result. Bloody revolutions, and sensual or selfish private characters, would stand as the fitting memorials of the one; while national prosperity and individual purity would be the just representatives of the other.

Scepticism boasts of giving freedom from superstition and unecessary restraint. Yet the freedom which it gives is that of rejecting all the landmarks of truth, and all the wholesome restraints of legitimate investigation. Such freedom must be brief and uncertain, because in the department of mind and morals, there are bounds as fixed and inviolable as in the department of matter. To deny is not to remove them; to disobey is not to escape from them. A system which springs from a denial of all existing systems—which spreads by destroying all acknowledged truths, and not by establishing any truths of its own—may claim the merit of a species of freedom, but it can never be expected to give that freedom and rest for which the human soul most ardently aspires. Nor has it given such rest to its advocates. To-day they have abandoned and denounced the next. They have wandered about from one position to another, finding nothing in the universe but a cold and cheerless uncertainty. "Wretched indeed is the condition of that mind, which, laboring with intense anxiety to discover a peaceful rest for an unsatisfied conscience, and a final home at the close of a weary pilgrimage, finds within the horizon of its view, nothing but a structure built of clouds, variable in its from, and shodowy in its substance, gay, indeed, with a thousand brilliant colors, and romantic with all the fantastical diversities of shape, but black, desolate, and incapable of being inhabited." Yet this is precisely the condition into which thousands are led in their wild pursuit of the freedom of scepticism. From such freedom deliver us.

Scepticism boasts of the intelligence and refinement of its advocates. It would be strange indeed, if there were not some men of intelligence and refinement among the supporters of a system which appeals so directly to the natural propensities of corrupt men. Yet it would be equally strange, if a system which claims no essential truths, and only lives upon a denial of all fixed principles, should include among its advocates the more reflective and mature of the educated classes. It does not include them. For the most part its advocates are men who adopted the system early and rashly, or from a woful and unpardonable ignorance of Christianity. Many ingenious, some learned, and a few great men, may be named among them. But these can not claim superiority, even if they can claim equality, to a much larger class of those who have been the firmest defenders of Christianity. So that there is no justice whatever in this claim of high intelligence among sceptics in distinction from the defenders of Christianity. And as for their refinement, it is well known, that some of the most distinguished among them have been characterized by their coarse and rude address, their destitution of the finer social feelings, and their total rejection of the duties of conjugal and parental love.

Scepticism sometimes boasts of its influence upon communities. In a few instances it has tried its full strength upon fields most favorable to success. In France, for instance, it enjoyed the aid of fashionable refinement, the support of royalty, court example, brilliant intellect, indeed every human auxiliary. The result is well known. Although the refinement of high civilization still continues in that country, yet the most salutary restraints are removed from human passions, and many of the higher social pleasures are unknown. This is just what might have been expected from a system which boldly avows the doctrine, that the restraint of natural passions is violence to man's constitution and hostile to the highest good of society—a system which says that "self-denial, self-mortification, and humility, are not virtues, but are useless and mischievous." As a general rule—nay, as an almost invariable rule—a community of men holding such doctrines, will be found to be a community destitute of those salutary restraints which are necessary to high individual or social happiness. Hence the claim which is set up for scepticism from its influence upon communities, is contrary to reason and in direct opposition to facts.

Scepticism has nothing to hope from a trial by its fruits. Its influence upon the moral, intellectual, and social condition, either of individuals or communities, has always been bad. It has made promises without fulfilling them, and boasts without any reason for them. It has been unsuccessful and false. It has always left its victims in the hour of trial, without virtue or hope, and wholly unfit for the conflict with death and the grave.

OBEDIENCE AND CHARITY THE GROUND OF UNION.

"And John answered and said, Master, we saw one casting out devils in thy name; and we forbade him, because he followeth not with us.

"And Jesus said unto him, forbid him not; for he that is not against us, is for us." Luke 9: 49, 50.

The disciples of our Lord Jesus Christ had in this instance been guilty of an act of palpable intolerance. They had found a stranger, one with whom they had no intercourse, and of whom they had no knowledge, performing miracles in the great name of their Lord and Master; and coming at once to the conclusion, that his work must of necessity be evil, because he was not associated with them, they forbade him any more to exercise this power. That they were honest in so doing, is very evident from the frankness with which the circumstance is related by John, and the readiness with which the reason for the action is given. To their minds, contracted by the natural prejudices of mankind, the circumstance that this stranger was not one of their immediate number—was not one of those who followed the blessed Saviour whithersoever he went, witnessing his sorrows and his agonies, and participating in the evils with which his enemies visited him—was sufficient ground for enjoining him to refrain from working miracles in the potent name of Jesus of Nazareth. But to the mind of the Son of God, free from the narrow views and prejudices of men, the matter appeared in a far different light, and hence his injunction, "Forbid him not; for he that is not against us, is for us." He was possessed of the power of looking into the hearts of men, and discerning their thoughts. He could distinguish prejudice from zeal, and discouraged it wherever he found it.

The lesson which these words convey, is of the utmost value to the Christian Church; and one which we are constrained to say, is almost, if not quite, as much disregarded as any other which the Saviour ever gave. Had this lesson been regarded, and had men acted in accordance with its spirit, the pages of the world's history would not now be disfigured with narratives of wars, or rather, massacres, for opinion's sake, conducted by those bearing the name of Christians, against their brethren. Had heed been given to this, the bloody scenes of St. Bartholomew had never been enacted; the blood of the murdered servants of God would not have cried to heaven from the valleys of the Waldenses; nor the wail of the dying Covenanter have saluted the ear of the Almighty from the glens of Scotland.

Our Saviour, in these words, has given us a rule by which we should be governed in our intercourse with one another as Christians. He teaches us that there is no neutrality in this matter; that a man is either a friend or foe of his, and cannot stand indifferent. Hence, if we find a man engaged in doing the work of Christ, we may, nay we must, according to the rule here laid down, hail him as our brother. If his conduct is that of a sincere follower of the Saviour, it is not for us, by word or deed, to forbid him, but rather to encourage him in his Christian endeavors; and instead of hurling at him fierce anathemas for presuming to differ from us in matters of opinion, to bid him a hearty "God speed" in the heavenly way.

The spirit in which these disciples professedly acted on this occasion, is rife in the Christian community at the present time. Proscription for opinion's sake, has not ceased to disgrace the Church; and her members seem almost, if not quite, to forget the blessed spirit of liberality which these words of our Saviour breathe. Instead of asking whether one who claims their fellowship, is a sincere and humble disciple of Christ, they ask, "Is he orthodox? Does he believe as we do, in all particulars? If he does, he may walk with us; but, if he does not, then, although we do not doubt that he may be a Christian, yet it is better for us to be separate, for 'how can two walk together except they be agreed.'" But, the essential agreement does exist in all true Christians. They all agree upon those points which are necessary to their salvation. So long as they cling to the direct and obvious teachings of the Bible, they will not, can not disagree; for then dissent is unbelief. But when they leave the Word of God to follow the commandments of men—when they read its truths with a bias towards notions drawn from some favorite teacher, or taught by the particular Church to which they happen to be connected, "from time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary"—then, very naturally, difference of opinion arises, and hanging to the skirts of their particular teachers, they boldly engage in the crusade against what they are pleased to term "heresy." The spiritual battle rages amain; bigotry enters into the hearts of the Christian warriors; religion takes its departure; and a relentless war of extermination is waged against the opponents of "orthodoxy." So long as Christians make the Bible their guide, and give assent to no doctrine which it will not support, there is but little danger of their disagreement. Whatever is necessary to the conversion of the sinner and the instruction of the saint, is taught in the holy Scriptures in words so plain, that "he who runs" may not only "read" but understand.

Very much of the contention which now agitates the Church on various points of doctrine, would be speedily put at rest, if her members would but seek the truth for themselves, and respect the honest opinions of others, instead of suffering themselves to be guided by the ignis fatuus of tradition and Church practice. If the Church were infallible, then it would be reasonable to take her for a guide; but this doctrine of the infallibility of the Church, is one which Protestants profess to be slow to believe, however their actions in some respects may be in accordance with its spirit. And they will be equally unwilling to admit, that the doctrine and practice of the Church have always been the same as at present.

If Christians, having examined the Bible for themselves, and having come to a different conclusion concerning the same matter, would, in a spirit of charity, and with an honest desire for truth, bring their opinions together, and test them by the gospel, much of the disagreement which now exists would vanish. And, if being then unable to agree, they would exercise the liberality enjoined by our Saviour, the glory of the Church would be greatly increased; and the union in her members, which would be thus brought about, would contribute more to her strength and the conversion of the world, than millions of dollars poured into her treasury. Then would the Christian no longer be pained to hear the fierce denunciations of bigotry. Then would the melancholy spectacle no longer be exhibited of a pastor rising in his pulpit, and taking advantage of his position, pouring forth the bitter vials of his wrath upon the heads of those of his people who are independent enough to think for themselves, and unfortunate enough to differ from him; setting up his opinion as orthodox beyond all question, and requiring all to bow down and give their unqualified assent, under pain of being followed with the "mad-dog" cry of "heretic." Those who are set to watch the sheep would then cease to worry them; the Church would realize "how good and pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity;" and the unconverted world, seeing their harmony, be constrained to exclaim, "See how these Christians love one another!"

THE PREACHER.

THE GENERAL CONFERENCE.

The 41st Anniversary of the Seventh-day Baptist General Conference was held with the 1st Church in Alfred, N. Y., commencing on the 10th instant, and continuing four days. The Introductory Discourse was preached by Eld. LEMAN ANDRUS, of Lockport, and is highly spoken of by those who heard it. His text was 1st Corinthians 2: 2—"I determined not to know any thing among you, save Jesus Christ and him crucified." The Conference was organized by the appointment of SHERMAN S. GRISWOLD, Moderator; and JAMES R. IRISH and JOHN D. COLLINS, Secretaries.

The Letters from the Churches, which were read, show that the past year has been one of peculiar dearth. Seasons of refreshing have been enjoyed only in a few places, so that although the fields are white for the harvest, only a few sheaves have been gathered in. Some have been added to our churches by conversions in their midst, and some others by being brought to the observance of the Sabbath. But the number from each of these sources is small, and ought to lead to self-examination and humiliation before God. It is encouraging to know, however, that there are at the present time no important divisions, either in the churches themselves, or between different churches or Associations. There is also, it is believed, a growing interest in the benevolent and reformatory movements of the day, which may justly be a source of encouragement and rejoicing.

At an early stage of the proceedings, the case of Maxson vs. Annas was brought up by the reading of a narrative reciting the principal facts in that case. The action which was taken upon the subject, will be learned from an article in another column. It is gratifying to see with what unanimity the meeting resolved to hold up the hands of brother Maxson; and we sincerely hope that the action in the case will be as unanimous and prompt as the expressions of sympathy.

The condition and claims of the Missionary Association were brought before the Conference in connection with a letter which was read from the Corresponding Secretary of that Association. The letter stated, that a subscription for a Foreign Mission had been opened, upon which about six hundred dollars had been pledged; that two candidates had offered themselves, in whose qualifications for the work the Board had the fullest confidence; that a sum of fifteen hundred dollars ought to be raised to pay for outfit and meet the expense of the first year; and that the Board only waited to hear from the churches what they were ready to do in the matter. The Conference passed a resolution expressive of satisfaction in view of this information, and commending the object to the prayers and liberal contributions of the churches.

A resolution was passed in the same connection, expressing the opinion of the Conference, that the support of the Sabbath Recorder is an object of great importance to the interests of the denomination; and recommending that every family and church member, so far as possible, should patronize it.

The necessity of taking steps to secure a law for the better protection of Sabbath-keepers in the State of New York, was brought up, and brethren Wm. B. Maxson, Lucius Crandall, and Leman Andrus, were appointed a committee to prepare and circulate a petition to the Legislature of the State, asking that Sabbath-keepers may be excused from attending to civil duties on the seventh day, to the same extent that those who observe the first day are excused from attending to such duties on that day.

A report from the Corresponding Secretary showed that within the year he had, among other correspondence, addressed a letter to the Sabbath-keeping Church at Mill Yard, London, a reply to which he had not yet received. He had also prepared and caused to be printed, a Circular addressed to Baptist Associations, calling their attention to a copy of the 'Baptist Address' sent to each in connection with the Circular. The same Corresponding Secretary, brother Thos. B. Stillman, was chosen for the ensuing year. Likewise the Recording Secretary, brother Paul Stillman, was continued.

Among the communications to the Conference was one from the church in Shiloh, N. J., asking that the next session of the Conference might be held there. This request was granted, and the Conference finally adjourned to meet with the church in Shiloh, on the fourth day of the week before the second Sabbath in September, 1846. To that meeting the Conference requests the churches and Associations to forward an expression of their wishes in regard to the continuance of the Conference.

☞ The foregoing meagre account of the doings of the Conference, we have made out from a manuscript copy of the Minutes, in default of a full report which we hoped for. We are glad to learn, from the delegates who have returned, that the attendance during the sessions of Conference was very large, and that the deliberations were generally harmonious and pleasant.

MR. MAXSON'S CASE—ACTION OF THE CONFERENCE.

The Seventh-day Baptist General Conference, to the Sabbath-keeping Churches of the State of New York:—

DEAR BRETHREN,—A communication narrating the facts in the case of MAXSON vs. ANNAS was read before the General Conference and referred to the Business Committee, whose report was adopted as follows:—

"The Committee recommend, that the churches of our denomination in general, and those in the State of New York in particular, be requested to raise funds, and forward the same as soon as practicable to James Bailey of DeRuyter, for the relief of Dea. John Maxson from a debt incurred in testing the validity of a law enacted for the protection of Sabbath-keepers. And whereas, it has been ascertained, that about $80 00 will be necessary to carry the said suit to the Court of Errors, the Committee recommend that said amount be raised and forwarded as above."

On motion of Leman Andrus, the contribution in favor of John Maxson was referred to the Committee on Finance, with instructions to apportion among the churches of New York State $220 00, the amount already expended, and $80 00 for prospective expenditures [illegible]

The Finance Committee reported as follows:—

Churches.	No. of Members.	Relief.	Cont. of Suit.

	3635	$220 00	$80 00

The above apportionment is made, not as a debt devolving upon the churches, either by contract or our injunction, but merely as a guide by which an equality may be ascertained, supposing that the churches generally will esteem it a privilege to share in the burdens of those who are persecuted for defending our common cause. The main facts in this case are already before the public. It only remains to be said, that the Court of Errors, to whom this case is to be referred, if sufficient funds are obtained, consists of the Senate, its President the Chancellor, and so many of the Justices of the Supreme Court as were not concerned in the former decision; and that they are to decide according to the spirit and intention of the Statute. If the decision is reversed, the costs will be returned in favor of Mr. Maxson, and the contributions in that case are ordered to be refunded to the churches contributing unless otherwise directed. Monies forwarded for relief, should be distiguished from those designed to aid in future prosecution, as some may be disposed to aid in one and not in the other case. Churches out of the State will not regard themselves as excluded from any privilege in sustaining this burden, nor those within the State limited to the sums set to them respectively, as some from unknown causes may be unable to meet their full ratio, and others may fail altogether. The attestation of the present law will be a good stepping-stone to the attainment of a more specific statute.

By order and in behalf of the Conference,

JAMES R. IRISH, J. D. COLLINS, } Committee.

Alfred, Sept. 12, 1845.

SOMETHING NEW.—At the late Commencement of Harvard University, the honorary title of D. D. was conferred on Rev. Hosea Ballou. Mr. Ballou is a Universalist clergyman, and this is said to be the first instance in which the title was ever conferred upon a member of that denomination.

NEW JERSEY YEARLY MEETING.—It has been the custom of the Sabbath-keeping churches in New Jersey, for a hundred years past, to hold a meeting annually, for mutual consultation and edification. That meeting is to be held the present yea with the Church at New Market, commencing on the 17th of October at 11 o'clock A. M., and continuing three days.

FREEWILL BAPTISTS.—The Anniversary Meetings of the Freewill Baptist benevolent societies take place this year at Lowell, Mass., commencing October 14. There are among them H and Foreign Mission, Anti-Slavery, and Education Societies, and a Sunday School Union. We notice also, that during the anniversary week they are to hold a Revival Convention—a new thing under the sun, and we hope not a useless thing.

THE GRAND LIGNE MISSION, Canada, which has been principally sustained for some years past by contributions from members of Presbyterian and Congregational Churches, has lately been taken under the patronage of the Baptist Missionary Society. The reason given for the change is, that its principal members are and have all along been Baptists. There can be no doubt, that since its sympathies are now known to be with the Baptists, that denomination will give it more efficient aid than heretofore.

NEWSPAPERS AND READERS IN WISCONSIN.—It will surprise some persons who are accustomed to think of Wisconsin as a wilderness, to learn that there are now in the Territory not less than fifteen printing offices, from which are issued one daily and fifteen weekly newspapers. This fact alone shows, that the settlers of that inviting section of the west, form an intelligent and reading community. But their patronage of newspapers is not circumscribed by territorial lines. They subscribe as liberally, and pay as promptly, for eastern papers, as do any portion of our notoriously newspaper-reading countrymen.

FREE CHURCHES.—We are glad to learn that several new churches have recently been started in New York upon the free plan. Among the Episcopalians this plan seems to be regarded with special favor, and it is quite likely that their great Trinity Church will be made free. This is as it should be. Other denominations ought to follow the example.

HARVARD COLLEGE.—The question who shall be President of this institution, is attracting some attention just now from the press. Edward Everett has been named; but many will object to him on the ground of his being a Unitarian. Francis Wayland, the well-known President of Brown University, has also been named. He is a Baptist, and probably would be objected to by some on that account. Yet his notoriety abroad as well as at home, and his industrious working habits, would probably give him a larger vote from all denominations, if the choice were left with the people, than any other man.

AGRICULTURAL FAIR.—The great New York State Agricultural Fair came off last week at Utica. The weather was most auspicious, the arrangements admirable, and the attendance large. Probably fifty thousand persons were present during the fair, including many from very remote sections of the State. The display of fruits and vegetables—of neat cattle and matched horses—of agricultural implements and household conveniences—was equal to that presented at any preceding exhibition. The Annual Address before the Society was delivered by Hon. Josiah Quincy, Jr., of Boston, to an audience of ten thousand New York Farmers. His theme was the position, opportunities, and enjoyments, of the Farmer. He contrasted the evils and vexations of other departments of industry with those of the farmer, and maintained that his is the calling which gives surest promise of bodily health, mental peace, and temporal competency. The whole affair passed off in the happiest manner; and there can be no doubt, that the great majority of farmers in attendance went home better satisfied with their calling, and more fully determined to pursue and honor it.

THE PENNY MAGAZINE.—A notice of the republication of this popular work will be found in another column. It is gratifying to know, that the enterprise meets with that favor from the public which it richly deserves. There is no form in which so much valuable reading can be obtained for so little money. Number eleven is just issued, leaving only thirteen parts yet to appear. See advertisement.

COURTESY AND LIBERALITY.—At the recent meeting of the Genesee Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the City of Buffalo, the ministers and members present, constituted the pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in that city (Rev. A. T. Hopkins,) together with his lady, members for life of the American Bible Society, and of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The following day on the suggestion of Mr. Hopkins, the people of his pastoral care, by a contribution of two hundred and forty dollars, constituted Rev. Bp. E. Janes, Rev. Noah Levings, D. D., Rev. Professor Seagur, Rev. Horatio N. Leaven and lady, and Rev. John Dennis and lady, (all of the Methodist Connection) members for life of the American Home Missionary Society.

BISHOP SOULE, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, says there has been a decrease of 45,435 members in the Northern section of the church the past year, and an increase of 9,703 in the Southern section, while the total increase of the preceding year was 155,000. He ascribes it to the contentions that have agitated the church.

CHURCH OF ST. IGNATIUS LOYOLA.—This church, where is the altar of the Father of the Jesuites, has been closed since the new anti-Roman Catholic movement in Germany.

General Intelligence.

FROM CHINA.

Dreadful Fire in Canton.—The ship Rainbow, Capt. Land, arrived yesterday from Canton, with dates to the 5th of June. The Rainbow left New York on the first of February, and brings accounts of her own arrival at China. This is her first voyage. The markets at Canton were dull when the Rainbow left.

From the Friend of China, of May 31, we have the particulars of a dreadful calamity. It says:

On Sunday afternoon, a fire broke out in a theatre within the walls of the city; it has been the cause of a melancholy loss of life, as well as the destruction of much property.

The theatre formed the centre of a square, to which there was only access by one narrow lane.

After the fire was observed, the audience endeavored to escape by the lane, but unfortunately the crowd from without were trying to force their way into the square, and prevented a large number of those who were within from obtaining egress—the two bodies appear to have got jammed, the greatest confusion prevailing.

It is supposed that upwards of eight hundred lives were lost by the fire, the falling timber, or borne down by the crowd and suffocation. The bodies are so horribly mutilated that their friends cannot recognize them; in consequence of this, hundreds lay unclaimed, and the worst consequences are to be apprehended from their exposure in such a climate at this season.

It is to be hoped, that the city authorities will have them buried at once; though from the national prejudices of the people with regard to the dead, and the filial affection which prompts them to pay great respect to the ashes of their departed kindred, it is feared that days will be allowed to elapse before the unclaimed and unrecognized are disposed of.

By the Mandarins' books, the tolal number of killed is 1,257, including 52 male and female actors; the wounded are estimated at 2,100.

On Monday—the day after the fire—part of the ruined wall fell and killed 30 more, wounding several others.

It is rather remarkable, that thirty years ago a similar accident happened at the same theatre.—At that time the authorities forbade dramatic performances by the inhabitants; the present company are outside people. It is anticipated that an edict will be issued, strictly prohibiting all such exhibitions in future.

The authorities have purchased 460 coffins for the bodies that have not been claimed, and they will be interred immediately. A large portion of the dead are females; and it is feared that not a few were murdered by the robbers that infest the city on purpose to obtain bracelets and other ornaments.

Additional China News.—Besides the dreadful calamity mentioned above, occasioned by the burning of the Theatre at Canton, on the 25th of May, we have the account of an additional catastrophe, resulting in a still greater loss of life. This latter occurred in the province of Honan, from which accounts had been received of a great earthquake, which had demolished about ten thousand houses, and killed upwards of four thousand of the inhabitants. Honan is situated about the centre of China.

Another fire is reported at Hong Kong, in the sheds near the new military hospital. The new market was burned, and other extensive damage done.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

The Steamship Britannia arrived at the wharf in Boston on Friday morning about 11 o'clock, bringing Liverpool and London dates to the day of sailing, Sept. 4.

She has a large list of passengers, numbering 101, among whom are Hon. Edward Everett, wife and daughter, and Hon. L. J. Papineau.

The weather in England, which had for some time been stormy, and which it was feared would greatly injure the growing crops and retard the harvest, has suddenly changed for the better, and there is a fair prospect of abundance. Every interest is feeling the advantage of restored confidence.

Three of the Bank Notes taken from the Banking house of Rogers & Co. London, have been passed to an in-keeper at Naples. He is now in London, and the police are engaged in tracing the robbers. The parties who passed the notes were of high rank, and are not suspected of any connection with the robbers, but through them it is hoped the actual burglars may be detected.

A piratical slave ship, a fine vessel of great celebrity, was captured on the west coast of Africa, by one of her Majesty's ships, after a severe engagement in which ten or fifteen men were killed.

The overland mail from India brought news that the cholera continued to rage, particularly in Scinde. The mortality in some places had been very great, causing the bazaars to be deserted.

By advices from Constantinople of the 7th, we learn that the disposition to revolt against Turkish governors manifested so frequently of late, had shown itself in various quarters. The drouth has been so great that water, usually very abundant, sold as high as 2d. per gallon. The surrounding districts suffered severely.

There is a complete famine in Poland, so that no supplies of Wheat can be expected from that quarter.

From Austria we have intelligence that immense inundations have happened in Hungary, and have done immense damage, as well as caused an extensive sacrifice of human life.

The ancient town of Tervonia in Hungary, has been reduced to a heap of ruins by fire.

France.—A fire broke out at Bordeaux, on 22d ult., in the Rue Boire-aux-Chatrous, at a Mons. Tastet's. A store, full of brandy, was consumed, and the fire spread to neighboring houses. The following morning, by the falling in of the roof of one of the burned houses, a commander, an adjutant major, a lieutenant and three firemen were killed, and a fireman and two soldiers wounded. The loss of property is estimated at 3,000,000 francs.

There has been a terrific whirlwind on the continent. Its effects in Holland were almost as severely felt as in France. At Rouen, however, it seems to have expended its greatest violence. In that city three extensive manufactories were destroyed by the whirlwind, while all the hands were at work; not less than 60 persons of all ages perished in the ruins, and 120 were thereby wounded.

A great cloud of winged insects, called ephemeræ, recently spread over the city of Nantes, darkening the atmosphere as though by an eclipse. The gardens and grounds were covered.

Spain.—Madrid has been the scene of another disturbance, the people having resolved not to pay the new house taxes. All the shops were shut up, and business entirely suspended. Troops poured into the city, and on the 19th charges of cavalry and a discharge of musketry were found necessary to disperse the crowd, when several persons were killed and wounded.

Germany.—From Germany we learn that the religious disturbances at Leipsic have not been renewed, and that the popular irritation has been allayed by the King's prompt compliance with the request of the citizens in regard to a commission of inquiry.

The War of the Caucasus.—We learn from Constantinople, that intelligence had been received from the Caucasus, announcing that the Russians had undertaken a new campaign in the interior of Daghestan. After a vigorous resistance at the entrance of a defile, the mountaineers withdrew to the interior, and the Russians seized on the defile. Considerable loss was sustained on both sides.

A letter from St. Petersburgh of the 14th (says the Journal du Havre) has been received at this port, making a bulletin from the army of the Caucasus, which announced the capture of Dargo, the residence of Schamyl. As this place was defended by 26 barricades formed of felled trees, each of which had to be carried by the bayonet, this success has cost the Russians dear. It is said that they had two generals killed and a great many superior officers wounded.

War in Madagascar.—In the beginning of May last, Ranavalo Manjaka, the Queen of Madagascar, issued orders that all the English and French residing in her dominions should, within eleven days, become her subjects, by having themselves registered and n turalized as Malagaches, or that they should immediately quit the island.

Three hundred and fifty men, of whom 100 were French soldiers, and the others belonging to the three ships, landed on the afternoon of the 15th inst. and advanced across a plain, under a sharp fire from the fort and battery of grape and musketry. The enemy was driven out of the battery and the guns spiked.

Another circular fort mounting 30 guns was then discovered, which was also stormed and taken. The guard-house, custom-house, and a considerable part of the town was burnt. The loss of the natives was very great—that of the English and French some 20 men killed and 60 wounded.

Mr. Van Rensselaer to his Tenants.—Gen. Stephen Van Rensselaer has submitted through the Albany papers a proposition to his Tenants, with a yiew to a desirable change of the tenures by which he holds their farms. As the matter is one in which all the people of the State are deeply interested, we copy his propositions as follows:

To the Tenants of the Manor of Rensselaerwyck in the County of Albany:

If by the 1st of March next, any person who holds, under lease, any lands in the county of Albany, to the rents of which I am entitled, shall pay the arrears of rent, and $30 for the quarter sale, I will release all the covenants and reservations in the lease, for a sum which at six per cent will yield an annual interest equal to the annual rent estimated as follows, to wit: a bushel of wheat, at one dollar; one day's service with carriage and horses, two dollars; and each fowl twelve and a half cents. This offer, as to the quarter sale, is only to apply to such lands for which the wheat rent reserved is fourteen bushels of wheat for one hundred acres of land.

And if any person, willing to accept the above terms, cannot immediately pay all the sums at once, I will accept one-fifth of the whole amount, and take a bond and mortgage on unencumbered real estate for the residue, payable in four equal annual installments, with interest annually, at the rate of six per cent per annum. Or, as the average price of wheat for the last twenty years is about $1 25 per bushel, I will accept of a principal which, at six per cent per annum, will produce that amount, and release all the covenants and reservations in the lease. S. Van Rensselaer.

Watervliet, Sept. 16, 1845.

Death of Judge Baylor in Texas.—Hon. R. E. B. Baylor, writing from Austin, July 30th, to a gentleman in Alabama, thus makes melancholy mention of his brother's death:

"By the time this reaches you, you will have heard the melancholy fate of my brother, Walker K. Baylor. His death was sudden and unexpected. A Mr. Rivers, late of the State of Tennessee, having a revolving pistol in his hand, the hammer slipped through his fingers, causing the pistol to fire, shooting my brother immediately through the heart. He died instantly. A nephew standing by exclaimed, 'You have killed my uncle?' Poor Walker replied, 'Oh no!' and he never spoke again. Mr. Rivers, I learn, suffered greatly from agony of mind, and expressed his deepest sorrow on account of his being the cause of this fatal occurrence."

The Peach Trade.—To give some idea of the amount of the peach trade, we mention the following fact. Maj. Raybold & Sons, of Delaware City, (Del.) sold the enormous amount of 73,234 baskets up to the 29th of August. They have now chartered the steamboat "Mutual Safety," of New York, burden 700 tons, to convey their peaches by sea direct to New York, thus avoiding the labor and loss of transhipment and reloading, when sent by railroad or canal. This steamboat left the wharf at Delaware city on the evening of the 1st of September, with 3,582 baskets of peaches on board.

The most superb Peach Orchard probably in this country, if not in the world, is that belonging to Messrs. Isaac Rare and Jacob Ridgeway, of Philadelphia. It is located about forty-five miles below that city, on the river, at Delaware city, and comprises upwards of two hundred acres. In the year 1839, were gathered from this orchard, eighteen thousand bushels of mature fruit, and yet only about one hundred and seventy acres were in bearing, and twenty-five acres of these had not yet reached maturity. [Farmer and Mechanic.

The True Sun has a story that a British fleet of two 104 gun-ships, four frigates, and three steamships, having on board a full regiment, sailed from Spithead lately with sealed orders for Oregon, where the troops were to land if deemed advisable, and a Governor for the Territory, who also went out in the ships, was to assume the charge of Oregon, if "circumstances warranted him in so doing to carry out the instruments under which he has been sent."

Five Minutes at the 'Ladies' Window.'—One of the most harmlessly-vexatious scenes we witness in our ramblings is the 'Ladies' Window' at the New York Post Office on Steamer-day. Mr. Hallett is certainly the most expert of clerks and gallant of men; and the smile with which he greets his fair customers has indurated into his face so firmly, that if he were to be suddenly subjected to the newly discovered marbling process, he would be known to the latest posterity as The Smiling Statue. Notwithstanding all his agility, however, he is not seldom at fault in 'keeping the run' of his impatient customers. Sometimes, too, when a lady is particularly disappointed in not receiving a letter, she gives him a gentle scolding or a look which seems to say, 'Be sure you have my letter ready when I come next time!' Occasionally he finds himself appealed to on the principle of shopping, so dear to women, to make a small deduction in the price of his wares, with a gentle hint that he may thus secure a regular customer to the shop! Some young ladies who bring little odd-looking letters which they wish to pay the postage on, blush and titter quite archly when Mr. Hallett asks them very politely, 'Double or single?' and reply with a courtesy and the prettiest simper imaginable, 'Single, at your service, sir!' Many ladies go up softly to the little window and whisper their names as reluctantly as if they would like to have them changed; while others (young and happy wives, as you can see by the starry smile in their eyes) walk with a keen and gliding step and pronounce the so-loved name with an accent of tenderness that makes musical even the common humanity-labels 'Smith,' 'Brown,' or 'Tompkins.' Here comes a pale, pensive lady, whose motions betoken restlessness and anxiety wrought by disappointment into a fever. One involuntarily shares her hopes and fears as she advances trembling with that sad face so well known there, and the old question, 'Has it come to-day, sir?' With a movement of commiserating alacrity, the package is taken down and carefully scanned, while you hold your breath for sympathy, and the preternaturally calm face of the expectant grows pale and paler as the heap of letters melts away. Alas! there seems to be a letter for every body but her! Cruel, cruel! he does not write—he heeds her not. Perhaps she pines in want; her children—his children—cry with hunger, and he does not write to cheer or help. Yes, yes—she gasps, she totters, and is about to fall: But no—on a sudden she springs forward with a motion of fierce joy. He has found it—it has come! She clutches it convulsively, and——But our Five Minutes are exhausted. [Tribune.

Strict Construction.—Some genius has been construing the new Post Office Law in a way that would rejoice the heart of a Virginian abstractionist The law says that single letters may be conveyed "for any distance under three hundred miles, five cents; and for any distance over three hundred miles, ten cents." Those letters that are sent a distance neither over nor under, but just three hundred miles, of course go free! So that every body who lives just 300 miles from any other body has the franking privilege!!

A Duel Stopped.—Miss Mary Ann Golden was arrested in New Orleans on the affidavit of Miss Mary Rogers, charged with sending the latter a challenge. It appears that the parties had a dispute, which, in the opinion of Miss Golden, could only be settled by an appeal to arms; accordingly, she sent Miss R. a challenge, of which the following is a true copy:

Franklin-st. Wednesday Morning.

Madam—I hereby notify you to meet me at 1 o'clock this evening, at the other side of the French grave-yard, then and there to settle our dispute, agreeably to the "Code of honor." My friend, Miss Sarah ——, who will hand you this, will meet any friend you may select to settle all preliminaries. MARY ANN GOLDEN.

To Miss Mary Rogers.

SUMMARY.

We hear through the various Agricultural Journals from the East, a general complaint in regard to the prevalence of the Potato rot, which has prevailed for two or three years in the middle States, and a part of New England. It has again appeared in many parts of the New England States, and threatens to prove quite destructive.

Abbey Kelley, the well known Anti-Slavery lecturer, was carried by force out of the Orthodox Quaker Meeting at Mount Pleasant, Jefferson county, Ohio, on the 7th inst. She endeavored to address the meeting on the subject of Slavery, and, being requested to desist, declined doing so on the ground that she felt it to be her duty to speak. She was then removed by force. The affair created much excitement.

In Williams' College the students are required to sign the temperance pledge. At the recent semi-centennial celebration of Union College cold water and lemonade only were used. At the late commencement of Cambridge College, champaigne and other wines are said to have been frequently circulated. Are students in this last institution as safe as those in the others?

No fewer than seventy thousand children, under sixteen years of age, are employed in the French manufactories. Children under eight years of age are not allowed to work in the French factories; those from eight to twelve work eight hours; and those from twelve to sixteen, not more than twelve hours in twenty-four. Under the new law, the factory children have regularly attended the public school; and in some districts, where none existed, the manufacturers themselves have caused them to be instructed at their own expense.

At the Jarrow Colliere, in Durham, England, on the 21st ult., an explosion of fire damp occurred in the lower seam of the pit, killing forty-nine workmen. A man was also killed in attempting to descend into the pit to recover the dead bodies.

The Manufacturers at Waterbury, Conn., are engaged in making money for the Haytien Government. Of one small coin valued at about a third of a cent, they have an order for four tons.

The Americans have six hundred whale ships in the Pacific ocean, being twice as many as those of the whole world besides.

As Mr. Webster, a son of Hon. Daniel Webster, was riding with his lady on the Worcester turnpike, in Brookline, Mass., Monday evening, he came in contact with a loaded team, which threw Mr. W. out, bruising him considerably. The horse, taking fright, ran about half a mile, when Mrs. Webster was also thrown out and severely bruised.

The Evening Post, speaking on political patronage, says that the General Government controls the appointment of 14,000 Postmasters, 14,000 Deputies, 1,000 Mail Contractors and Agents, 2,000 Revenue and Lighthouse officers—making in all 33,000 public dependents. Every State controls 2,000 appointments, and all of them 54,000. The General and State Governments, together, control 87,000 men. This is exclusive of Army and Navy and the troop of persons employed by the Executive officers of the National and State Governments.

By some unknown means, slaves continue to leave their masters in St. Louis. The practice is so common, that it is becoming alarming. We hear of three young fellows who have escaped within two or three days past; one from J. H. Chambers; one from the heirs of Milton Duty's estate; and a third from George L. Lachland.

The subscriptions to the Erie Railroad reach now two millions of dollars, and with the feeling now existing in relation to the paramount importance of this Road, there can be no doubt that the remaining million will be speedily taken.

The Cooperstown Republican states, that a suit for slander against Fennimore Cooper has been commenced by Rev. Mr. Tiffany, of that place.

Dr. Hudson, who was committed to jail in Springfield, on the complaint of Mr. Hodgson's servant, for false arrest, has been released on bail, Mr. Williston being one of his bondsmen. The suit is brought in the Court of Common Pleas, in Boston, which is to be holden on the first of October.

Eight persons have recently died in Sing Sing prison of typus fever.

Jack Frost has made the people of Jefferson Co. several visits, somewhat to their annoyance, but not to the very serious injury of their crops.

The Millerite Tabernacle, in Boston, is now refitting to be devoted to theatrical purposes.

Dublin has now attained the third rank of importance as a commercial depot, being only exceeded by London and Liverpool.

The remains of Daniel Boone, the pioneer in the settlement of Kentucky, and those of his wife, having been removed from Missouri, were reinterred in the Cemetery at Frankfort, Ky. on the 13th instant. The ceremonies were very imposing, and took place in the presence of 15 or 20,000 people, embracing many from all the Western and Southern States.

Nimrod Hughes, a 'prophet' who made a great sensation by predicting that the Judgment would come in 1811, died lately near Abingdon, Va. He was of obscure origin, grew to manhood in obscurity, and, like a passing meteor, he made one grand display, then relapsed back again to his native obscurity, and lived and died unhonored and unknown.

Life Insurance, Fire Insurance, and Marine Insurance, are familiar terms to all of us; but it is doubtful if any of our readers have ever heard of such a thing as a Society for insuring the integrity of Clerks. Yet such a Society has actually been established in London, is now in operation, and is likely to become not only a useful but a money-making institution. Its rates are founded on calculations similar to those who regulate the premiums of other risk-assuming companies.

A correspondent of the Philadelphia North American says there is in the Vinery of Dr. A. Mitchel, near that city, a bunch of Grapes three feet wide across the shoulders and twenty-eight inches long, (perpendicular)—no mistake in figures. It is the genuine grape of Palestine, and called La Palestine.

The St. Louis New Era states that a family of Germans by the name of Hauptman, consisting of five persons, an old lady, her two sons and two daughters-in-law, left Philadelphia on the 22d ult. for St. Louis, by the way of Ohio. On the way, her two sons and one daughter-in-law, were, one after another, drowned, leaving only the disconsolate mother and a daughter-in-law to relate their trials in St. Louis.

The Signal of Liberty, Michigan, states that Mr. Birney has been suffering for some time from a severe and protracted illness.

MARRIED,

At the residence of Dr. Welcome A. Babcock, in Oriskany, N. Y., on the 13th inst., by Rev. Sebeus M. Burdick, Mr. Danford Crombie of Trenton, to Miss Polly Mattison of Oriskauy.

Also, in Truxton, by the same, in May last, Mr. Erastus Nichols of Lincklaen, to Miss Clarinda Philips of Truxton.

In the Baptist Church in Penn Yan, N. Y., on the 11th inst., Mr. J. B. Green, formerly of Rensselaer Co., to Miss E. A. Clark of Penn Yan.

In DeRuyter, N. Y., on the 18th inst., by Eld Joshua Clarke, Mr. William B. Muncy to Miss Sally A. Coon, both of DeRuyter.

DIED,

In Amity, N. Y., July 27th, Mrs. Sarah Stillman, consort of Davis Stillman, aged 75 years. In early life she united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Farmington, Conn., of which she remained a worthy member until her removal to Allegany Co., where she has ever adorned her profession by piety and holiness. At the time of her departure, she gave full assurance that the smiles of her Saviour would accompany her through the dark valley and shadow of death.

In Alfred, N. Y., Sept. 2d, of dyspepsia, Mr Elihu Babcock, in the 53d year of his age. He died in full faith that there was a seat prepared for him at the right hand of God. He has left a companion in feeble health, and a large number of children, to mourn his loss.

In the same town, on the same day, after a short illness, Mr. Uriah Goodrich, in the 79th year of his age.

In Lima, Rock Co., Wis. Ter., on the 10th of August, Mr. Silas Palmiter, in the 50th year of his age. Having suffered much from sickness of various kinds during the last years of his life, he was permitted to meet death with calm composure and with entire resignation. He was a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Berlin, Rens. Co., N. Y. His work is done; Jesus has kindly beckoned him away; and triumphantly has he passed to he reward of the faithful. He leaves a wife and five children, together with an aged father and numerous relatives, to mourn his loss. His last sickness was spinal affection, which terminated in consumption. P. G.

In Hopkinton, R. I., August 23d, 1845, Welcome Lewis, son of Dea. Christopher C. Lewis, aged 23 years. The principal employment of this young man for a number of years, had been upon the water, until, two weeks before his death, he reached home sick of a fever. His friends had the satisfaction of being with him, and of discharging the duties of the tenderest friendship, until he closed his eyes in death in the bosom of his father's family. In reflecting on the sudden fall of this promising youth, his parents feel that they can, with propriety, adopt the language of another, and say, "How sad a sight is human happiness, to those whose thoughts can pierce beyond an hour."

In Shiloh, N. J., on Sabbath, the 20th inst., after a short illness, Lewis F. Randolph, in the 64th year of his age, and Jacob F. Randolph, in the 71st year of his age. They both became members of the Shiloh Church during the great revival about two years ago.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' SEMINARY.

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, Principal, and Professor of Languages.
Ira Sayles, Associate Principal, and Professor of Mathematics.
Gurdon Evans, Professor of Natural Sciences.
J. R. Hartshorn, Professor of Anatomy and Physiology.
O. Stillman, Professor of Vocal and Instrumental Music.
Miss C. B. Maxson, Preceptress, Instructress in French, Italian, Drawing and Painting.
Mrs. M. B. Kenyon, Assistant in the Female Department.

From the very liberal patronage extended to this Institution during the past seven years, the Trustees have been induced to make arrangements for greatly increasing its facilities. The Chemical, Philosophical, Astronomical, and Mathematical apparatus is amply sufficient for a full illustration of the different departments of those Sciences The apparatus will be farther increased at the commencement of the ensuing Fall Term, by the introduction of whatever may be necessary in other Sciences than those above mentioned, especially, by a MANIKIN of the most approved structure, now being imported from Paris, expressly for this Institution. This will enable the student of Physiology and Anatomy to pursue his studies with advantages nearly equal to those afforded by an actual subject, having this farther advantage of being divested of all those revolting circumstances ever attendant on the dissecting room.

The Teachers' Classes, as usual, will be exercised in practical teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective Instructors. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. Daily Lectures will also be given during the Fall and Winter Terms; and the public may be assured that this department of the Institution shall be conducted upon the principles of the best regulated Normal Schools, in this, or any other country.

Finally, the proprietors pledge themselves, that the reputation of this Institution shall be sustained by the introduction of whatever may be necessary to meet the demands of an intelligent public.

The Institution is liberally endowed and subject to the visitation of the Regents.

Its Library is choice and extensive, and accessible, also, to all the students gratis.

The Academic Year for 1845—6 consists of three Terms, as follows:—The First, commencing Wednesday August 13, 1845, and ending Thursday, November 20. The Second, commencing Wednesday, November 26, and ending Thursday, March 6, 1846. The Third, commencing Wednesday, March 25, and ending Thursday, July 2.

Expenses.—Tuition, per term, from $3 50 to $5 00. Board, per week, $1 00. Piano, (extra,) per term, $10 00. Washing, lights and fuel, per term, from $2 00 to $5 00. The entire expenses for an Academic Year, including board, washing, lights, fuel and tuition, (except on the Piano,) need not exceed $70 00; and may even be reduced much below this, where individuls board themselves, either separately or in clubs. For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense. SAMUEL RUSSELL,

AUTUMN.

Sweet sabbath of the year,
When evening lights decay,
Thy parting steps, methinks I hear,
Steal from the world away.

Along thy sunset skies
Their glories melt in shade;
And like the things we fondly prize,
Seem lovelier as they fade.

A deep and crimson streak
The dying leaves disclose;
As on Consumption's waning cheek,
'Mid ruin, blooms the rose.

They sear each vision brings
Of beauty in decay;
Of fair and early faded things,
Too exquisite to stay;

Of joys that come no more;
Of flowers whose bloom is fled;
Of farewells wept upon the shore;
Of friends estranged, or dead;

Of all that now may seem,
To memory's tearful eyes,
The vanish'd beauty of a dream,
O'er which I gaze and sigh.

THE "IRREGULARITIES" OF MEN OF GENIUS.

The "irregularities of men of genius" ever find ready apologists among the votaries of the world. These talk of nature's gifts being variously distributed, and of the absence of one excellence being atoned for by the possession of another; thus placing the reins of the universe in the hands of a creature of their own imagination, and impiously conceiving that the right exercise of one endowment can make amends to its Divine Author for the abuse of the remainder of his gifts. The Christian moralist reasons in a very different manner; and with him the question is reduced to very narrow limits. Is the man of genius, he asks, a man of God, or is he not? If he is, then he will neither be intemperate nor profane; he will be neither lascivious in his writing nor profligate in his conduct; he will be a tender husband and a kind father; he will pay every man what he owes him, and conscientiously provide for the want of his household. But if, on the other hand, he is not a man of God, it is very possible that he may do nothing of all this: it is very possible that he may be dissipated and immoral, improvident, and destitute of natural affection; and that not because he is a man of genius, but because he is an unconverted man; not because he has felt the inspiration of poetry, or of painting, but because his heart has not been renewed by the Holy Spirit. The man of genius, while in an unconverted state, is, like every other man in a similar condition, the slave of passion and of natural appetite; and if there be any thing in his pursuits which leads him much into company, or procures for him any degree of temporal distinction, his failings become so much the more the subjects of remark, and are more readily ascribed by worldly men to the nature of his avocations, than to that depravity of heart which he shares in common with themselves. But let the same individual become the subject of converting grace, let him embrace with his whole soul the truth that is in Jesus, and the entire current of his feelings and his propensities is changed: he is still the man of genius, the accomplished poet, the skilful artist, or the acute philosopher; but he is also "an Israelite indeed, in whom there is no guile."

TOUGH QUESTIONS FOR MR. BROWNSON.

Our readers, probably, know that Mr. Brownson, after having run through nearly all the whole catalogue of human beliefs, commencing a Calvinist, thence proceeding through Arminianism, Universalism, Infidelity, thence back again to Unitarianism, and a modified Trinitarianism, has at last found rest for his weary soul in the grim repose of Popery. Since his conversion he has shown himself ambitious to approve himself to his new friends, and to wipe out the stain of his long-cherished heresies, by an extraordinary zeal and boldness in behalf of his new doctrines. He publishes a Quarterly Review in Boston, which often contains rich developments of the spirit of Popery. In a late letter he said, that "the Catholic Church was the only entrance into the kingdom of heaven; and that the Pope, as visible head of the Church, was infallible with regard to all things whatever Christ commanded his apostles."

On this bold and arrogant assumption, a writer in the Recorder proposes to Mr. Brownson the following questions. They were sent to him, and a partial pledge was made that they should be answered. But we have waited a long time for the promised reply in vain; and if we do not have to wait much longer, it will be because Mr. B. has not yet learned the true Romish tactics. We should like to see them fairly met.

"1. Whether you suppose the Pope to be the sole and infallible interpreter of his own commission, and of what things are included in it, or whether,

2. The people, with the Bible in their hands, may judge, each one for himself, whether the Pope interprets his commission correctly,

3. Whether, if he interprets it, in their view incorrectly, they are bound to reject it. And,

4. Whether you suppose that Christ commanded his apostles to teach all, which the Pope and the Catholic Church, as directed by them, now teach; and,

5. If the Catholic Church is the only true Church, why it is that the people of the Papal States in Italy, who have so long been under the full influence of that Church, are in a condition so much more ignorant, degraded, vicious, and wretched, than the people of New-England. And,

6. Why is it that the French Canadians, who have been from the beginning under the influence of Catholic priests, are so far behind the people of Massachusetts, as to general intelligence and improvements.—

7. Whether, in your view, the Catholic religion tends more than does the Protestant, to the elevation and the virtue of the masses of the people. And if so, then,

8. What, in your view, is the evidence of that fact. For the people of this country must have evidence, and be able to give reasons for changing their religion, if they deliberately conclude to do it. They now feel when they look abroad upon the Papal States, and Canada, that they see conclusive evidence in the condition of the people, that the religion under which they have been trained is a false religion.

9. If the Papacy is favorable to republicanism, why have the Papal States in Italy never become republican?"

This Mr. Brownson lately gave utterance to the following remark, which is also instructive as to the real motives, and designs of Papists in regard to education:

"The well instructed Catholic knows that education, not based on religious principle, and coupled with thorough religious training, is a curse instead of a blessing; and no religious training, to satisfy a Catholic, is possible in a school not exclusively under Catholic control. We would much rather our children should grow up in ignorance of letters, than be taught in a school that is not Catholic."

The Eyes of Insects.—How wonderfully constructed is this beautiful organ of insect vision! How admirably adapted to the necessities of life! The gaudy dragon fly, presenting as he does such a conspicuous and tempting show of colors to the active swallow, eludes the feathered enemy by superior agility of flight. Mere agility, however, would avail nothing without the aid of powerful eyes. Accordingly nature has given him somewhat more than twelve thousand bright piercing ones, some looking upwards, some downwards, more backwards, and some on either side. In the ants, there are fifty of these facets or eyes; in the horse-fly four thousand; in butterflies, upwards of seventeen thousand three hundred and fifty-five have been counted, nay in some coleopterous or scaly-winged insects, there have been numbered no less than twenty-eight thousand and eighty-eight.

Filial Affection.

Gustavus III., king of Sweden, passing one morning on horseback through a village in the neighborhood of his capital, observed a peasant girl of interesting appearance drawing water at a fountain by the way-side. He went up to her and asked for a draught. Without delay she lifted her pitcher, and with artless simplicity put it to the lips of the monarch. Having satisfied his thirst, and courteously thanked his benefactress, he said:

"My girl, if you will accompany me to Stockholm, I would endeavor to fix you in a more agreeable situation."

"Ah, sir," replied she, "I cannot accept your proposal. I am not anxious to rise above the state of life in which the providence of God has seen fit to place me; but even if I were, I could not for an instant hesitate."

"And why?" rejoined the king, somewhat surprised.

"Because," answered the girl, coloring, "my mother is poor and sickly, and has no one but me to assist and comfort her under her many afflictions; and no earthly bribe could induce me to leave her, or to neglect to discharge the duties affection requires of me."

"Where is your mother?" inquired the monarch.

"In that little cabin," replied the girl, pointing to a wretched hovel beside her.

The king, whose feelings were interested in favor of his companion, went in, and beheld stretched on a bedstead, whose only covering was a little straw, an aged female weighed down with years, and sickness under infirmities. Moved at the sight, the monarch addressed her: "I am sorry, my poor woman, to find you in so destitute a condition."

"Alas, sir," answered the venerable sufferer, "I would need to be pitied had I not that kind and attentive girl, who labors to support me, and omits nothing that she thinks can afford me relief. May a gracious God remember it to her for her good," she added, wiping away her tears.

Never, perhaps, was Gustavus more sensible than at this moment of the pleasure of possessing an exalted station. The consciousness of having it in his power to assist a suffering fellow creature almost overpowered him: and putting a purse into the hand of the young villager, he could only say, "continue to take care of your mother; I shall soon enable you to do so more effectually. Good bye, my amiable girl; you may depend upon the promise of your king."

On his return to Stockholm, Gustavus settled a pension for life on the mother, with the reversion to the daughter after death.

The Liar.—We find the following in a work just published:—"As you would avoid the paths of sorrow and misery—as you would turn from the crumbling precipice—run for your life from the steps of the liar. His breath will pollute and destroy. None can confide in him—none trust him. He is hated by his companions and shunned by his friends. Should you get entangled in his snares, use the utmost exertion and prudence to regain your former standing; for unless you do, farewell to your hopes—to all your joys!"

[Selected.

When a young man has acquired a love of reading, and, of course, a healthful relish for intellectual pleasures, he has become possessed of one of the best preservatives against dissipation. A fondness for low company, and intemperate pleasures, is most generally the consequence of ignorance and a want of taste.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

Kindness.

A little word in kindness spoken,
A motion or a tear,
Has often heal' a heart all broken,
And made a friend sincere.

A word—a look—has crushed to earth,
Full many a budding flower,
Which, had a smile but owned its birth,
Would bless life's darkest hour.

Then, deem it not an idle thing,
A pleasant word to speak;
The face you wear, the thoughts you bring,
A heart may heal or break.

The Old School-House.

Once, in travelling, I saw a very old building. It appeared to be falling into ruins. No smoke issued from its broken chimney. No foot crossed its grass-grown threshold. The casements were gone, and through their vacant places, the winds whistled, and the rains fell.

I asked, "what is this building, which is thus suffered to decay?" They answered, "a school-house. But a part of its materials have been used to build a better one, in a more convenient spot, for the village children."

So I paused there, a little time, to meditate. And I said to myself, what a variety of scenes may have past, within these tottering walls. Where are the teachers, who in years gone by sat in the chair of state, and ruled, and gave instruction?

In yonder corner, perhaps, was a low bench, for the little ones conning their alphabet. Those little ones have grown up,—grown gray,—and died. The babes whom they rocked in the cradle, have shown the same tenderness to their own babes. "One generation passeth away and another cometh."

Beneath those windows, where that trim old sycamore looked in, with all its show of green leaves, waving and gossiping in the breeze of summer, I imagine a row of young girls, with their sunny locks, knitting, sewing, or listening with serious faces, while the mistress taught them what it was necessary for them to know, when they became women.

The snows of winter seem to spread around. The frozen pond in the rear of the school-house, is covered with boys. The clock strikes nine. They hasten to their school. The narrow entry rings with the jingle of their skates, as they throw them down. One or two, who love play better than study, approach with more lingering steps.

Methinks, I see their ruddy faces, as they take their seats. The master raises a stern eye at their clamour, or stifled laughter, and commands them to write their copies, or attend to their sums. But the treatise of arithmetic is thumbed, and the grammar lesson curled into dog's ears, by those whose roving thoughts are among their winter sports.

Then there was the long sigh of indolence, and the tears of such as were punished.—And there was impatience there, and ambition, and hope, and the kindlings of intellect, and the delights of knowledge. The master endeavors to rule each for their good, as the wise magistrate restrains the people by laws.

I fancy that I behold that teacher walking homeward, weary and thoughtful when the day was done. He felt sadness for those who did not improve, and over those who did, he rejoiced with a peculiar love.

Perhaps, he repeated mournfully the words of the prophet, "I have labored in vain, I have spent my strength for naught." And a voice from heaven, answered in his heart, "Yet surely thy judgment is with the Lord, and thy work with thy God."

Old school-house!—couldst thou speak, I doubt not thou wouldst tell me, that eminent men have been nurtured in thee; ingenious mechanics, on whom the comfort of the community depends; athletic farmers, laying the forest low, and forcing earth to yield her increase; physicians whom the sick sufferer blesses: eloquent lawyers, wise statesmen, holy priests, who interpret the word of the Almighty.

I wish that the school-houses in our country, were more commodious and tasteful in their construction, more spacious and airy, surrounded with trees, or beautified with shrubbery. When some of the boys, who read this become men, perhaps they will build such a school-house, and present it to the children of their town.

But it is not so important in what kind of a building we go to school, as what we learn, and how we behave while we are there. Very good things have been learned in poor and rude edifices.

There was once a benevolent man who went in a ship, to the great Island or continent of New Holland. He found multitudes of children growing up neglected and ignorant. He wished much to have them taught. But there was no school-house.

So he collected them under a spreading tree, whose branches could shelter at least one hundred, from the heat of the sun. He hung cards with painted lessons among the boughs. And there he taught the poor colonists to read, to spell, and to sing.

There are very beautiful birds in that country. Many of them had nests in this large tree. So there they were flying about and tending their young, while the children were learning below; and the chirping of the new-fledged birds, and the warbling of their parents, and the busy voices of the children learning to be good, made sweet music in the heart of that benevolent man. Did they not ascend and mingle with the praises of angels round the throne?

To the Drowsy.—Indulge not a drowsy temper in bed. Why shouldest thou live but half thy days. In the grave there will be sleeping enough.

[Fuller.

First and Last Drop.—It has been remarked of ardent spirits, that the first drop leads to crime, and the last drop to the gallows.

Autumn.

Autumn, commonly called Fall, from the falling of leaves, is come; the heat of summer is gone, the cooler winds of September fan our streets, wing their course over the plains, rustle through the groves and wood lands, and even howl around some of the highest mountain tops. The flowers have nearly all disappeared, the forests, so fresh and green during the summer, are beginning to change their color, and soon will the trees be stripped of their summer clothing and bare their branches to the storm and winter winds which will sigh and scream through the leafless forests. The little birds, too, are hastening away before the approach of winter; but yesterday they were singing amid the bowers, but now those bowers are deserted by the little musicians and we hear no more of their summer songs.

How drear is autumn? What a sadness it spreads over the mind? It reminds us of the close of life, of the autumn of old age, and of the long winter of death that must follow. But this is looking upon the dark side of the subject, let us look at the other side, and see if we cannot wake up some bright and glad thoughts in connection with autumn. Look up, young readers, and examine that picture, that presents an autumn scene; it is autumn fruit gathering. See the falling fruit; there stands the ladder against the tree, some are among the branches shaking down the fruit, some are under the trees gathering it up; heaps of full ripe fruit lie upon the ground. Autumn then is not without its blessing for man; if it comes to wind up the pleasures of summer, to put an end to the delightful songs our feathered tribes pour forth amid our summer groves, and to spread its blight upon the face of nature; it comes no less to mature the labors of summer, and crown the whole year with a rich ingathering of its fruits, that man may be blessed and happy in winter. But for autumn to finish the work, the flowers of spring and the growth in summer would be in vain.

But, young reader, now represented by the bud of spring, you must not forget that in order to a happy old age, like the season, you must blossom in the spring of life, grow and strengthen and ripen in virtue in the summer of manhood, and then in the autumn of declining years, you shall have joy and hope; your souls shall be like those trees represented in the cut, richly laden with fruit, which will sustain you amid the ravages of the winter of death. Those who do not sow in spring and mature during summer, have nothing in autumn.

RELIGION.

Religion smoothes life's troubled stream,
And sheds a mild, resplendent beam;
Which lulls to stillness every care,
And blunts the arrows of despair.

Misfortunes scarce can raise a sigh
While her blest influence hovers nigh;
Nor poverty one tear beguile,
But she will change it to a smile.

Teach me, O Heaven, her ways to tread,
By her bright taper to be led,
To thy bright domes, the blest abode
Of saints, of angels, and of God.

True Courage.

"Coward! coward!" said James Lawton to Edward Wilkins, as he pointed his finger to him.

Edward's face turned very red, and the tears started in his eyes, as he said, "James Lawton, don't call me a coward."

"Why don't you fight John Taylor then when he dares you? I would not be dared by any boy."

"He is afraid," said Charles Jones, as he put his finger in his eye, and pretended to cry.

"I am not afraid," said Edward; and he looked almost ready to give up; for John Taylor came forward and said, "come on, then, and show that you are not afraid."

A gentleman passing by, said, "Why do you not fight the boy?—tell me the reason."

The boys all stood still, while Edward said, "I will not do a wicked thing, sir, if they do call me a coward."

"That is right, my noble boy," said the gentleman. "If you fight that boy, you really will disgrace yourself, and will show that you are more afraid of the laugh and ridicule of your companions, than of breaking the commandments of God.

"It is more honorable to bear an insult with meekness, than to fight about it."

"Beasts and brutes which have no reason, know of no other way to avenge themselves, but God has given you understanding, and though it be hard to be called a coward, and to submit to indignity and insult, yet remember the words of the wise man—'He that ruleth his spirit, is greater than he that taketh a city.'"

Suppose you fight with this boy, and your companions all call you a brave fellow, what will this be when you are called to stand before God?

Many a poor deluded man has been drawn in to accept a challenge and fight a duel to show his bravery, and thus displayed to all, that he was a miserable coward, who was afraid of the sneer and laugh of his companions. Rather follow the example of that brave soldier who, when he was challenged to fight, said, 'I do not fear the cannon's mouth, but I fear God.'

From the Sunday School Monitor.

Abner Kneeland's Opinion of Sunday Schools.

Abner Kneeland was a noted infidel. He spent a considerable portion of a long life in vigorous efforts to overthrow the religion of Christ. He resorted to every means which a wicked ingenuity could devise to bring reproach upon Christians and the cause which they profess to love. But his work is now done. What a fearful account will he have to render to his Maker!

While he was editor of a paper in Boston, he published with his approval the following opinion in regard to Sunday Schools. If such is the belief of infidels, how ought Christians to love and cherish this blessed institution.

"There perhaps is no system of education so dangerous to the liberties of this country, as that of Sunday Schools; it is calculated to enslave the mind, and make a nation superstitious; it shuts the avenues to the expansion of the mind; and the only tendency it has is to make bigots, and bigotry will produce children like unto its own deformity. Think not that the S. School system is harmless; it is the most deep laid plan ever put into operation to subvert the liberty of man."

Never do Mischief.

A very fine looking little boy, named Henry, lived near one of our large public schools. There were other boys living in the same house with Henry.

One night, two of the boys planned together to frighten Henry. So one of them hid himself under Henry's bed. About midnight a loud rap was heard at the door, and in stalked the other boy.

He was frightfully dressed in a white sheet, and had a lighted candle in his hand. Just as he came in, the boy under the bed raised his back, and heaved up the bed in which Henry was lying.

Now mark what took place. Henry did not rise as early as usual that morning, and when some of the family went to call him, he would only answer by strange noises and cries! His reason was gone—he was deranged.

In the course of the first year after this, his reason seemed to come to him again. Thus what took place was partly made known. Some other things were found out by one of the boys.

But Henry's reason soon left him again, and now he is a perfect idiot. True, he is not violent, and never engages in tearing and throwing things about the room.

He is harmless and gentle, and has been so for many years. But in the night, at about the time when the boys frightened him, he will cry out with horror, "Oh, they are coming! they are coming!"

True Courtesy.—"Manners," says the eloquent Edmund Burke, "are of more importance than laws. Upon them in a great measure, the laws depend. The laws touch us here and there—now and then. Manners are what vex or soothe, corrupt or purify, exalt or debase, barbarize or refine, by a constant, steady, uniform, insensible operation, like that of the air we breathe in. They give their whole form and color to our lives."

The Sabbath Recorder.

EDITED BY GEORGE B. UTTER. "THE SEVENTH DAY IS THE SABBATH OF THE LORD THY GOD." PUBLISHED AT NO. 9 SPRUCE ST.

VOL. II—NO. 15. NEW YORK, FIFTH-DAY, OCTOBER 2, 1845. WHOLE NO. 67.

The Sabbath Recorder.

For the Recorder.

TO SABBATH-KEEPERS.

It has been a subject of regret with many, that Sabbath-keepers, deprived as they are of many of the advantages of society, should so often be constrained to abandon their faith, or retire to some unknown and unfrequented place, where they can worship God according to the dictates of their own consciences in security and peace. We are for the most part an agricultural people, and it is solely because that occupation affords the only means for the strict observance of the Sabbath without great personal sacrifices. It is lamentable to see how great multitudes of our young men have deserted the standard their fathers set up, for no other reason than because of the insurmountable obstacles which beset them in conducting the various branches of business to which they were educated. Every city abounds with them. Nor is there any end to this evil. There are hundreds of young men now ascending the stage, of fine talents and enterprise, who love the Sabbath, and will contend valiantly for it, but whose hearts sink within them when they look around upon the insuperable difficulties which every where surround them. They cannot all be agriculturists; their tastes and talents differ, and their education has been diverse. What shall they do? If a place offers where they can obtain employment and be left in the enjoyment of their religious rights, how eargerly is it seized; yet who has not been compelled to sympathize with the poor adventurer, as he follows him in his obstructed path through temptations and trials, until nature triumphs and he stoops to worship the image of Baal? He who has passed through this ordeal must sympathize with him deeply; and those who are scattered through our seaport towns will understand what we mean. Some compromise with the devil in various ways; and if any are resolute to carry a fixed purpose and an unfaltering faith in defiance of all obstacles, it must be done at great sacrifices, and he must have a firm heart indeed who does not often turn a longing eye to the gods of the land.

Two hundred years have almost passed, since the first Sabbath-keeping church was planted at Newport, R. I., and there are scarcely enough of its advocates left within its precincts to guard its hallowed walls from Vandalism. Why? It is not because truth cannot flourish in communities—not because of the great sacrifice required to lose a seventh part of time; but it is because of the constant annoyance it occasions in our intercourse with business men. They cannot be made to live on the look-out for exceptions to a general observance of another day; nor can we enjoy the Sabbath amid the bustle and confusion of the working-day world. We are located among those who would compel us to observe the day of their appointment, but would not leave us in the quiet observance of the day which God has blessed.

There are in this State alone five thousand of us—enough, in all conscience, to let the world know that we are in it; but we are scattered from Montauk Point to the Falls of Niagara, in feeble bands, and struggling, like the Waldenses among the fastnesses of the mountains or their still more secluded valleys, for those blessings from which we have exiled ourselves for conscience's sake. In this way our energies are lost by not being concentrated, and, like scattered coals, are left to expire. Our societies are too feeble, for the most part, to admit of a complete organization, and the enjoyment of those advantages which large communities afford. Your children are without the means of adequate religious and intellectual improvement, or exposed to temptations and evils to which the past gives a full prospective of the future. Yourselves are subject to the most grievous exactions, and there is no redress—to the caprice of avarice, and the law denies you its protection.

There are large numbers who have been educated to the observance of Sunday, but who feel the obligation of the fourth commandment, and express a wish to obey it; but the difficulties in the way seem insurmountable. They tell us, that if we had a community of Sabbath-keepers where they could carry on their business, they would become members of it. Some have proposed Associations on the Fourier and other plans; but they will never succeed with a people who revere the Patriarchal system as do the Seventh-day Baptists. Settlements have from time to time been made in the great valleys of the West for accomplishing the object which all felt to be desirable, and flourishing settlements are now forming, but they are purely agricultural. This has been a fatal mistake. Those who are most in need of society are our manufacturers, our ship-carpenters, our machinists, and others engaged in various branches of trade. They can live only in communities. Could a location be chosen, affording facilities for agriculture, the arts and commerce, in a region where the character of the adjacent country would afford a prospect of ultimate success, and which is not already pre-occupied, there are men who, in character, capital, and numbers, are sufficient to accomplish the object, and are ready to embark their all in the enterprise. To ensure its success, it would be necessary to convene those interested, who should appoint a committee of enterprising and well-informed men, to make choice of a location and purchase the neighboring country. As the success of the whole enterprise would depend upon their discretion, it is evident that they should be uncorruptable, profound, statesman-like men—men who could comprehend the whole spirit of the age, embrace the whole country in their scope, and extend their vision far down the lapse of time.

The large commuities sway the small ones, and the city forms the character of the town; if, therefore, we would have a commanding influence on the destinies of a rising country, we must plant a citadel, and garrison it with our own tried veterans, and call in our wanderers from land and sea; and under the banner of the faith for which we have struggled through every adversity for so long, we will marshal ourselves for the conflict. The Romanists understand this, and are straining every nerve to gain an early foothold in that "garden of the world;" and why should not we, who of all the followers of Christ are most in need of a refuge to worship God as our faith dictates?

It could not be expected that there would be a simultaneous movement of all. Where our societies are well established, it is desirable they should remain. But too many of us are strangers in the land of our fathers, among those who have no sympathy with our belief, and are ever ready to load us with obloquy and oppression; and we are too isolated to produce an effective counter influence. By the means proposed, a large community could be formed at once with all the advantages and few of the vices of other places of equal size. Provided with with our own churches and schools, our own manufactories and vessels, in short all our own, the God-serving parent would no longer have his last days embittered with the consciousness that he leaves his children alone among the enemies of the Sabbath, to abjure his faith and dishonor the cause which had lain so near his heart.

JUVENIS.

New York, Sept. 25th, 1845.

VIOLATION OF THE SABBATH.

"The evil of Sabbath-breaking has not been too strongly depicted. Indeed, all has not been said. The standard of morals and the conscience among Christians has got very low. God's holy day was openly and grossly violated in our city, by men professing the name of Christ. Why is it? How is it? Do they doubt God's right to legislate for them? Or, if they do not, do they accord him one to be trifled with? Has he made laws without penalty? Is there no certainty in them? Will he not enforce them? Can he be bought off with an hour's worship of a Sabbath forenoon? Is it enough that they give ten or twenty dollars for the support of the preaching of his word? Will this quiet him? Will this avert the judgment of the great day? No; I tell you, no. I warn Christians of their danger. They stand upon a volcano, the fires of which are just ready to belch forth. God will not be mocked. There is no such thing as dividing your affections between him and the devil. They must be his. He will have them, or he will deliver you up to your own hearts' lusts.

"Upon this subject of Sabbath desecration, I feel, and feel deeply. I have wept over it, and prayed God again and again that he will have mercy upon his people. O! the church! the church! She is the light of the world. She is the polar star of a world in darkness. It is she who is to save the nations. She is the little leaven by which they are to be leavened. And the Sabbath! oh! the Sabbath! Christians, you must not forsake it. Give up the Sabbath and you give up all. Under God, the preservation of it rests entirely with you. Into your hands has he committed it. The thunders of Sinai are still ringing the terrible penalty of neglecting it in your ears. Who else will look after it? Will the infidel? Will he stand by it in this day of trial? Will the sceptic—the unthinking—the ungodly—the worldling? Will they rally around it? I repeat, the whole matter rests with you. It is by God's appointment that you are its shield. The responsibility of preserving it is with you. God will hold you to it. On then! rally around the Sabbath. As you love your country and your God, cling to this blessed institution. The moral power of the nation is in the Sabbath. Let us, then, as patriots, as Christians, hold on to it. Let us keep it holy, holy, HOLY—not a portion of it, but the whole, every moment of the appointed seventh part of the time, let us keep holy. It is God's day. He rested on and blessed it. We have no right to it. It is not ours; no, not a moment of it. And will you rob God! Six days shalt thou labor and do all the work—all, all, ALL; the seventh day is God's. We must come back to the book. We have made too free with God's day. One day in seven is little enough to make preparations for heaven. We give six professedly to the world, and woe be to us if we cannot spare one for God."

☞ The foregoing thoughts are from the pen of the venerable Dr. Beecher, President of Lane Theological Seminary. In reading them, one is forcibly reminded how much easier it is to lay down principles which will convict others, than to carry out those principles to their legitimate results. Here Dr. Beecher expresses a great tenacity for "the APPOINTED seventh part of time," which he indirectly acknowledges to be the seventh day of the week, by saying that God "rested on and blessed it." Yet it is well known, that the Doctor and those who act with him, habitually use the seventh day, which God rested on and blessed, as an ordinary working day. It is true they keep another day, professedly in the stead of the seventh. But for doing so they give us no scriptural authority whatever. Hence we may well adopt the Doctor's language in application to them, and ask, "Do they doubt God's authority to legislate? Or, if they do not, do they accord him one to be trifled with? Has he made laws without penalty? Is there no certainty in them? Can he be bought off?" One would naturally think, from the flippancy with which these men talk about the first day being as acceptable as the seventh day, that they actually expect, by keeping a day which God has not commanded, to buy him off for the neglect of the day which he has commanded. This is making too free with God's day. We ought to be satisfied with six days out of the seven, without undertaking to dictate which one of the seven shall be given to God. But, satisfied or not satisfied, we shall find that He is not to be trifled with.

SECRET SOCIETIES.

The following is a portion of a report read before the "Middlesex South Conference," by a Committee appointed to investigate the subject of Secret Societies. After a few remarks respecting particular societies, the following objections are urged against secret combinations in general. We bespeak for these objections a careful and candid perusal:—

1. Oaths of Secresy. It is generally understood, and we believe admitted, that oaths of secresy are required on uniting with secret societies. A lawful oath is an act of religious worship, wherein the person swearing, solemnly calls upon God to witness what he asserts or promises. To take an oath, therefore, without just occasion, for a wrong purpose, is in a high degree profane and impious. And, in general, it is wisest and safest not to encourage the use of extra-judicial oaths. But the oaths of secret societies are especially objectionable, because they bind to the keeping of secrets, before the nature of those secrets are known to the person swearing. The Westminster Divines say, "that no man may bind himself, by oath, to anything but what is good and just, and what he is resolved and able to perform;" but how can a man know that what he binds himself to is good and just, or that he is able to perform it, before he has become acquainted with it? We believe the taking or administering of such an oath to be an immorality.

2. Your committee believe that secret societies are dangerous in their civil and political tendency. They are not congenial to the spirit of our institutions. Under despotic governments, where men are not allowed to publish, write or speak their sentiments, there may be more apology for their existence, as a defence against the arbitrary encroachments of a despotic power. But, in a free country, where men are at liberty to speak and act according to the sentiments which they entertain, and where every one stands on an equal footing, their operation is, to give civil and political advantages to their members, over their fellow citizens. It is easy for a secret association, with ramifications throughout the land, all under the control of a general head, and possessing large funds, so far to control the politics of the country, as to have the principal part of the offices held by their members.

We therefore regard sceret societies as dangerous to the liberties of the country, and obstructions to the course of justice.

3. Your committee believe the existence of secret societies in a community, to be a great obstruction to the cause of religion. If members of a Christian church become connected with a secret society, their obligation to such society must clash with their covenant obligations to Christ and his church. They will almost necessarily transfer much of their interest in the cause of Christ, to their brethren of the secret association. The weekly meetings of the lodge, will take the place of the weekly church meetings; and if they ever had any interest in religion, it would soon be, in a great measure, lost. It is an association contrary to the genius and spirit of Christianity, which is open and above board. It is being unequally yoked together with unbelievers, and partaking of deeds of darkness which shun the light. It tends to create alienations among brethren, and divisions in our churches. It is, in fact, an attempt to serve two masters. Secret societies embrace persons of all religious opinions; and yet maintain generally, that adherence to the principles of the order will lead to eternal happiness. They, in fact, assume a sort of semi-religious character or divine foundation, which leads many to consider adherence to their order as all the religion that is necessary for them.

Your committee believe, that when Christ instituted his church, he designed to provide the means of social intercourse and combined action, to secure, in the best manner, the comfort of his people, and make their influence bear upon the community in the most efficient and unexceptionable manner, for the promotion of religion and morality. There is, therefore, no need of his people resorting to secret associations, made up of all sorts of people, to seek comfort or to promote religion or morality. It is attempting a union of Christ and Belial.

4. Secret societies are productive of social evils. They tend to foment jealousies, suspicions, and strifes, in the community. They enable their members to take undue advantage of the community. It used to be in the power of the free masons to ruin the worldly interests of any person against whom they set themselves. It will be so again, with any society which obtains a similar ascendancy.

The clannish spirit induced by these societies, must give an undue advantage in business to the members of the order. And how do we know but there may be something in their secret obligations, requiring them to prefer a brother before others in business? Such an obligation would correspond with the genius and spirit of secret societies, which are combinations for the exclusive advantage of those who belong to them. While a member of the order stands an equal chance for the general business, he is sure of that of his brethren. If such an order were to prevail, so as to embrace a large portion of the community, it would be hardly possible for an uninitiated person to succeed in any business. This is taking an unfair advantage; and instead of presenting the order in the aspect of a benevolent institution, it gives it the complexion of a selfish combination for mutual benefit, at the expense of the community.

5. This institution is praised by its admirers, for its social character, in bringing together in the weekly meeting, men of every sect and party. But this is one of the greatest evils of secret associations. It promotes the spirit of clanship; it brings men together in secret conclave, where darkness tempts to deeds of iniquity; it takes men away from their families, and leads them to seek that enjoyment in convivial meetings, which they ought to look for at the domestic hearth,—thus endangering the peace of families. In its social influence it is unnatural, as it separates the sexes, and deprives the social circle of the refining and restraining influence of female society. The tendency of such convivial meetings, is inevitably towards vicious indulgences.

6. All the benefits to be derived from secret associations, in the way of mutual benefit, may be secured by other means, not liable to any of these objections. Our religious and literary institutions, together with the ordinary intercourse of society, furnish all the means of social intercourse that are needed. A man may as well provide for his family in case of his decease, by a life insurance, as by giving his money to a secret society. And an institution on a similar principle might be formed, by which, in consideration of an annual deposit, an allowance might be made in case of sickness or disability. And as to benevolent care for the poor and distressed, the principles of Christianity enjoin it on all, and will secure it where they prevail.

CONDITION OF JERUSALEM.

The Rev. Dr. Hawes, who visited Jerusalem a few months since, describes it as follows:

The country immediately around Jerusalem, especially to the west and north, is the most dreary, barren, and waste, that I ever beheld. It seems overlaid with immense masses of rocks and stones, with scarcely soil enough to allow anything to take root and grow. The city itself, once beyond a doubt the most magnificent and splendid on earth, now presents only a melancholy contrast to its former greatness and glory. You cannot walk about Sion, and go round about her as of old, and tell the towers thereof, mark her bulwarks, and consider her palaces. The city sits solitary and forlorn; forsaken of God, and evidently lying under his curse. All who have been in Jerusalem must have felt this. The inhabitants are few, and with the exception of the Turks—if indeed they are an exception—poor, oppressed, and extremely miserable. No suburbs, no surrounding busy population, none of the stir and activity of enterprising life is to be witnessed; but only one rude scene of melancholy waste, in the midst of which the ancient glory of Judea bows her widowed head in desolation. A few goats and sheep, straggling about the rocks which overhang the shattered remains of the village of Siloam; a few swarthy shepherds, plying their listless occupation—with here and there a fierce, armed Bedouin, from the surrounding deserts and mountain fastnesses, and now and then a cowled monk or wandering pilgrim, steal in upon the picture; and except it be the sound of the muezzin from the minarets, proclaiming the hour of prayer to the followers of the false prophet, you may sit on the hill slopes, on either side, for an hour together, and not hear the vibration of a human voice from that spot, which once echoed to the strains of sacred song, and royal triumph, and national glory, and the busy din and tumult of 2,000,000 of people.

"GO AHEAD."

The late Rowland Hill was so much attached to this motto, that he placed it on his family Seal.

His active itinerancy greatly delighted his old friend, Mr. Berridge, who thus begins a letter to him, dated Sept. 3, 1773:—'Dear Sir, I mean my dear Rowley, your kind letter was long in coming, but it brought good tidings, and refreshed my heart. The motto of your seal rejoiced me; it gave me a peep into your bosom, and a taste of your letter before I read it. Indeed I was somewhat afraid lest orders and a * * * * would cure you of rambling; but my fears were groundless, and all is well. The lampoon published against you, is a blessed omen for good, that God intends to honor you. It seems to me a happy token that you will remain an itinerant, and that much good will arise from your ministry. Luther used to say, when the Lord had fresh work for him, a strong trial was always sent beforehand to prepare him for it by humiliation. Study not to be a fine preacher. Jerichos are blown down with ram's horns. Look to Jesus for preaching food; and what is wanted will be given, and what is given be blest, whether it be a barley or a wheaten loaf, a crust or a crumb. Your mouth will be a flowing stream, or a fountain sealed, according as your heart is. Avoid all controversy in preaching, talking, or writing; preaching nothing down but the devil, and nothing up but Jesus Christ.'

A HELP-MEET.

A correspondent of the New York Commercial Advertiser, writing from the Grave Yard in New Haven, says: "But turning a moment from the distinguished men of New Haven, it may not be amiss to notice one of its distinguished females. I refer to the accomplished and eminently pious daughter of Pierrepont, afterwards the wife of the celebrated Edwards. This is the lady to whom Whitefield alludes in his journal, where he says he 'felt a wonderful satisfaction in being at the house of Mr. Edwards. He is a son himself, and hath also a daughter of Abraham for his wife. She is a woman adorned with a meek and quiet spirit, and talked so feelingly and sensibly of things of God, and seemed to be such a help-meet to her husband, that she caused me to renew those prayers which for some months I have put up to God, that he would send me a daughter of Abraham to be my wife. But, Lord, I desire to have no choice of my own.' On which account Tracy, from whose 'Great Awakening,' it is quoted, shrewdly remarks, 'He had not yet learned, if he ever did, that God is not pleased to make such 'sweet couples' out of persons who have no choice of their own.' It was of this lady, also, that Copley, the celebrated portrait painter, afterwards said in England, that 'she was the most intellectual and beautiful female he had ever seen.' I did not hear whether her portrait is still in existence or not.'

DENOMINATIONAL SCHISMS.—The September number of the Christian Examiner has the following under the head of "religious intelligence:"

"The most important event in the history of the religious denominations in this country since the schism in the Presbyterian Church, is the disruption of the Methodist Church of the U. States, by the secession of all or most of the Southern and Southwestern members, who have adopted a separate organization under the name of the 'Methodist Episcopal Church, South.' The cause of this movement was the action of the Northern churches and of the General Convention on the subject of Slavery, by which the Southern Methodists felt themselves aggrieved. The doctrine and discipline of the Church remain unchanged, in the parts into which it is now divided; yet serious consequences may follow, in respect not only to its strength, but its distinctive character.

A schism has arisen from the same cause in the Baptist denomination, which cannot, however, so vitally affect the interests of the body, because they were not bound together by a system of ecclesiastical discipline like that to which Wesley subjected his Church. In consequence of certain declarations of the Baptist Missionary Boards, in regard to the employment of slaveholders as missionaries, a Southern Convention was held at Augusta, Ga., in May last, and a 'Southern Baptist Convention' was organized, 'to promote foreign and domestic missions,' the members of which have withdrawn faom any farther connection with the Home and Foreign Mission Board, which for many years have had charge of these interests among the Baptists.

We regret these divisions, particularly in their bearing on our political Union. They tend to weaken the bonds which should unite the people of the whole country. Religious sympathy and co-operation are among the most effectual means of abating or counteracting the sectional prejudices which spring up in different parts of the land, and we grieve to see distrust and alienation taking their place.

FORMER TIMES NOT BETTER THAN THESE.—"I can remember too well the time," says Bishop Meade, "when in every educated young man of Virginia, I was prepared to meet a sceptic, if not a scoffer. At the time of my first ordination by Bishop Madison—one bright Sabbath morning, only about fifteen gentleman young and old, and two ladies, were present, in the old and venerable church at Williamsburg. More of the young men, indeed, did I meet on the way to the church, with guns on their shoulders and dogs at their sides, going into the fields and woods in search of game, than there were to be found in the church itself. Those were days when French infidelity had gained the ascendant, and when not a few of the 'master spirits' of our country were dazzled by the ignis fatui that dawned amid the bewildering mazes of our political swamps and marshes. Those days have gone by."

THE FINGER POST.—Suppose a finger-post should be made to point the wrong way, and the weary traveler should be so much deceived by it as to go to the left instead of going to the right, you can easily imagine the mischief that would follow. Now, a finger-post to guide us through the highways and bye-ways of this world, excellent as it is, is not equal to a finger-post that rightly points out our road to a better. The word of God is that finger-post. If ever, then, you should get into a difficulty, do not make bad worse, by going heedlessly forward, but make the best of your way back to the finger-post. Read it with attention, that there may be no mistake about the matter; mark well the way to which it points, and go forward as straight as an arrow.

Not to read and study at all, is to tempt God; and to do nothing but study, is to forget the ministry; to study only to glory in one's knowledge, is a shameful vanity; to study in search of the means to flatter sinners, is a deplorable prevarication; but to store one's mind with the knowledge proper to the saints, by study and by prayer, and to diffuse that knowledge in solid instructions and practical exhortations—this is to be a prudent, zealous and laborious minister. [Qunesel.

Of all the preaching in the world, (that speaks not stark lies,) I hate that preaching which tends to make the hearers laugh, or to move their minds with tickling levity, and affect them as stage players used to do instead of affecting them with a holy reverence of the name of God. [Baxter.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, October 2, 1845.

OBSTACLES TO THE SUNDAY REFORM MOVEMENT.

It is not uncommon for the advocates of a popular reform, under the influence of overmuch zeal, to press their favorite measures so far as to produce a counter movement, and thus defeat their own design. If we mistake not, such has been the course of the leading advocates for a stricter observance of Sunday. When they commenced their work, they were satisfied to circulate information, through publications and lectures, in regard to Sunday desecration, the evils resulting from it, and the advantages of resting strictly one day in seven. While they pursued this course, every thing seemed to go on prosperously. Conventions were numerously attended, Sabbath Associations were everywhere formed, the press was enlisted, and the popular feeling was decidedly on their side. Had they been content to continue as they began, and to rely upon the slow but sure power of moral suasion, it is impossible to estimate the results which might have followed their efforts. But there were hot heads among them, who could not wait for [illegible] about in this gradual manner. They must see the work move on more rapidly than it could through the action of truth upon the public mind. They must see the canal locks closed, and the canal boats and railroad cars cease running at once, or else they could not contain themselves. Hence they resorted to the strong arm of civil law for assistance, and invoked legislators and executive officers to lend their aid in putting down public and private work on Sunday. They succeeded to a limited extent. Laws were passed in several instances restricting Sunday labor upon the public works; and in a few instances, private individuals were taken by the collar, walked up before the magistrate, and fined or imprisoned for desecrating the popular Sabbath.

To the superficial observer, this might seem like a triumph. But before giving way to triumphal shouts, let him mark the consequences of this apparent victory. Instead of securing a stricter observance of Sunday, it has in many places served to rouse popular indignation against the whole Sunday reform movement, and to array a portion of the newspaper press in open hostility to it. From several quarters where it was least expected, the notes of disapprobation have been distinctly sounded. From other quarters, where disapprobation would naturally be expected, but has not heretofore been expressed, we now hear language which cannot be mistaken—language which shows a determination not to allow the popular movement in favor of Sunday any longer to go on unrebuked. Proof of these assertions may be found in almost all of those newspapers which are distinguished for speaking freely of the movements of the day. Such papers do not hesitate to pronounce the attempt to restrain Sunday labor by civil penalties, inconsistent alike with true policy and genuine Christianity. They regard it as hindering free inquiry, and tending to encourage a union of civil and ecclesiastical power. Hence they are driven to take an attitude of hostility towards a movement which they confess has many praiseworthy designs, and which would, if properly carried out, produce many desirable results.

Numerous newspaper extracts might be given, if they were needed, to illustrate this subject. They would show beyond dispute, that obstacles to the Sunday reform movement are many and increasing. The single circumstance of imprisoning a man in Vermont for working on Sunday, has done more to turn attention to the evils of Sabbath legislation than could have been done by the direct labors of ten men during the whole time he was in prison. It brought the matter right home to the hearts of the people, and compelled them to see, that a principle was allowed in this instance, which might be applied to themselves, and might lead to their imprisonment for religious opinions and practices if they should ever happen to be in the minority. This Vermont man, about whom so much has been said, belonged to a class whose influence is not very extensively felt while unaided by adventitious circumstances. But when religious men, for a religious purpose, laid hold on him and put him in prison on the charge of irreligion, he at once stood before the world in a new light. He was then looked upon as a persecuted man, and persecuted too for carrying out the principle of free thought and action, which most men hold to be sacred. Of course his imprisonment, in such circumstances, was sufficient to excite feeling and throw a most formidable obstacle in the way of that very movement which it was designed to promote. And so it has. One paper, we notice, recommends making it the occasion of attacking "the Sabbath institution itself, as a church-and-state affair—a legalized outrage." Another thinks "a whirlwind of moral indignation must be let loose upon the Sabba-day insolence which shut him up in that jail." Such expressions indicate popular feeling, and will have an influence. Even a good cause must suffer from giving just occasion for them.

But the obstacles to the Sunday reform movement are not confined to the newspaper press. The opponents of that movement have commenced the publication of tracts for circulation on the subject. One of these tracts was written by Dr. Thomas Cooper, late President of Columbia College, S. C., and is entitled, "The Religious Observance of the Christian Sabbath not of Divine or Apostolic Appointment." This treatise is said to be "particularly appropriate for the present time, when the proscriptive spirit of the clergy, as well as laity, is in considerable exercise to enforce the rigid observance of the Sabbath according to blue-law custom." In noticing it, one editor says, "These fanatics, who are attempting to wrest from the people their civil and religious rights, ought to be met with their own weapon, the press and put down. This is the object and design of publishing this valuable work," which may become "a text-book to overthrow the argument of the pretended divine appointment of the Lord's Day."

There is another treatise in course of publication, through the columns of a newspaper, entitled, "Sunday no Sabbath." It is an English work, written by Charles Larkin, and was considered so heretical in Edinburgh, that the police actually seized it for presentation as blasphemous. Heretical as it is, however, it contains some wholesome truths, which ought to be heeded. For illustration, read the following statements which are made in the chapter on the Scripture argument against Sunday:—"There is no authority whatever in Scripture for giving to Sunday the denomination of the Sabbath. Both in the Old Testament and in the New, it is the seventh day, the Saturday, that is called the Sabbath. How dare these clergymen come forward, and with shameless audacity tell us, that Sunday is the Sabbath-day of the fourth commandment? Sunday is not the Sabbath, nor has the law of the Sabbath any reference to Sunday. If that law be in force now, then the strictest and most straightlaced observer of the Sunday is a violator of the Sabbath-day."

The foregoing statements are sufficient to show, that there are obstacles of a most alarming character directly in the way of the success of the Sunday reform movement. They have been partly created, and partly brought to light, by the unjustifiable measurers of the advocates of that movement. It will not do to despise them, neither will it do to dispose of them with a few hasty words of denunciation. They must be fairly met and fully removed. And this, we believe, can never be done without taking the word of God as a standard, bringing our practice to conform thereto, and then enforcing the claims of the Sabbath simply by appeals to the law and the testimony.

LECTURE ON ANGELS.

We have often heard persons express their pleasure in the thought that their departed friends were their guardian angels, attending them from place to place, and watching over them in all their movements to keep them from evil. However pleasing the fancy, we never supposed it founded in any thing else than the fondness of affection, which makes us cling to the memory of those whom death has torn from our circle. But Professor Bush has attempted to show that it is not a mere fancy, but a sober reality, sustained by reason and Scripture. He gave a lecture last Sunday evening at the Society Library Hall, in which he took the ground that all angels are human spirits, that have once dwelt in mortal bodies here on earth, or on some other planet. He utterly explodes the idea of a distinct race of intelligences superior to man; indeed, if we understand him correctly, he denies the possibility of the existence of any such race. Man, he remarked, was made in the IMAGE of God, and how is it possible for a creature to bear MORE than the image of his Maker. It cannot be. True, there may be an astonishing difference of degrees in which this image is borne. There is a vast difference between a Newton and the untutored Hottentot; yet both are alike men, reflecting the image of God in different degrees of brightness. So between men in this world, and those who have passed into the world of spirits, there may be all conceivable difference in powers and capacities; yet this difference is only in the degree of their endowments, and not in the nature of their race.

"The angels which kept not their first estate," (Jude 6,) were supposed by the Professor to be "the sons of God" spoken of in Gen. 6: 2, whose sin consisted in breaking loose from the restraints of lawful wedlock, and going after "strange flesh." He argued that they were certainly human beings, because their sin was of a similar nature to that of the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah. The apostle shows a parallelism in the two cases; the Sodomites are represented as "IN LIKE MANNER giving themselves over to fornication;" that is, in like manner to the angels. Yet if the angels were pure spirits, according to the common notion, it was impossible that they should pollute themselves in like manner. There would be no parallelism in the cases. It is remarkable that the Septuagint renders the phrase "sons of God" in Gen. 6, by the word which is always translated angels. It was the Septuagint version with which the Apostles had to do, and hence their employment of the same term in the passage referred to.

Several passages of Scripture were quoted, where angels are expressly called men, and were regarded as such by those who saw them. Gen. 18: 2, &c. 19: 8, 10, &c. Judges 13: 6, 10, &c. Dan. 10: 5. Mark 16: 5. Luke 24: 4. (Compare John 20: 11, 12.) Acts 1: 10. Rev. 21: 17. It was also remarked that the angel whom the seer of Patmos saw, and was about to worship, declared himself to be his fellow servant. Rev. 22: 9. Also that in the future state the righteous are said to be like the angels. Luke 20: 36.

Thus far very plausible. But our readers will very probably ask, Who then is the Devil? Is he a human spirit? And if so, whence did he spring to tempt our first parents, seeing death had not yet entered our world, and he could not therefore have been dislodged from an earthly body? We do not recollect that the Professor distinctly noticed this point. According to his theory, however, the tempter of our mother Eve must have vaulted from some other planet; or perhaps belonged to that race that peopled our own, long before the era where Moses begins his narration. It was remarked in general that the term devil is of plural import, and is used to signify the combined power of all those spirits that exert an evil influence upon man; the same as the word Turk is used to signify, not a single individual of the Ottoman nation, but the combined power of the whole. Thus we say, "the power of the Turk," that is, of the nation.

As we took no notes, our account of the lecture is of course very imperfect, yet we think it is correct, as far as it goes. At all events we do not intentionally misrepresent it. Although we cannot, without farther investigation, receive the Professor's theory, yet we accord to him the merit of having treated the subject in an able and interesting manner. Those who love free discussion will be gratified to hear him; those who are afraid to think beyond the narrow limits of a creed, will of course stand aloof. For our own part we have always supposed, and do still think, that the order of angels is distinct from the seed of Abraham. Heb. 2: 14—16. The nature of the former Christ did not assume when he made atonement for our sins; but he assumed the nature of the latter. Yet if angels are spirits that have once dwelt in mortal bodies, Christ died for them, as well as for others. We submit the question, however, to those who have investigated it more thoroughly than ourselves.

PLYMON SEAVER.

This young man, who was imprisoned in the jail at Chelsea, Vt., for working on Sundays, has written to the editor of The Herald of Freedom, to say that he is again enjoying his liberty. It seems that after he had been confined some twenty-five days, a town meeting was held to see if the town would not take measures to release him. The subject was pretty warmly discussed, and a vote was finally passed by a small majority to dismiss the article. But the excitement was very great, and his friends were not willing to give up the matter so. Hence they sent in a petition for another town meeting. In less than three days from that time, however, the fine and costs were paid up, and the first select man went and took Mr. Seaver from the jail. By whom the fine was paid, Mr. S. says he does not precisely know, but he has been told that it was mostly done by those who voted against him. Be that as it may, he thinks it was good policy for somebody to pay it, since the feeling of indignation was rising to so high a pitch that the jail itself might have been endangered.

Now as to the influence of his imprisonment upon the great mass of persons not connected with religious societies, it has been to excite indignation and disgust, that a man should be twenty-nine days shut up in prison for acting out his own honest convictions of truth and duty. Upon himself its influence has been any thing else than reformatory. Instead of making a Sabbatarian of him, he says it has confirmed him more and more in the position he had previously taken. Since he came out he has pursued the same course as before. He has worked "three whole Sundays, right in the face and eyes of popular prejudices and superstitions." He has been threatened with another prosecution, but expresses a determination to stand up and resist all attempts to prevent his acting out his convictions. Thus it appears, that the men who imprisoned him were obliged to come and take him out—that the people have been enlisted against his persecutors—and that instead of securing their object, they have only shown that it cannot be secured.

DR. BEECHER ON PERFECTION.

Some months ago, Dr. Lyman Beecher, President of Lane Theological Seminary, Ohio, preached a discourse in Boston, which was extensively commented upon, and was supposed by some to teach the doctrine that a state of sinless perfection is attainable in this life. The Perfectionist papers have published an account of it, to show how nearly his views correspond with theirs; and many other papers have copied the account, to express their very great surprise. This circumstance has induced the Doctor to come out in a long letter explanatory of his views on the subject. He says that his sermon in Boston was designed simply to enforce the old-fashioned doctrine of complete justification by faith, full assurance of hope, and supreme devotedness to Christ. After making this statement, he answers in the following words some of the questions which have been put to him through letters and newspapers:—

1. Have you changed your views at all, upon the subject of Oberlin Perfection? Only to regard it with increasing sorrow, as I see my anticipations fulfilled in its tendencies and results.

2. Have you any new notions about sanctification? Only to revive the old notions, which, with too many, have fallen into oblivion.

3. Did you, in Boston, give a series of directions for the attainment of perfect sanctification? No. But I gave directions for growth in grace, such as I gave forty years ago, nearly verbatim, and have repeated in preaching and conversation a thousand times since.

4. Do you hold to the sudden attainment of a definite amount of sanctification, beyond which there is no diminution of the power of sin, or increase of holiness, except through the enlarged capacities of the soul? No! No! No!

5. How near to Perfection do you think a Christian may arrive in this life? So near as to be a very happy and useful man, with room enough for confession of sin, and upward and onward movement; such an one, as, if all the church were such, would make her terrible as an army with banners, and if the whole world were such, make it very peaceful and happy.

FAIR OF THE AMERICAN INSTITUTE.

The Eighteenth Annual Fair of the American Institute is to be held at Niblo's Garden, in the City of New York, commencing on Monday, the 6th of Oct., and continuing two weeks. Arrangements have been made for a grand display of the improvements in Agriculture, Arts, and Manufactures. During the first week there will be a National Convention of Farmers, Gardeners, and Silk Culturists, which will occupy parts of three days. During the second week there will be the Anniversary Address, ploughing and spading matches, show of cattle and horses, and a triumphant procession of vehicles loaded with productions of the farm and garden drawn by well-trained horses. The exercises of the two weeks will be interspersed with Addresses, Music, and Fire Works. Various Premiums are announced to secure the competition of exhibitors. Among them we notice one of $50 for the best piece of silk stuff, 27 inches in width and 60 yards in length, manufactured of native silk in the United States; also $50 for the best constructed farm-wagon, and the best method of harnessing horses for draught of the same; and smaller sums for various useful articles in which improvement ought to be made. An Address on Agriculture and Horticulture is to be delivered by Hon. Geo. Lunt, of Massachusetts; the Annual Address will be delivered by Hon. T. D. Elliott, of Massachusetts. The whole exhibition bids fair to be a large and attractive one.

JOHN B. GOUGH'S STATEMENT.

Mr. Gough has at length made a statement of the unhappy circumstances connected with his recent mysterious disappearance. The statement bears the marks of truth, and will probably be believed by the candid public. It seems that on the evening of his arrival in New York, he was accosted in the street by a man calling himself Williams, and claiming to be an old shopmate. After some desultory conversation, allusion was made to Mr. Gough's having become a temperance man, whereupon Mr. Williams said, "I suppose you are so pious now, and have got to be so proud, that you would not drink a glass of soda with an old shopmate." "O yes," said Mr. G., "I would drink a glass of soda with any body; I will drink a glass with you." They went to a fountain, where the soda was prepared, and Mr. Gough's professed friend passed him a glass with his hand over the top of it. He thought it an ungentlemanly way of passing a glass, but drank it, and they soon separated. It was not long, however, before he began to feel a warm sensation about the lungs and chest, and an unusual exhileration, which excited his fears that all was not right. This increased until he was completely bewildered, and walked on without knowing where or for what. During his walk he went into a grocery and got some brandy, but does not know where it was. In this state he met a woman in the street and asked her where he could get a night's lodging, as he was without friends. She led him to the house where he was found, after having remained there nearly a week in such a state that he cannot now remember distinctly what transpired, although the woman says he ate and drank, asked a blessing, prayed, etc.

The foregoing contains the substance of a long letter, narrating very minutely all the circumstances of the case—so minutely, and in such a way, as to produce a conviction, we think, upon all candid minds, that the narration is true. The following paragraph closes the letter:—

"And now in view of the past, I can say with Job, 'For the thing which I greatly feared, has come upon me, and that of which I was afraid, is come unto me.' I have fallen, and keenly feeling this, I am willing to lie prostrate in the dust where this fall has put me. I do not presume to say that I am not to blame. I was to blame to go with a stranger; but when he spoke of my being too proud, I do not know but I would have gone anywhere with him. But still I was to blame. I may be considered also to blame for getting that brandy, and giving way to my desires for it; but if bitter tears of repentance, and earnest prayers for forgiveness, for that of which I might have been guilty while under strong excitement, will avail through the mercy of Christ, I shall be forgiven. To the Temperance friends I am willing to bow; I am willing to be called the meanest of all engaged in the great cause; I am willing to bear with meekness their censure. To my brethren in the church, I am willing they should do with me, and by me, as they in their judgment may decide, submitting to them in all things as they will. To those who may be prejudiced against me, I blame you not for disbelieving my statement. I blame you not for all that you may say against me. By God's help I will endeavor so to live that you will respect me, and by more earnest prayer and watchfulness, so to maintain my integrity that I shall win your confidence. To those Editors of papers who have mentioned my sad case with sympathy and consideration, I can say that gratitude is a little word for my feelings toward you. In the bitter cup there are some mercy drops; my life is spared, my reason is spared. The hearts of my friends are not shut up against me. For these mercies I trust I feel thankful; and whatever may be my future situation in life, I pray God that I may so live as to honor the profession that I have made; that I may be more humble, feel more my dependence on God, and by his grace become a more firm, consistent, uncompromising foe to strong drink, in all its forms, than I ever have been before."

BOSTON BAPTIST ASSOCIATION.—This Association has just held its 34th anniversary. We learn from the Christian Watchman, that the returns from the churches present a result for which probably no parallel can be found in the history of the Association. About 70 have been added by baptism, while 158 have been excluded from the churches for heresies and immoralities. Only one church reported a revival during the year. In this church, the spirit of liberality, and the amount of benevolent contributions, had greatly increased, while in some others the contributions had decreased.

MESSENGER OF THE EASTERN ASSOCIATION.—At a meeting of the Association, Eld. Walter B. Gillett was appointed a Messenger to visit the churches in New England during the associational year. We have received a letter from him, informing us that he is now engaged in the work, and has visited the church at Newport, R. I., and the brethren in that vicinity. After having preached a number of times, and become somewhat familiar with the condition of the society at Newport, he thinks that field an important one, which ought to be cultivated. We are glad to learn that he finds so much to interest and encourage him.

THE REFORM MOVEMENT IN GERMANY.—By the last steamer we learn that Ronge and his followers are continuing their career, with alternate success and defeat. At one place the leader of the movement came near being assassinated while preaching against Rome. The Government is alarmed at the aspect the business is assuming; and has accordingly given orders that the preachers of the new faith shall not be admitted into the Protestant chapels, and that newspapers, with a few exceptions, shall refrain from writing about it. In some of the minor Duchies the same proceedings have been adopted, and in Austria they were adopted months ago.

PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CONVENTION.—The Annual Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church for the Diocese of Eastern New York, commenced its sessions last week. As was expected, the subject of Bishop Onderdonk's suspension came up at the outset, and has continued before the Convention, in one form or another, up to the present time. The first division was upon the election of a Chairman. Two candidates, a high-churchman and a low-churchman, were nominated. After considerable balloting, Dr. Creighton, a Puseyite, was elected. The votes showed, that a majority of the clergy were in favor of the Bishop, and a majority of the laity opposed to him. The result of the Convention's deliberations is not yet known.

P. S. On Tuesday evening the week's scenes of discord and contention were brought to a close by laying aside the whole subject of the Bishop's suspension for the purpose of allowing the Convention to adjourn without day.

DISCONTINUANCE AND CHANGE.—The Morning Chronicle, the daily anti-slavery paper published in Boston by Rev. Joshua Leavitt, has been discontinued. The Emancipator, the weekly paper made up from the Chronicle, has been sold to H. Cummings, who is to continue to publish it under the care of the former editor. The embarrassment which makes this change necessary, has resulted from a want of punctuality in paying for the Emancipator—the low price at which the paper has been furnished—and the operation of the new post-office law.

FREDERICK DOUGLASS.

We noticed some weeks ago the departure of this self-emancipated American slave for England. He went out in one of the Cunard steamers, where he was compelled, in deference to American prejudice, to take a steerage passage. A letter from one of the Hutchinson Family, now in England, mentions some interesting incidents of his outward voyage. There were among the passengers several slaveholders and a few 'doughfaces,' who were very much offended with the Captain for allowing him free access to all parts of the vessel except the saloon. Frederick is said to have behaved with great propriety, modesty and dignity, and to have won the admiration of a large number of the passengers. Being an intimate friend of the Hutchinson Family, he frequently walked with them and others on the quarter deck, and participated with as much freedom as his position would allow in the social intercourse of the passengers generally. Mr. Hutchinson thus describes a scene which occurred on the last day of the voyage:—

The Captain, with many other gentlemen, and some ladies, learning that Douglass was a good speaker, were excited to hear him. He was accordingly invited to speak on the promenade deck, and consented. Due notice was given, and, lo! when the time came the "American Slave" came forward, and after making a few introductory remarks, opened a small book and began to read the code of slave-laws in South Carolina. This was more than the Americans could bear. The disturbance was commenced by a Connecticut Yankee—A MEMBER OF THE BAPTIST CHURCH, and who meant, as he said, to carry out his Christian principles! He interrupted by disputing every sentence which was read. Frederick stopped, after a while, and asked the audience whether he should go on. Then came "the tug of war." This Yankee Baptist was backed up by the slave-mongers, while Douglass was sustained by the Englishmen. And all that the cool heads could do was hardly sufficient to prevent a scene of bloodshed. The Captain was very cool at first, but finding himself grossly insulted by a slaveholder from New Orleans, (who made his boast that he "owned a hundred and thirty niggers,") he (the Captain) ordered the boatswain to "call the watch," and have three pairs of irons ready at a moment's warning. He then addressed himself to the audience about as follows:

"Gentlemen, I was once the owner of two hundred slaves. If I had them now I should not be obliged to follow the sea. But they were liberated, and it was right. Frederick Douglass may speak. I am Captain of this ship."

Frederick, however, saw fit not to go on, but retired to the steerage; for there was a terrible commotion among the passengers, some crying "throw the nigger overboard," one saying, "I wish I had that nigger in Cuba, I'd show him what belongs to niggers," and the man from New Orleans was about ready to go into fits. And I think he would have done something of the kind had not the command from the Captain, "have the irons ready," cooled him off some. We thus had, what some of us had never had before, a fair "development" of Southern blood when stirred up by the sword of truth.

General Intelligence.

War among the Mormons.—A letter from Warsaw, Ill., dated Sept. 17, gives the following account of the origin of the difficulties in the Mormon district which have led to civil war and bloodshed :—

The citizens, under style of Anti-Mormons, have determined to drive the Mormons out of the County. The first difficulty commenced in Adams County, which adjoins Hancock, in what is known as Morley Settlement, or precinct. In this quarter, which is near the town of Lima, a party has been out burning the Mormon houses, barns, stacks, &c.

In this war of extermination, they include not only the Mormons, but all who are suspected of favoring the Mormon cause, or of harboring Mormons about them. The reports vary very much as to the number of houses burned. At Quincy, the number was stated at from fifty to sixty ; but I think this a large estimate. The anti-Mormons, I am told, are divided into two companies. One is known as the "Fire and Sword" Company—whose duty it is to set fire to Mormon buildings, and drive the occupants off. The other division act as spies and guards, generally not appearing or taking a very prominent part. I am told that a company of the "Fire and Sword" were out in the Morley Settlement on Saturday, and on their return they reported that they had burnt thirty-three houses, and had got through before supper. At Quincy, it was reported that among the buildings burned was a mill, and that in a conflict between the parties one or two of the Mormons were killed, and three or four wounded."

Mr. Worrell, a merchant at Carthage, and a Lieutenant of the Carthage Greys, who had command on the day of the murder of Jo. and Hyrum Smith, was shot by the Mormons on Monday, a ball entering his breast, and killing him almost instantly.

The St. Louis Republican of the 20th Sept. contains the following, from which it seems there is a prospect that the difficulties may be adjusted :—

The Twelve Elders, or principal men of the Mormons, have addressed a proposition to the Antis, which was received this evening, and which, I trust, may put a final end to this war. The Twelve propose that they will leave Nauvoo and the county next Spring, provided hostilities are suspended and the vexatious suits which they charge the Antis to have instituted against them, are withdrawn, and they are allowed peacefully to dispose of their property and prepare for their removal. They have appointed a committee of five to correspond with a committee of an equal number on the part of the old settlers.

The Editor of the Republican thinks from a careful observation that from 60 to 100 houses have been destroyed by the Anti-Mormons.

Melancholy Suicide.—The Lexington, (Ky.) Observer of the 24th of September says:—Our city was thrown into great consternation yesterday morning by the intelligence from Richmond, that Hon. John White, of that place, had on Monday evening committed suicide by blowing out his brains with a pistol. The intelligence was the more startling from the character of the distinguished dead. He was cool, determined, self possessed, brave ; and an act of this kind would have been expected as soon from any one in our State as from John White. We have no further particulars than that some time in the forenoon of Monday he told his family that he would retire to his room, and wished to be private—not to be interrupted. He did so, and about 3 o'clock the report of a pistol was heard, and upon going into the room it was found that he had put an end to his existence by placing a pistol against his right temple, and blowing a ball through his head. Pecuniary embarrassment is assigned as the cause, though nothing had been discovered when our informant left, which indicated the reason.

Mr. White was at the time of his death, Judge of the 19th Judicial District, to which station he was appointed by Gov. Owsley just before the termination of the last session of Congress. He represented the district in which he resided for the last ten years in the Congress of the United States, and presided as Speaker over the 27th Congress. He was a man of good talents and attainments, generons and noble, and was in an eminent degree endeared to a very large circle of acquaintances and friends. He has left an amiable wife and several interesting children to lament the loss of a husband, father, protector. May Providence watch over and protect them in their bereaved and melancholy condition.

Great Robbery.—The New York papers of last Sunday contain accounts of an extensive robbery. It seems that a Mr. Reuben Rowley, an elderly gentleman from Wrentham, Mass., left his home on Friday afternoon, and took the Stonington cars, from which he took passage in the steamer Massachusetts for this city. Mr. Rowley had in his pocketbook $27,800 in Massachusetts State Bank bills, which he intended to invest in stocks on arriving in this city. Some time during the passage Mr. Rowley very imprudently took out his money and counted it several times. Saturday morning, when within about fifty miles of the city, Mr. Rowley was accosted by a genteel looking man who claimed acquaintance with him and gave his name as Mr. Southgate. Mr. Rowley did not know him, but as he seemed very sociable, entered into conversation with him. After conversing a while Southgate, who held some peaches in his hand, offered one to Mr. Rowley, which he accepted and ate. Soon after eating it, however, he was seized with a violent pain and griping in the stomach, which caused him to go below and lie down. When the pain had subsided, Mr. Rowley fell into a deep sleep, from which he did not awake until about one hour after the boat had reached the wharf. On feeling in his pocket he found that his pocket-book and all his money was gone. Mr. Rowley offers a reward of $3,000 for the arrest of the rogue and the recovery of the property.

Respect for the dead.—In Paris, when a corpse is carried through the streets, every person who meets it, from the king to the scavenger, takes off his hat and keeps it off till the mournful hearse has passed. Indeed, many persons not only uncover themselves, but instantly drop on their knees on these occasions. The last is rather too much ; but the respectful acknowledgment first alluded to of the presence of the saddened train bearing to their long home, is a practice that we would rather see copied than derided.

Steamboat Explosion.—The New Orleans papers of Sept. 28 contain the following :—

On the 12th inst. the steamer Dayton burst her boilers when about half way between Corpus Cristi and St. Joseph's Island. There were between thirty and forty persons on board, including United States soldiers and the hands attatched to the boat. Ten individuals were killed on the spot, including among them Lieuts. Wiggins and Berry of the 4th regiment of infantry. Seventeen were wounded, some of whom were not expected to survive their injuries. Captain Crossman, the Quarter Master, was on board, together with two other officers. They were blown to the distance of one hundred yards, but were not severely injured. Cap. C. had one of his legs somewhat bruised, but the next day was able to walk and attend to his business.

A Praiseworthy Act.—Capt. Pierce, of the whaling ship General Pike, which arrived at this port on Saturday from the South Pacific Ocean, brought with him an English family, consisting of John Florence, his wife, and two daughters, 20 and 22 years of age, to whom he had offered a refuge and protection on board of his vessel from the exterminating warfare of the natives at Vangaroa, New Zealand. The colonists at Vangaroa, about forty in number, with the exception of this family, had previously fled, Mr. Florence being prevented from doing so in consequence of the severe illness of one of his daughters. Capt. Pierce states that with the exception of Auckland, the capital of New Zealand, the natives had completely routed the European colonists and obtained possession of the Island. They were making preparations to attack Auckland. The island comprises an extent of about 500 miles and includes about fourteen European settlements. The Bay of Islands, formerly the seat of government, contained previously to the attack of the natives a population of about 3,000, mostly English. The population of Auckland, we believe, is about 4,000.

The Sword Defeated.—Recent accounts from the Polish frontier mention a strange attempt at conversion, with appropriate results. The Russian Government dispatched several ministers of the Greek church to a village in Lithuania in order to convert the peasantry. These worthy prelates were supported by a detachment consisting of an officer and 40 soldiers. The peasantry, however, inveigled the priests into a forest and murdered them. They then set fire to the barn in which the soldiers were quartered, and threw into the flames all who attempted to escape.

Watches wanting Owners.—Officer House made an arrest, Monday, of a blackleg by the name of Wm. Heuchman, alias McNevin, who came here in company with two other chaps of the same stamp, and two women. They all subsequently effected their escape, but whilst in the Constable's custody, the fellow above-named was searched, and two gentlemen's and one lady's gold watch were found upon him, of which he was dispossessed. The women had a good deal of jewelry in their trunks. The watches were probably stolen at Utica during the Fair, and the owners, on proving property, can recover the same.

Those having lost watches, and wishing particulars, will address Sylvester House, (post paid) Syracuse.

It is a remarkable fact that bees, this year, so far as we can learn, says the Hartford Times, have almost universally refused to swarm, and in some instances, after filling their hives, they have commenced laying up store on the outside. Such extraordinary conduct of these weather-wise and provident insects, it is thought, indicates a winter of unusual length and severity.

The Tribuue has an article on the condition of the ten thousand women who make a poor subsistence by means of their needles, during a few months of the year, being obliged during the dull seasons to seek aid from the almshouse commissioners. By inquiry, it says it has been ascertained that these women make only from 12 1-2 to 37 1-2 cents per day ; out of this miserable allowance they are obliged to pay from 2 to $4 per month rent. Entering into detail, the writer in the Tribune shows the prices paid for some kinds of work, as for instance, for making common shirts, 6 cents each ; good cotton shirts, with linen bosoms, 25 cents ; duck trowsers and overalls, 10 cents ; satinet pants, lined and sometimes with gaiter bottoms, 18 cents ; vests, 25 to 50 cents ; cloth roundabouts and pea jackets, 25 to 50 cents. These women are generally Americans, who prefer virtue, even under such pitable circumstances, to the ease which they can only procure by a sacrifice of that jewel. [N. Y. Paper.

NOTICE.

The regular time for the quarterly meeting of the Board of Directors of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association, is the 12th inst. ; but in consequence of the Yearly Meeting of the Sabbath-keeping Churches in New Jersey occurring at New Market a few days subsequent, the brethren have judged it better to postpone the meeting until the 20th inst. to afford opportunity for the attendance of a larger number of the Board and other brethren to counsel with them on the affairs of the Society, specially respecting the appointment of candidates who have offered themselves for a mission to Eastern Africa. The Board, therefore, will meet at the meeting-house in New Market, on the second day of the week following said Yearly Meeting, at 10 o'clock A. M. Samuel Davison, Cor. Sec.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' SEMINARY.

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, Principal, and Professor of Languages.
Ira Sayles, Associate Principal, and Professor of Mathematics
Gurdon Evans, Professor of Natural Sciences.
J. R. Hartshorn, Professor of Anatomy and Physiology.
O. Stillman, Professor of Vocal and Instrumental Music.
Miss C. B. Maxson. Preceptress, Instructress in French, Italian, Drawing and Painting.
Mrs. M. B. Kenyon, Assistant in the Female Department.

From the very liberal patronage extended to this Institution during the past seven years, the Trustees have been induced to make arrangements for greatly increasing its facilities. The Chemical, Philosophical, Astronomical, and Mathematical apparatus is amply sufficient for a full illustration of the different departments of those Sciences. The apparatus will be farther increased at the commencement of the ensuing Fall Term, by the introduction of whatever may be necessary in other Sciences than those above mentioned, especially, by a MANIKIN of the most approved structure, now being imported from Paris, expressly for this Institution. This will enable the student of Physiology and Anatomy to pursue his studies with advantages nearly equal to those afforded by an actual subject, having this farther advantage of being divested of all those revolting circumstances ever attendant on the dissecting room.

The Teachers' Classes, as usual, will be exercised in practical teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective Instructors. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. Daily Lectures will also be given during the Fall and Winter Terms ; and the public may be assured that this department of the Institution shall be conducted upon the principles of the best regulated Normal Schools, in this, or any other country.

Finally, the proprietors pledge themselves, that the reputation of this Institution shall be sustained by the introduction of whatever may be necessary to meet the demands of an intelligent public.

The Institution is liberally endowed and subject to the visitation of the Regents.

Its Library is choice and extensive, and accessible, also, to all the students gratis.

The Academic Year for 1845—6 consists of three Terms, as follows:—The First, commencing Wednesday August 13, 1845, and ending Thursday, November 20. The Second, commencing Wednesday, November 26, and ending Thursday, March 6, 1846. The Third, commencing Wednesday, March 25, and ending Thursday, July 2.

Expenses.—Tuition, per term, from $3 50 to $5 00. Board, per week, $1 00. Piano, (extra,) per term, $10 00. Washing, lights and fuel, per term, from $2 00 to $5 00. The entire expenses for an Academic Year, including board, washing, lights, fuel and tuition, (except on the Piano,) need not exceed $70 00 ; and may even be reduced much below this, where individuls board themselves, either separately or in clubs. For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense. SAMUEL RUSSELL,
President of the Board of Trustees

WAKE, OH SOUL!

BY WILLIAM OLAND BOURNE.

GIRD thine armor on anew,
Oh, my soul! thy strength renew—
Life hath earnest work to do.

Sport is past for lab'ring men—
Sport for them romps not again—
Life's more meaning now than then!

Press ye on to meet the trial!
Where ease-scorning Self-Denial
Points to Time's corroding dial!

Watch the moments—how they fly!
Watch the minutes fleeting by—
Watch the hours that quickly die.

Moments give a birth to thought—
Minutes shape some vasty plot—
Hours complete what they have wrought.

Turn them all to golden sands!
Keep them present in thy hands,
Till "redeemed" they break their bands.

Deep within thy being's wells,
Cast thy gaze, and learn what swells
From the heart's empurpled cells.

Be they strong resolves of right?
Be they clarion calls to fight?
Be they beamings through the night?

Be they yearnings for the time?
Be they glory in the rime?
Be they love and truth sublime?

Wear thy life with sterner aim!
Sink not, though dishonor, shame,
Seek to blight thy guiltless name.

He who e'er unflinching stands—
He who dares the serried bands,
Best fulfils the truth's commands.

Round the portals of the soul,
Error's deep, hoarse murmurs roll,
Prestige of the future's toll.

Yet be firm! Maintain the right—
Day will follow after night—
Victory cometh by the fight.

Fill thy destiny, nor yield
When thy duty is revealed
On the Age's crowded field.

Faith be thy bright morning ray—
Hope thy comrad on the way;
Truth thy sun at close of day.

Christian! so these teachings learn,
That thy heart with fire may burn,
And thy soul to heaven may turn.

LETTER FROM ALVAN STEWART.

Dear Bailey,—I cannot forego a brief account of a recent journey, from which I returned this week, to the northern part of Vermont, bordering on Canada line, where my four sisters reside. I make an annual pilgrimage to visit them.

I happened to leave Troy on the morning the shilling boats ran the 70 miles from Troy to Whitehall, on Lake Champlain, through the Northern Canal. I found myself on one of our very ~~hot days, thermometer at 90 deg~~ Farenheit, with 120 gentlemen and ladies, crowded into one of the narrow Packets. As night approached, we learned there would be no berth for sleeping, as we were a dense mass of living flesh, which filled the boat.

But to mitigate its horrors, two Methodist ministers of the Northern part of New York Conference, one about 65 and the other about 45, were found in the middle of the boat, in the fore-part of the night, making loud assertions against modern liberty party abolitionists, while they justified slaveholders and southern institutions. The younger one, though a man of some talents, seemed a pro-slavery fanatic, so bitter in his soul against abolitionists, that, had his powers been equal to his malice, there would not have been one of us left unburied, whether dead or alive. I first took them for slaveholders pedling the peculiar institutions of the South, in small quantities at the North, to suit purchasers. The first question I put to them, was, is slavery right, or wrong? They both replied, and often asserted, they would not answer that question; that had nothing to do with the question; but they said the question was, what shall we do with the slaves? I pressed these men repeatedly to answer my question, is slavery right, or is it wrong? But they said they would not answer me. I then told them if slavery was right, we had nothing to do about it, and had no business to intermeddle with it; and it seemed to me (as I by this time discovered they were clergymen and the whole boat was listening,) that in men at their time of life, as professed teachers of the entire word of God, the spiritual fathers and teachers of the land, that for them to refuse to let us know whether it is right to steal men and women from Africa. and in chains bring them to our soil, and sell them like brutes, work them without wages, and keep them on the most wretched and scanty fare, and work them in the burning sun under the gashing lash, and if the master pleased, as he often did, to sell children from their parents, and a wife from her husband, and deprive them from the Bible, and all the lights of immortality, except a selfish ungodly religion, which was preached to them, saying, "slaves obey your masters, God commands it, for slavery is an institution of God, and if you, the slave, wish to go to Heaven, you must work as hard as you can spring for the master, and be careful and never steal any of your master's pigs, chickens, corn, or watermelons." Cannot you inform us, Sirs, said I, whether such an institution of robbery of God's poor children is right or wrong, or not; or is it too deep for you to decide? They answered they would not say, whether it was right or wrong. Then for the first time, they had reason to learn both the wickedness and meanness of their position by an overwhelming laugh of contempt which saluted their ears, from the audience. I then stated that there was not a minister in the entire South, who dare preach the most important essential truths of Christianity to the slaves! Oh! said they, the ministers of the South do not preach politics to the slaves. That I replied, was the reason they did not preach the whole gospel. Why, is the gospel a political gospel? said they, or one of them. Yes, said I, it is, and I am sorry you do not know it. The first great elementary political rights, are also religious ones; that a man owns his own body and soul, has the right to appropriate and enjoy the faculties of that soul and body, and is bound to enlighten that mind; the man has a political and religious right to his wife, and the wife the same to her husband; and these parents have a political right to train up their children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. Children obey your parents, is a command of God; and is a political right of these parents to exact obedience; but slavery says no, obey your masters. The right of worshipping God according to the dictates of your own conscience is one of the greatest of political rights—that alone, enjoyed by the slave, would set him free, for there is no slave but feels his right of conscience violated, in serving a master as a slave, by force. Finally, after a great deal of Jesuitical pettifogging on the subject, evincing trick, and heartless devices to delude, they said they were opposed to slavery in the abstract. On which, I asked them if they were opposed to the toothache, in the abstract? An overwhelming laugh. They were angry, and insinuated that this was no comparison at all, and that the audience were not well-bred! They then said they would preach Jesus Christ and Him crucified to the slave. To that I replied, that is the correct doctrine, for everlasting justice was the fundamental of Christ's religion. The younger priest arose and in a rage said, there was no such thing in the Bible—Paul did not say so, Christ did not say so, and that I was wiser than Paul and Christ. The audience cried, shame, horror, shame on such priests and such a religion, and this priest went muttering, in a passion, on deck to get fresh air. "Whatsoever ye would men," &c., I supposed proved the justice of Christ's religion. Much was said in two hours between me and these wicked apologists for slavery—enough to make a small book. But I will say, I never saw an audience so rapidly converted to truth as this audience was, by the shameful absurdities of these ministers, until these two men might fairly and candidly have been said to have renounced the great corner-stone truths of Christianity, to bolster up the abhorred system of slavery. Terrible thought, that a man should strip God of his glorious attributes, in order to make the Devil respectable!

A little before day-light, we left the Packet and went on board the steamer Saranac, at Whitehall, and at 8 A. M. of that day, at breakfast, while passing over the military classic waters of Champlain, near Ticonderoga ruins, a conversation broke out at the table as to the cause of Washington falling into the hands of the British in the summer of 1814, in the late war: when I replied, it was slavery which was the source of our weakness, disgrace and defeat on this painful occasion. Two well dressed men, who turned out to be slaveholders, one from Georgia and the other from Virginia, informed us that no part of our country was better prepared to resist an enemy than a slave State, as slaves loved their masters so well, they would fight bravely for them. I felt obliged to deny that this was the history of the country. That our people, with more men than the British, the President of the United States, Mr. Madison, the Secretary of War and Heads of Departments, with several thousand of the best marksmen in America, gathered from ten miles square and the adjacent States of Maryland and Virginia, who met the British Commodore with his liberty sailors at Bladensburgh—our men retreated over sandhill after sandhill and the President at their head, with the best opportunity to have met and conquered these sailors, but our men retreated to Washington city and broke in perfect confusion, each man fleeing to his home, leaving the Capitol to be sacked, burned and plundered without resistance. Gen. Smith of Georgetown, D. C., told me, in 1818, while passing over this very ground in a journey I was taking to Washington city, he commanded a Brigade in this fleeing army of ours, and that the secret of our disgraceful flight was, that a story had been circulated through the District and adjacent counties of the two States, that on that day the slaves were to rise and assert their liberty; and that each man more feared the enemy he had left behind in the shape of a slave, in his own house or plantation, than he did any thing else. The officer and soldier had their minds distracted with the possibility of this insurrection, said Gen. Smith, and therefore fled to their homes before an inferior force, and left Washington to the mercy of its captors. In the Revolution, South Carolina, I think in 1777, sent a committee to the Continental Congress, apologizing for not furnishing the quota of conscription of troops designated by Congress for that State, for fear that their slaves would arise and assert their liberty, when they discovered the weakness of the whites, after sending forward their legal war-contingent to the war of Independence. Where would have been the victory the same autumn of '77, at Saratoga, or our finally acknowledged Independence, if all had been in the position of South Carolina? Slavery alone would have made the whites slaves of England for the sake of American whites enslaving the men of Africa. There was a great deal said between us. For the Virginian, I drew a contrast between the State of New York and Virginia. In 1790, Virginia, with one-third more territory, with the finest soil and the most beautiful climate on earth, had 70,000 inhabitants. The State of New York 300,000 people. Now Virginia, 130,000 or 140,000, and New York, 2,600,000—double the population—and the city of New York could buy and sell Virginia alone, and they might throw in North Carolina into the bargain, such was the curse of slave labor, and prosperity of honored free labor. I proposed to make a slave of the Georgian on the spot, as it was probable I was the strongest according to his own principles, and inquired for the objection and what he had to say, why I should not make a slave of him, on the spot. He said that would be wrong, as he was a white man; but would be right to enslave an African, although he was only a 48th part African, and the other 47 parts were Anglo-Saxon. The people raised a shout at his proposition, which told him he was on the beautiful, free waters of Champlain instead of the slave-bound Savannah.

On my return on Monday, I came 27 miles by 10 A. M., to Burlington and then passed up the Lake to Whitehall, where at half past 5 P. M., a most respectable body of men and women, between 70 and 80, went on board the Canal Packet to Troy. We were packed away quite densely in the boat; and after dark the Captain, to my surprise came and said, I heard your combat with the Methodist clergymen, when you went up and I wish you to speak on the subject of slavery in order to pass the time. I told him, I was unwell and had been so used up, with the hot weather, that I could not do it. He asked me a second time, and I for the same reason declined. We had ladies and gentlemen from Boston, New Bedford, and 10 or 12 English gentlemen from Montreal, several from New York, and various parts. Mr. Randall, an old sea captain and a gentleman of wealth from New Bedford, moved that Mr. Stewart be requested to speak, and it appeared carried by an almost unanimous aye, with the exception of two male noes and one female. And these three noes were two slaveholders from Virginia, and the woman a West India Cuban slaveholder. And to this strong invitation I replied, I did not feel able to speak, and declined. These slaveholders at this point spoke, and said, as much, it was well he had declined, for they had paid their money, on the boat, and were not to be disturbed by abolition. Upon that, a gentleman moved that all who desired to hear Mr. Stewart speak should rise up. Every gentleman and lady in the cabin arose as with a hasty spring, except the three slaveholders. Upon that, I arose and thanked the firm and pertinacious friends of liberty of speech. I stated I would now speak as my right had been denied by these slaveholders. Upon that these slaveholding men protested, I should not speak; if I did, they would leave the boat and complain to the company. I seated myself for a moment, and the audience took them in hand; and such a tongue-dressing as those scamps got from the gentlemen present, should be a caution to such ill-bred creatures in time to come. The friends of the freedom of speech said to them, do you mean to padlock us as you do your slaves? If we wish to discuss geography, politics, agriculture, religion, slavery or abolition, are you three beings to sit here and tell us seventy people, what we may or may not say, and when? You are most wretchedly mistaken, if you expect to apply your plantation discipline to this boat, and as to your getting out of the boat in the night, that you may do; and as to your threatening that you will tell the proprietors of the boat and the world we defy your impotent malice—there are men on board of this boat who believe in free discussion of all things, whc could buy and sell all the slaveholders who ever did or ever will pass over these waters. Do you think, said one of the audience, if a boat-load of slaveholders on the Savannah, Ga., River, wished to discuss the inimitable justice of working men, women and children under the lash, without wages, and it was opposed to three travelers from Vermont, or New York, as a disagreeable question to them to hear, would the slaveholders be silent? No. The probability is they would commit murder by throwing the three men overboard to drown. I being seated, must say I never saw our principles vindicated more practically in my life, and those two men and the woman were perfectly demolished.

The audience said, Mr. Stewart go on, and as I arose again, they gave three tremendous cheers. I spoke 40 minutes. I drew a picture by comparison between New York and Virginia and the Carolinas, showed our prosperity, riches and glory, of the poverty, misery, smallness of population, ignorance of their people, the whipping out labor without wages, the petit-larceny course of things and the vast districts of forsaken and slave-cursed land, where the fox climbs into the window, and the deer bounds in the thicket of a second wilderness, where, seventy years ago, might have been found the piratical hospitality of those who gave away what they never earned. At this point the slaveholders hissed me. Ah, said I, that hiss shows the malice of the serpent, the intelligence and bravery of the goose. The audience gave a most powerful cheer and made all their canes rattle with approbation. Whereupon one of these creatures said, "you (meaning me) are an ass," Ah, said I, a man who is agitated, will always speak of his nearest connexions, and that this fellow had better have been silent rather than to have conferred upon the poor speaker a title which had so long been considered the brightest jewel in the crown of this slaveholder's race, and that from Balaam's ass their great ancestor, who once spoke, to the one you have just heard, there has been an articulate bray in the family when any one wished to raise a man, who was a slave, above the long eared brute.

There was another mighty roar of three times three, from the audience, which made these fellows get up and go upon deck, where one of them came and stamped with all his might directly over my head—upon this, the Captain darted up and silenced him at once. The audience were greatly enraged at this last indignity. I spoke till bed-time; and when I dismissed, I never saw an audience more indignant at slaveholders and their institutions, and the conduct of these men had done infinitely more than I could to confirm their hatred of slavery and their abominable cruelties toward their fellow men. This was the topic of conversation until we separated.

You will excuse the length of this letter, and believe me, as ever, yours, &c.

ALVAN STEWART.

KEEPING PUMPKINS.—Pumpkins for stock are best kept in a dry loft with the flooring quite open, so as to allow air to circulate as freely as possible between them. Were it not that they take so much room, we should prefer storing them in a single tier; but usually, for want of this, when a large crop is to be secured, they must be piled upon each other. In this case, we would recommend their not being placed more than three or four deep. If piled together in too large heaps they gather moisture and rot rapidly. When frozen they may be preserved a long time; but they should be cooked before giving them to the stock, otherwise they may do them great injury. On the whole we prefer feeding our pumpkins as fast as possible after ripening, and before the cold weather sets in. They are of a cool watery nature, and unless cooked, we doubt whether they are near as beneficial to animals in frosty weather, as they are in milder, or indeed any kind of fruit or root, though stock of a good breed usually do well upon them.

CHRISTIAN INTERCOURSE.

"Then they that feared the Lord spake often one to another.

"Speak often" of the Saviour's love,
While here on earth ye meet,
'Twill 'mind thee of thy home above,
'Twill make life's ills more fleet;
'Twill bind with cords divinely strong
Each sympathetic breast—
Be Christ the subject of each song,
In toils, or quiet rest.

"Speak often" of that love so high,
With earth's heroic deeds;
Though for a friend earth's sons may die,
Here suffering love exceeds—
He pours His soul out unto death,
For those who scorned His name;
Adoring, spend each fleeting breath,
That mercy to proclaim.

Speak of it, when ye chance to meet,
Amid life's busy din,
Or wild confusion of the street—
Thou mayst a spirit win,
On Calvary's summit to behold
How truth and mercy met;
Thus shall thy words, like fruits of gold,
In silver flowers be set.

"Speak often," God a record keeps
Of all thy suffering fears,
Though time's dark shade o'er memory creeps,
When He at last appears,
Ye shall be found, as radiant gems,
In his triumphal crown;
Or in his hand, as diadems,
His love hath made His own.

Our Leader.

"God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of Christ," was the language of the Apostle Paul; and when we consider the life of the Apostle, we may rest assured that in Christ there was something "whereof to glory." The sacrifices of wealth, place, and popularity which he made, the untiring efforts he used, to extend the name of Christ; the disinterested benevolence that characterized all his actions; and above all, the plainness with which he preached Christ, all go to prove that he gloried in none other.

And from the character of our Christ we may learn rich and useful lessons, especially adapted to this wicked and preverse generation; lessons which will encourage us in the great work of reformation, and hold out to us motives for unwearied faithfulness in proclaiming and practicing the purest doctrines of Christ. Let us think on the power of our Saviour, and upon the works which are ascribed unto him. He is the creator of all things, all things were made by him and without him was not anything made that is made. Survey that vast body of light and heat that flames in the Heavens by day, and the moon and stars which burn at his bidding by night. Think of Him who holds the winds in his fists and the waters in the hollow of his hand; who has meted out heaven with a span, and comprehended the dust of the earth in a measure, weighed the mountains in scales and the hills in a balance; who keeps in nice order all the planetary system, supports and feeds all animated nature, and upholds all things by the word of his power. Turn to his amazing miracles. Behold! at his command the blind receive their sight, withered hands are healed, leprous bodies are cleansed, and the dead are raised to life. The world is subdued, and sin is prostrated before him; devils tremble at his approach and flee away, and death, the conqueror of all living, at his command quietly resigns all power and dominion.—The power of Christ is evident in conquering man's rebellious will, and converting him from disobedience to righteousness, holiness, and peace. Take as examples, Matthew the publican, Zacheus the extortioner, and Mary Magdalen the captive of seven devils. Go to the grave of Lazarus, and there see Jesus' might, in bringing to life the slumbering dust of his friend. "Lazarus come forth," and at the command of our Lord, the dead are raised to life.

What then, my Christian friends, can we learn from the power of Christ? It teaches us not to faint under difficulties. Does the world frown upon you, be of good cheer I have overcome the world. Do the members of the flesh war against those of the spirit, and would they impede you in your passage to glory? "Be not weary in well doing for in due time ye shall reap if ye faint not." Does Satan rush in upon you like a flood. "The spirit of the Lord shall raise up a standard against him." Yea whosoever trusteth in the atonement of Christ, is upon that rock against which the gates of Hell shall not prevail. It teaches us lessons of courage if we are engaged in the spread of his kingdom.

"Our Captain never did a battle lose."

Who were our Lord's disciples, and against what had they to contend? They were men of feeble circumstances and little human learning, and arrayed against them in one vast phalanx, was Heathen philosophy, Jewish superstition, long established Idolatory, rich and wicked men, and highly infuriated devils; but did they fail? Were they driven from the field and annihilated? Let the facts of history speak. They preached the truth faithfully and fearlessly. "The word run and was multiplied," churches were planted, and immortal blood-bought souls brought to Christ. And although we can not rejoice now in such abundant prosperity as we could wish, yet there is much cause for joy; one soul is worth a world; could we enter the place of the damned, and ask a lost sinner if his soul was worth a world, he would tell us a hundred, a thousand worlds would he give if he could only escape the death that never dies. Let us then, one and all, come up to the help of the Lord against the mighty, and wherever we may go, and upon whatever work we may be employed, let us

"Go in the name of God,
Depend upon his power,
Faithfully speak his word
Expect a fruitful shower,
Then God will condescend his work to bless,
And crown our humble efforts with success.

GETTING POOR ON RICH LAND, AND RICH ON POOR LAND.—A close observer of men and things, says the Ohio Cultivator, told us the following little history, which we hope will plow very deeply into the attention of all who plow very shallow in their soils:

Two brothers settled together in ——— county. One of them on a cold, ugly, clay soil, covered with black-jack oak, not one of which was large enough to make a half dozen rails. This man would never drive any but large, powerful Conastoga horses, some seventeen hands high. He always put three horses to a large plow, and plunged it in some ten inches deep. This deep plowing he invariably practiced and cultivated thoroughly afterwards. He raised his seventy bushels of corn to the acre.

This man had a brother about six miles off, settled on a rich White River bottom land farm, and, while a black-jack clay soil yielded seventy bushels to the acre, this fine bottom land would not average fifty. One brother was steadily growing rich on poor land, and the other steadily growing poor on rich land.

One day the bottom land brother came down to see the black-jack oak farmer, and they began to talk about their crops and farms, as farmers are very apt to do.

"How is it," said the first, "that you manage on this poor soil to beat me in crops?"

The reply was: "I work my land."

That was it exactly. Some men have such rich land that they won't work it; and they never get a step beyond where they began. They rely on the soil, not on labor, or skill, or care. Some men expect their lands to work; and some men expect to work their land; and this just the difference between a good and a bad farmer.

WATER FOR CALVES.—Accident recently taught me what, till then, I did not know, viz: that calves, while fed on milk, need free access to water. I had supposed the milk (constituting their entire food) was enough without water. But in changing my calves from one pasture to another, they passed a water-trough, and drank heartily. I acted on the hint, and have since supplied them; and find they need water as often as cattle. No day passed without their using more or less. Perhaps every body else knew this; but least some may be as ignorant as I was, I thought best to speak a kind word for the calves, who cannot speak for themselves.

TOMATO WINE.—To one quart of tomato juice, add one pound of sugar, and if desired, a small quantity of the juice of the common grape. The Prairie Farmer recommends this wine as better, and much safer as a tonic, or for other medical uses, than the wines generally sold as Port Wines, &c., for such purposes. It is peculiarly adapted to some diseases and states of the system, and is particularly recommended for all derangements of the liver.

TEA CAKES.—Take one pound of flour, two teaspoonfuls of cream-of-tartar, one teaspoonfull of sub-carbonate of soda, one tablespoonfull of butter, and so much sweet milk as will be requisite to make a dough as stiff as pie-crust, knead it well, roll it out as thick as you can for short-cakes, cut them into round cakes, and bake on the griddle immediately—if they stand any time after being made they become heavy. These cakes are excellent, if the above recipe is strictly followed. They are delicious when cold, for those who prefer them.

WINTER FODDER.—Save a portion of your brightest and most succulent Oat Straw, to be mixed with your corn butts. A stratum of straw and a stratum of butts, with a due quantity of salt on the top of each, will secure to your cattle a luxury for which they will be thankful in the cold weather of the coming winter.

SCIENCE, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, LITERATURE, OR THE ARTS, passed the careful scrutiny and critical ordeal of an able committee of learned men, the work may be placed in the hands of the youth of the country without danger or distrust. The popularity of the work in England may be judged of from the fact that during the first year of its publication of the monthly parts were disposed of. In the United States too, the work has acquired no inconsiderable popularity.

MORE THAN 80,000 COPIES

The undersigned having purchased the Stereotype plates, with the Engravings, of the London edition of the above-named work, has commenced its republication in the city of New York. The whole work consists of about 4000 large imperial octavo pages, and is illustrated with 2000 Engravings. The Sabbath Recorder.

EDITED BY GEORGE B. UTTER. "THE SEVENTH DAY IS THE SABBATH OF THE LORD THY GOD." PUBLISHED AT NO. 9 SPRUCE ST.

THE SABBATARIAN CHURCH IN NEWPORT, R. I.

To visit the resting place of our pious ancestry, to retrace the scenes delineated by their genius, and note the effects of their labors of love within the sphere of their activity, can hardly fail of suggesting to the mind subjects of useful reflection. What son of New England, "following the course of empire westward," but feels the deepest solicitude for the institutions and life-scenes he leaves behind him. Those especially who value the social and religious arrangements of their own kindred, and know the influence of solemn covenant relations upon the tenderest sympathies of the heart, will not wonder at the tears which are sometimes shed when meeting, after a long absence, the aged friends of our youthful days, or when visiting, after their departure, the places that once knew them, and which are associated with scenes of our fondest recollection.

To us how spirit-stirring is the remembrance of the deeds of patriotism and philanthropy which are recorded of our zealous fathers who first settled and fostered the Colony of Rhode Island. We love to dwell upon the history of their acts, and to see the rising generation drink deep at the fountain of virtue and religion which so animated their spirits and sustained their hearts. Amid the scenes of social loveliness around them, there were sufferings for the truth's sake; and though ecclesiastical intolerance had driven them from the shores of their "Father-land," they were not fully set free from the spirit of opposition among themselves, or of persecution from the hands of the neighboring colonists, whose bigotry they were compelled to endure, and whose power too often bore heavily upon them.

Among the venerable men who sought religious freedom in the Colony of Rhode Island, were WILLIAM HISCOX, SAMUEL HUBBARD, STEPHEN MUMFORD, and ROGER BAXTER, who, with three sisters, formed the first Sabbath-keeping Church in America. Their zeal for the law of the Lord, and their devotion to gospel truth, gave them an influence which no doubt contributed much to lay the foundations of liberal institutions in this Colony. Puritanic superstition, delighting in traditionary falsehood, and choosing to teach for doctrine the commandments of men, was confronted by these witnesses for the blessed Sabbath, and though the popular argument was confounded, yet opposition was not withdrawn, and they were often made to feel the weight of power which a tyran*nical* majority could inflict. But though persecuted, they were not forsaken. They knew in whom they had trusted, and they put their confidence in the God of their salvation, whose law they had loved and vindicated.

The Church in Newport was formed in the year 1671. Sabbath-keepers had for some time previous been associated for the purpose of mutual edification and correspondence, though generally attached to existing churches observing the first day. William Hiscox was the first Pastor. There were many additions from time to time, some of the members residing at New London, Ct., and Westerly, R. I.

The following are among the items of interest obtained from a perusal of the records of this Church, beginning with 1692:—

"The third day of July, 1692, being the first day of the week, and the next day after ye Church of Rhode Island and Westerlie had broken bread, it was agreed by us, and appointed, that the Church break bread at Westerlie on the Sabbath following, fower weeks after that at Rhode Island, and so succeeding on forward once in eight weeks, at Westerlie and Rhode Island. Brother William Gibson was likewise desired by us at the same time to administer and dispense ye ordinance of our Lord at Westerlie according as occasion may require. It was then likewise by us appointed to meet at Westerlie as generally as we may, twelve weeks after this our last above mentioned breaking of bread.

The Church met July 30th, 1692; John Maxson, jr., and wife Judith joined the Church.

Church meeting at Westerly, Sept. ye 24th, 1692, Josa Maxson admitted to full communion.

May 28th, 1693, Bro. Hope Cove censured for neglecting his assembling with the congregation, and his dispensing the ordinance of baptism without the knowledge of the congregation.

24th of 1st month, 1694, met at Westerly. Jos. Maxson propounded and baptized same day.

A General Meeting at Westerly the 21st of 12th mo. 1694—kept a fast day.

The Church met at Newport, 17th day of June, 1697, and appointed the 3d sixth day in June annually for a church meeting at Newport henceforward until ordered otherwise, and the 3d sixth day in the seventh month at Westerly. And as some person might be necessary to administer the ordinance of baptism in case Bro. Gibson should be hindered, brethren Maxson and Clark were proposed. They not being satisfied, desired the case to be decided by lot.

The 18th day of 8th mo., met at Bro. Gibson's house. The greater part of the day spent in prayer and fasting for direction in the matter of the persons nominated and to be chosen by lot to administer the ordinance.

3d Sabbath in June, 1703, Jos. Crandall and Bro. Hiscox appointed messengers to go to Pennsylvania to visit the brethren.

The 21st of 8th mo., 1704, Bro's. Maxson and Gibson appointed to draw up a writing in answer to letters received from our brethren in the Province of Pennsylvania.

July 11th, 1705, Bro. Colgrove and wife declared the reason why they absented themselves from the meeting to be, because they differed from William Gibson about the divinity and humanity of Christ, whereupon we decided that as to the difference in their understanding of the divinity and humanity of our Lord Jesus Christ we deem it to be no ground for breach of communion.

Oct. 11, 1705, a letter read from Hopewell, N. J., dated 23d Sept., desiring us that Edmund Dunham might be ordained by us the Elder of their congregation, which was the same day performed, according to their request, by prayer and laying on of hands of our Elder, William Gibson, and the said Dunham, with the rest of that Society, admitted into a Christian association and communion with us, and a letter sent signed by Wm. Gibson, John Maxson, Jos. Crandall, and Jos. Clark, sen.

June 16th, 1706, William Davis, of Pennsylvania, proposed to be admitted a member of this congregation.

BISHOP BUTLER.

Bishop Butler, at Durham, appointed three days in every week for the entertainment of the principal gentry. The clergy of his Diocese were always welcome guests; and not only did he invite the poorest of his clerical brethren to his palace, but he occasionally visited them at their respective parishes. A gentleman once waited upon bishop Butler, to lay before him the details of some projected benevolent institution. The bishop calling the house-steward inquired how much money he then had in his possession. The answer was, "five hundred pounds, my lord." "Five hundred pounds!" exclaimed the master; "what a shame for a bishop to have so much money! Give it away; give it all to this gentleman for his charitable plan." His private habits were simple and unostentatious. "A friend of mine, since deceased, told me," says the Rev. John Newton, "that when he was a young man, he once dined with the late Dr. Butler, at that time bishop of Durham; and though the guest was a man of fortune, and the interview by appointment, the provision was no more than a joint of meat and a pudding. The bishop apologized for his plain fare, by saying that it was his way of living; that he had been long disgusted with the fashionable expense of time and money in entertainments, and was determined that it should receive no countenance from his example." REFLECTIONS FOR THE MORNING.

The solemn stillness of the morning, just before break of day, is fit and friendly to the cool and undisturbed reflection of a man just risen refreshed and in perfect health. Let him compare his condition with that of half the world, and let him feel an indisposition to admire and adore his Protector, if he can. How many great events have come to pass during the hours I have reposed! I feel my insignificance. The heavenly bodies have moved on; the great wheels of nature have none of them stood still; vegetation is advanced; the season is come forward; fleets have continued sailing; councils have been held; and on the opposite side of the world, in broad noonday, what revolutions have taken place, without my concurrence, consent, or knowledge! Great God, what am I in the world? An insect—a nothing! In the morning, O Lord, thou Great Being, unto thee will I look up.

How many of my fellow creatures have spent the last six hours in praying in vain for one hour's sleep! How many in racking pain, crying "would God it were morning!" How many in prison! How many in the commission of great crimes!—How many have been burnt out of house and home! How many have been shipwrecked at sea, or lost in untrodden ways on land! How many have been robbed and murdered! How many have died unprepared, and are now lifting up their eyes in torment! And here stand I, a monument of mercy, "the living, the living," to praise God. In the morning, O Lord, thou gracious and merciful being, unto thee will I look up, I will bemoan the vices, and sympathize with the distress of my fellow creatures. I will try this day to show my gratitude to my Preserver, by taking care not to offend Him. [Robinson.

VISIT OF A CONVERTED JEW TO HIS FAMILY.

The following extract from the journal of the missionary Neander, a converted Jew, will convey some idea of the relations subsisting between a Jew after he has become a Christian, and his own family, still adhering to Judaism. In most instances his family rejects him, and holds him accursed; and Neander was at first treated in this manner by his. But natural affection at last, in many cases, resumes its rights, and from that moment such touching scenes occur as those through which this missionary passed, on visiting his parents. This took place at Neubruck, in the Grand Duchy of Posen, during the summer of 1843.

"It was," writes Neander, "on the 29th of June, towards 9 o'clock in the evening, when we were near the town; I made the coachman stop, as I wished to get my feet on the ground, and walk by myself the short distance still to be passed over. Near by was a small grove, into which I went, and besought the Lord Jesus to be near me on this occasion. This strengthened me; my heart was refreshed, and I joyfully drew near the paternal residence. A letter from me had previously announced my arrival.

"On entering the house, the first person I met was my younger sister; but I did not recognize her. As soon as she saw me, she grew pale, stood still, and fixed her eyes steadfastly upon me. I did not wish to make myself immediately known to her; besides, I was not quite certain that she was my sister.

"I first entered the store, where I found my mother busy. I knew her immediately, and going up to her, I held out my hand, limiting myself to saying, 'Good evening.' 'Good evening,' she replied, 'and welcome.' I grasped her hand, saying, 'Ah! my mother, do you not know me?' At this moment my father made his appearance, and looked as if petrified on seeing me. I hurried to him and embraced him; then throwing myself into the arms of my mother, I exclaimed, 'Mother, dear mother, do you no longer know me?' In a broken voice she at last replied, 'Yes, I know thee; however it may be, thou art our son, for whom we have shed many tears; thou hast always been our crown, and many a long night have I spent in watching over thee. Husband—husband! the thought always rejoiced me that thy studies in the law would give us entrance into the garden of Eden; but instead of that, see with what a blow we have been stricken!' Here her voice failed her, and she gazed on me in silence with a look of deep distress. My father was seated near her, with his head leaning on his hand. My younger sister, in the mean time, had lain her head on my shoulder, and was immersed in thought.

"My heart was so oppressed, that I was unable to utter a word. At last I cried out, 'Alas! my dear parents, I wish I could give you an account of everything, and tell how I came to believe in our holy Messiah, who came for the redemption of his people.' 'The infamous!' exclaimed my mother. 'O, if you would only listen to me calmly,' replied I, 'and learn that your son believes truly in the living God, who is now my shepherd and my helper.' 'That is what he told me at Frankfort,' added the father.

"While these things were passing, my brother, eighteen years of age, entered the room, and remained standing at some distance from us. He began to weep, and pronounced some words which I did not understand. After we had been an hour together, I felt that I was not far from home. My mother said, 'But thou must be fatigued and hungry; I will go and see what I can find for thy refreshment.' Supper was soon on the table. Having seated myself beside my sister, my mother said to me in a very kindly manner, 'Thou must resume thy former place; thou wast always seated beside me.' I took the seat assigned immediately, but could eat but little.

"I was then content and happy on being seated at table with those who were so dear to me. My younger sister in particular, testified a warm affection for me. While we were thus peaceably enjoying ourselves, some Jews came in, who kindly wished me welcome. One of them severely reproached me, and when I said to him, 'Let us take the Holy Scripture, the Old Testament; on it all my convictions rest,' my father, turning to them, said, 'You had better be silent, for I myself have nothing to reply to what he has said to me; I can only wonder at the belief of these people, and I do not yet clearly understand it.' 'Ah, well beloved,' replied I, 'you will only clearly understand it, when like David you shall have asked God with humility and supplication, 'Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold the wonderous things of thy law.' It was late before we retired to repose. My brother and I slept in the same chamber. I spoke to him a great deal about Moses, and he was more and more on friendly terms with me Let thy holy name be praised, Lord Jesus, amen.

"On the morning of the 30th, my mother and sister came to me. It was delightful for me to be near that excellent mother, for she loved me with all her heart. It was with pain that I thought on my departure, and the moment of separation. I asked, 'Well, my mother, how long will you permit me to stay with you?' 'Ah,' she replied, 'canst thou not stay altogether with us, and live with us as thy brothers have lived—as a pious Jew? Then my old age would yet see such delightful days.' At these words my sister threw her arms around me, and began to beseech and conjure me. 'Ah,' said I to them, 'if you only knew, my well beloved, how happy I am in my convictions, and how much I suffer in seeing you think that your son is no longer an Israelite! In truth, I have the faith of our father Abraham, who—yes, he also—believed in the same Messiah in whom I believe, and in him he hoped.' On hearing these words they all rushed into another room and left me alone. During that solitude I poured out my heart into the bosom of the faithful Shepherd—the bosom of Emanuel.

"At the hour of dinner my mother served it up to me by myself, and stayed a short time beside me. In the afternoon my sister related to me the terrible scenes which occurred in the family when the news arrived that I had embraced Christianity. My heart was so oppressed that I could scarcely utter a word. I sighed a prayer from the bottom of my heart, and presently I felt as if it were a breath of the Holy Spirit. My mouth was again opened, and in the presence of all, I was able to give testimony to the great things which a true Israelite experiences, and to speak of his position in regard to God. My relations were silent, listened, and looked on with surprise.

"July 1.—All was calm in my father's house. Business was laid aside; for the Sabbath had commenced. Candles were lighted, and after my father had blessed the Sabbath, we placed ourselves at the table; but in a few moments afterwards a number of Jews came in again, and stayed till late in the night."

Our brother Neander states to us in the following terms his departure from the paternal mansion. "I threw myself into the arms of my mother, and of all the other objects of my affection, and said to them in a feeble voice, 'Adieu, my well-beloved. May Jehovah, the living God, who is praised in the highest heavens, bestow his peace upon us, and include you also among his own.'" [Presbyterian.

THE VAUDOIS WORSHIP.

The first thing that strikes a stranger, on entering the temples of the Vaudois, is the perfect contrast which their services present to those of the Church of Rome. Here are no visible objects of worship, no mediating priests, no splendid vestments, no gaudy or childish ceremonies, no pompous processions, no trumpery relics of paganism; but all is simplicity, decency, and order. The pastor and the reader are the only persons who officiate in the congregation, and contribute to their edification. Instead of a magnificent altar, decked with gold, and silver, and precious stones, toward which the worshipers are to turn, or before which they are to prostrate themselves, there is only a plain table in the pew before the pulpit, from which the elements of the Lord's Supper are dispensed to the communicants. Instead of mass-books in an unknown tongue, is the Bible in a language which all understand, and of which copious portions are read at each service. Instead of chanting priests, singing boys, pealing orchestras, and ignorant multitudes gazing and listening with silent admiration, we find the whole congregation celebrating in full and intelligent chorus the praises of Jehovah. And this simple worship—which reminds us of the primitive Christians before the fathers broke in upon its integrity by the addition of rites and ceremonies of their own invention—there is every reason to believe, is pretty much the same that has obtained in the valleys of Piedmont from ancient times. * * * Of the present Vaudois ministers, I feel warranted to affirm, from my own personal intercourse with them, and from the testimony borne by themselves mutually, and by others, that they are sound in the faith, and that in none of their pulpits is "another gospel" to be heard.

There has been a decrease of 400 members in the Orthodox Congregational churches of Mass. the past year. The same denomination in Me. has diminished 171, in the same time.

My Mother's Voice.

BY J. VERY.

My mother's voice, I hear it now;
I feel her hand upon my brow,
As when, in heartfelt joy,
She rais'd her evening hymn of praise,
And call'd down blessings on the days
Of her lov'd boy.

My mother's voice! I hear it now;
Her hand is on my burning brow,
When fever throbbed in all my veins,
And that kind heart first sooth'd my pains,
With healing power.

My mother's voice! it sounds as when
She read to me of holy men,
The Patriarchs of old;
And gazing downward in my face,
She seemed each infant thought to trace
My blue eyes told.

It comes—when thoughts unhallowed throng
Wove in sweet deceptive song—
And whispers round my heart;
As when at eve it rose on high,
I hear and think that she is nigh,
And they depart.

THE LITTLE GIRL AND THE RAIN.

BY MRS. L. H. SIGOURNEY.

"Mother, it rains," said a little girl, who was looking out of the window. "I am sorry not to go and make that visit to Emma. She invited me twice before, but it rained; and now it is raining hard again."

"I hope you will not be unhappy, my dear," said her mother. "I think I see tears upon your cheeks. I will not say it is a little thing; for the troubles of children seem great for them; but I trust that you will be patient, and wait pleasantly for good weather."

"Mother you have told me that God knows every thing and that he is always good. Then he certainly must know that there is but one Saturday afternoon in the week, and that is all the time that I have to play with my little friends. He must know that it has rained now these three holidays, when I wished so much to go abroad. And can he not make sunshine whenever he pleases?"

"We cannot understand all the ways of God, my child; but the Bible tells us he is wise and good. Look out into your little garden, and see how happy the rose buds are to catch the soft rain in their bosoms, and how the violets lift up their sweet faces to meet it, and as the drops fall into the quiet stream how it dimples with gladness and gratitude. The cattle will drink at the stream, and be refreshed. Should it be dried up, they would be troubled, and were the green grass to grow brown and die, they would be troubled still more, and some of them might perish for want of food."

Then the good mother told her daughter of the sandy desert in the East, and of the camel, who patiently bears thirst for many days; and how the fainting traveler watched for the rain cloud, and blessed God when he found water; and she showed her the picture of the camel and of the caravan, and told her how they were sometimes buried under the sands of the desert. And she told her a story of the mother who wandered into the wilderness with her son, and when the water was spent in the bottle she laid him under the shade to die, and went and prayed in her anguish to God; then, how an angel brought water from heaven, and her son lived. She told her of another story from the Bible, how there fell no rain in Israel for more than three years, and the grass dried up, and the brooks wasted away, and the cattle died; and how the good prophet prayed earnestly to God, and the skies sent their blessed rain, and the earth gave forth her fruit. Many other things this good mother said to her child, to teach and entertain her. Then they sang together a sweet hymn or two, and the little girl was surprised to find the afternoon so swiftly spent, for the time passed pleasantly.

So she thanked her kind mother for the stories she had told, and the pictures she had shown her. And she smiled, and said, "What God pleases is best."

Her mother kissed her and said, "Carry this sweet spirit with you, my daughter, as long as you live, and you will have gathered more wisdom from the storm than from the sunshine."

SLAVES KNOW SOMETHING.—A man by the name of Jones is preaching to the slaves in Georgia. The manner of his reception at one place, is described by him as follows:

"Allow me to relate a fact which occurred in the spring of this year, illustrative of the character and knowledge of the negroes at this time. I was preaching to a large congregation on the 'Epistle to Philemon;' and when I insisted upon fidelity and obedience as Christian virtues in servants, and upon the authority of Paul, condemned the practice of running away, one half of my audience deliberately rose up and walked off with themselves, and those that remained looked anything but satisfied, either with the preacher or his doctrine. After dismission, there was no small stir among them; some solemnly declared 'that there was no such epistle in the Bible,; others, 'that they did not care if they never heard me preach again.'"

THE "HONEST AND GOOD HEART."—It is humble, because it feels how far its goodness is from extending unto God, and how much there is that belongs to the unprofitable servant even in its best services. It is submissive, because he that is of God heareth God's words, and receives them with implicit faith and thankful acquiesence. It glories not in its attainments, or its spiritual progress, because it is written, that it is God that maketh it to differ from another's, and that he resisteth the proud, but giveth grace unto the humble.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, October 9, 1845.

WHY ARE YOU SO FEW?

In conversing with men upon the claims of the original Sabbath, one is often called upon to answer very strange questions, which show how easy it is for minds unreconciled to the truth to raise objections. At one time, perhaps, he will be asked, "Is not the fourth commandment obeyed by keeping any day holy after six days of labor?"—just as though the language of the commandment was so ambiguous as to allow persons to choose for themselves which day of the seven to observe! At another time he may be asked, "What difference does it make which day is kept if we only have a weekly day for rest and worship?"—as though our own accommodation in having a rest day was indefinitely more important than the question of obedience or disobedience to God! But when all these subterfuges have failed, as fail they must, there is one resort left—one question which cannot be answered—and that is, "If the seventh day is really the Sabbath, how does it happen that so few persons observe it—why have not the great mass of men been brought to keep it?"

In answering this question, we might very justly refer to some facts equally strange, and raise still more perplexing questions about them. We might inquire, If Christianity is really true, how does it happen that so few believe in it? If Mahommedanism is false, why have such vast numbers adopted it, and lived and died in the belief of it? If Protestantism is superior to Popery, why has the Church of Rome been permitted to number more members than all the Protestant churches? But we should feel, after asking these questions, that we had given no good reason for rejecting Christianity, or adopting Mahommedanism, or turning Papist. So when we are referred to the few who keep the Sabbath in comparison with the many who keep the Sunday, we see in the facts of the case no good reason for rejecting the Sabbath or adopting the Sunday.

But waiving this answer—which we know is good for nothing, although just as good as the question to which it is a reply—there are substantial reasons why Sabbath-keepers are few; and these reasons are of such a nature as not to imply weakness or uncertainty in regard to the truths to which they relate. Let us look at some of them.

One reason why Sabbath-keepers are so few is that they have from a very early period been opposed by the most powerful ecclesiastical organizations. The history of the church which is found in the Sacred Volume furnishes no illustration of this opposition. On the contrary, it shows that the disciples of that time were Sabbath-keepers. But as soon as Christianity became popular, opposition was manifested in a form not to be unheeded. Constantine exerted all his influence in favor of the day which was set up to rival the Sabbath, while he declared the observance of the day which God had sanctified and blessed to be anti-christian and Jewish. He was supported by priests and councils, who used all their religious and social influence to promote his views. By such means the observance of the Sabbath was rendered unpopular, and those who persevered in it were reduced to a mere handful. This state of things continued during the dark period which preceded the Reformation; nor was it greatly improved even by that movement, although the ways of expressing hostility materially changed. From that time to the present day, the men who should have been the staunchest advocates of truth and free inquiry, have been openly hostile to the candid discussion of this question, and ready at any time, when discussion seemed likely to spring up, to exert all their influence for its suppression.

Another reason why Sabbath-keepers are so few is, that the civil power has generally been exercised against them. By this we do not mean to assert, that it has been used to put them down; but simply, that it has given its sanction to opposite views, and thus thrown a most formidable obstacle in our way. With a large portion of the community, the law of the land has more weight than the law of God; and as the law of the land has been on the side of Sunday, and many civil inconveniences have stood in the way of observing another day, they have adopted the most popular and convenient practice. It is not uncommon to meet with men in all the different stations of life, who know and acknowledge the claims of the divine law, yet neglect them and follow the course which the civil law marks out. Not unfrequently they go so far as to express a wish that the law was different—that it encouraged the observance of the Sabbath instead of Sunday; then might they act out their convictions without inconvenience. Of course the state of piety in the hearts of such persons, must be low; indeed, they often confess that it is low, and that if they had religion enough they would follow the dictates of their own consciences and the Bible irrespective of personal convenience. It is more than possible, that if we could count up exactly the number of those who in their hearts approve our views, and wish they might prevail, we should have a host, if not a majority, on our side. As it is, the great mass seem opposed to us, and will continue so while the civil law remains as it is.

A third reason why Sabbath-keepers are so few is, that the social and business arrangements of society present great obstacles to their worldly success, and induce many to leave the Sabbath. The extent of this evil can hardly be appreciated by those who have given but little attention to the subject. There are only a few communities, and those small, in which a majority observe the seventh day. Hence it is impossible to carry on an extensive business without inconvenience from this source. There are great numbers who think they cannot endure this inconvenience, and when temptation comes they fall away. We know some facts to illustrate this assertion. One Sabbath-keeping church we know, the former minister of which brought up a large family of children, whom he provided with the means of education, and of entering upon mercantile and professional business. But before that pious father was called to his rest, he saw nearly all of his children abandon the faith which he held to be sacred, and had studiously instilled into their minds. Another family in the same church we know, of which nearly one half the descendants have forsaken the Sabbath, and adopted the popular day of rest. In each of these instances, if one were to converse with the individuals, he would find them wholly unsatisfied with the common arguments in favor of the first day of the week, and justifying their practice simply on the ground of expediency and convenience. If there could be a general overturn, without any self-denial on their part, they would most gladly welcome it. As it is, they go along halting and self-condemned rather than to face the frowns of business men, and endure the apparent losses to which consistency might expose them. We pity such men, because we know that many of them are now miserable and dwarfish religious beings; but most of all we pity them for the account which they must give to him who has said, "Ye cannot serve two masters." If the men of this class who are now living in different sections of the country could be assembled, they would make a large army; and if they could be fired anew with a love for the truth, their influence would be irresistible. But as they now are, their own peace is gone, and their influence is for the most part neutralized.

When we look at these facts, and consider how strong are the influences that draw men away from the Sabbath, we cannot wonder that Sabbath-keepers are so few; nor can we see in their fewness an argument against their correctness. On the contrary, our wonder is that they are so many; and instead of finding here an argument against them, we see proof, that this work is of God and will not come to nought.

Baptist Foreign Mission Board.—A special meeting of the General Board of Foreign Missions of the Baptist General Convention was held in Philadelphia on the 24th of September. The principal object of the meeting was to decide upon the question of transferring certain missions now under the patronage of the General Convention to the care of the Southern Baptist Convention. It was decided that the Board had no power to make the transfer, since the missionaries, as parties to the arrangement, have a right to choose which association they will be connected with. If any of them should prefer to change their relation, and come under the patronage of the Southern Convention, the Board express a disposition to furnish them every facility for so doing. It was also decided, that in view of the recent missionary organization at the South, and the imperfections in the provisions of the Constitution, it is expedient to call a meeting of the Convention, to be held at the Baptist Tabernacle in the city of New York, on the 3d Wednesday in November next.

"The World's Convention."—A Convention assuming this imposing title has been in session for a week past in New York. It is made up of the advocates of all the different systems of social and political reform—Fourierites, Communitists, &c. &c. Robert Owen appears to be the leading spirit, and serves as President. John A. Collins is one of the Vice Presidents, and has had considerable to say. The different speakers give a dark picture of the present condition of the human family, and express a great deal of sympathy for their suffering fellow men. Plan after plan has been proposed for their relief, but no one has yet received the sanction of the Convention, and been put forth as a catholicon. Each man has his own notions, and is not to be limited as to the time or manner of discussing them. All express a determination to account for existing evils and cure them without any aid from Revelation. In such circumstances, confusion and discord are naturally to be expected, and have been abundantly realized. Indeed, we believe it is confessed by some leading members of the Convention, that if they could for a moment entertain the idea of a devil, they should think him one in their midst. Be that as it may, their deliberations are likely to furnish another proof of the impotency of those schemes of reform which deny the true origin of existing evils, and overlook the divinely-appointed remedy.

Schism in a Baptist Church.—The last case of division which we have heard of, occurred at a recent meeting of the Regular Baptist Association in Rush County, Md. The question upon which they split was, whether it was right to fellowship a church holding the doctrine of the employment of human means in the work of salvation. After a long and warm discussion, a minority of the Association, headed by Dr. Wilson Thompson, withdrew and proceeded to organize a new Association, which they style the anti-means party.

An Example worthy of Imitation.—A Protest against Slavery has lately been issued by one hundred and seventy Unitarian Clergymen, (being nearly three fourths of the ministers of that denomination,) many of them distinguished for their talents, learning, and social standing. Its language is clear and forcible, and its spirit wholly unexceptionable. They protest against the system, among other reasons, because it is a violation of the law of Right, and the law of Love; because it degrades man, the image of God, into a thing; because it necessarily tends to pollute the soul of the slave; because it tends to defile the soul of the master; because it eats out the heart of the nation, restricts education, renders life insecure, violates the divine institution of families, and by hard and hopeless toil makes existence a burden.

SLAVERY IN THE SOUTH.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:

From your paper of the 28th of August, I clip the enclosed article, headed "Republican Despotism," which is credited originally to the "True Wesleyan." It is a specimen of many similar articles I have met with in the Sabbath Recorder. Let me assure you, that the whole production is as arrant and impudent a fabrication as was ever published; and I cannot refrain from expressing my surprise, that a paper which is conducted with so much fairness and discretion as yours seems to be, should become the medium of transmitting such idle and preposterous caricatures of Southern slavery. I can only attribute it to the fact, that personally you are wholly uninformed as to the real treatment and condition of the slaves in the South. I hope you will not again admit such grossly false and injurious statements to appear in your columns; for I should regret to withdraw my subscription from your paper, yet regard to truth and opposition to falsehood in every guise, will constrain me to do so, (however little you may, as I suppose you would, be affected by a loss of a single subscriber,) if your paper continues to supply to your Northern readers such overcharged pictures of the character of their Southern brethren.

The article in question is too grossly overcharged and too obviously false, to merit serious refutation. Please republish it, that your readers may judge for themselves. It is by such wretched calumnies as these, that designing men create and keep alive a wild excitement in the North, and enlist in the advocacy of their mischievous schemes many good men, who, if they knew the truth, would never embark in such romantic crusades on fancied errands of benevolence. Here it is said, (without any names or dates,) that a female slave in Georgia is made to marry at 14; when she has four children, two are torn from her and sold by her inhuman master. No one acquainted with negro slavery in the South, need be told, that no purchaser would have bought children of so early an age as these must have been. They would have been of no use, but rather a burden to their purchaser, who (without their mother) could scarcely have reared them to be serviceable. Then this same woman escapes from Georgia and makes her way to Pennsylvania, where she is secreted by a Quaker, and suddenly her master appears in pursuit of her, on "the old white horse she used to drive," as if the distance from Georgia to Pennsylvania presented no greater obstacle to her master's riding the old white horse, than if they had been adjoining plantations. Here too the most inhuman punishments were inflicted on this imaginary sufferer, without any cause being alledged or any complaint made; as if the whites at the South whipped their servants and shot pistols at them at pleasure. Why, the contented, well-clad, healthy, happy colored man here, would laugh in your face at such a burlesque!

Believe me, Dear Sir, in spite of such preposterous stories, by which you North men are so often gulled, if you would come amongst us, you would see a very different state of things. Not that there are no cases of injustice or oppression; that state of happiness is not to be found in any society in which a laboring class exists—and Southern slavery forms no exception. But this is indubitably certain, that if considerations of humanity do not restrain the master from acts of violence, oppression and cruelty, those of self-interest always interpose to do so, for slaves are intrinsically so valuable that it is always the interest of the master to treat them well, to feed and clothe them abundantly, not to overtask them, and in bad weather and sickness always to minister to their wants and promote their comforts. Happily for them and humanity's sake, interest stimulates benevolence to use them well and promote their comforts, and there is no manner of doubt that their condition is infinitely preferable to the proscribed and outcast race of free negroes in the free States, with all its fancied and boasted blessings of liberty. The one is free of care, contented and happy—the other is degraded, full of anxieties, exposed to perpetual insults and mortification, morose, a social outcast, and by consequence, discontented and miserable.

Will you give place to these hasty lines.

A. B. Magruder.

Charlottesville, Va., Sept. 1845.

Remarks.

☞ The article alluded to in the foregoing letter found its way into the Recorder while the responsible editor was absent from his post for a few days. But he has examined it carefully since his attention was called to the subject, and must confess himself unable to discover the evidence that it is so "grossly overcharged and obviously false" as Mr. Magruder represents it. Three statements contained in the article seem to satisfy his mind that the whole story is a preposterous fabrication. Without taking room to republish the whole article, (which was so recently before our readers, and to which they can so readily refer,) let us look a little at these three statements:—

The first statement is, that after a female slave had borne four children, the two oldest were torn from her and sold; which Mr. Magruder thinks impossible, because they would not have been old enough to be of any value to a buyer. Now, if he will look at the article carefully, or at his own statement of the matter, he will discover that there is no intimation whatever as to how old they were. They could not have been less than two or three years old, and for aught which the narrative asserts they might have been twenty or thirty. What is there then so preposterous in this?

The second statement is, that when this runaway mother was stopping at the house of a Quaker in Pennsylvania, she saw her master ride along on the "old white horse." This Mr. M. doubts, because Pennsylvania is a great way off from Georgia, and it is not easy to pass from one State to the other. But does he not know, that it it is quite common for Southern men to spend their summers at the North, and that it is quite possible for them to bring along their own horses if they have favorite ones and please to bring them? If he does not know this, then he may be as ignorant of Northern customs as he deems us to be of Southern. But if he does, then why deny a well-authenticated narrative because it states that a Georgia horse was seen in Pennsylvania?

The third statement is, that inhuman punishments were inflicted upon this slave mother; which Mr. Magruder thinks doubtful, because self-interest always interposes to restrain the master from acts of violence, oppression, and cruelty." We believe that Mr. M. is a member of the legal profession. Now if a case should happen to come up before a judicial tribunal in which it should be proved that a passionate father, under the influence of anger, had maimed or killed his own son, would he venture to plead the cause of that father, and expect to acquit him, by saying that it is unreasonable to suppose the man guilty, since self-interest would restrain him? We think not. But this is precisely a parallel to the case in hand. It is proved by thousands of witnesses, that inhuman punishment do frequently occur in slaveholding communities. Yet Mr. M. questions the statement of a slave woman to that effect, and pleads the cause of the slaveholder, simply on the ground that self-interest would restrain the master from violence and cruelty! Such a plea seems to us more preposterous than any thing contained in the narrative to which he objects.

Mr. Magruder makes a great flourish about the advantages of the contented and well-clad slaves of the South, over the proscribed and outcast free negroes of the North—as though he really supposed that there could be no greater objection to slavery than the cruel treatment of its miserable victims. In this supposition he is entirely mistaken. We do not doubt that the system leads to cruelties enough; it naturally makes a tyrant of the master and a cringing subject of the slave. But this is not our main objection to it. What we hate and oppose in slavery is the chattel principle—the principle that a man may be made a thing—may be held as a piece of property—may be bought and sold in the market like a horse or a dog. That principle involves all other evils, and needs not the addition of any particular instances of cruelty to make us loathe it. It is comparatively unimportant to us whether the slave is clothed in rags and fed on potatoes, or wears purple and fine linen and fares sumptuously every day. If he is subject to the caprice of his master, and liable at any moment to be separated from the objects of his love, and sold into the worst form of servitude, he is a miserable being, however well he may now be fed and clothed. Yet it is a natural result of slavery to make just such beings. Hence we hate and oppose it. Nor does it abate our opposition to be told that the free whites of the North are "degraded, full of anxieties, and exposed to perpetual insults and mortification." The system of slavery which exists at the South has placed them in that condition, and is adapted to keep them there. To use their present degradation, therefore, as an argument for continuing the system which has ground them down to the dust, is both cruel and unjust. How it can be done consistently with loving our neighbors as ourselves, is a problem which we are unable to solve.

EDITING A NEWSPAPER.

The following paragraph on this subject, by the editor of the National Intelligencer, shows not only that he is a shrewd observer, but that he has had some experience in the business he is talking about:—

"Many people estimate the ability of a newspaper and the industry and talent of its editor by the quantity of editorial matter which it contains. It is comparatively an easy task for a frothy writer to pour out daily, columns of words, words, upon any and all subjects. His ideas may flow in 'one weak, washy, everlasting flood,' and his command of our language may enable him to string them together like bunches of onions; and yet his paper may be a meagre and poor concern. But what is the labor, the toil of such a man, who displays his 'leaded matter' ever so largely, to that imposed upon the judicious, well-informed editor, who exercises his vocation with an hourly consciousness of its responsibilities and its duties, and devotes himself to the conduct of his paper with the same care and assiduity that a sensible lawyer bestows upon a suit, or a humane physician upon a patient, without regard to show or display! Indeed, the mere writing part of editing a paper is but a small portion of the work. The industry is not even shown there. The care, the time employed in selecting, is far more important—and the tact of a good editor is better shown by his selections than by anything else; and that, we all know, is half the battle. But as we have said, an editor ought to be estimated, and his labors understood and appreciated, by the general conduct of his paper, its tone, its temper, its uniform consistent course, its principles, its aims, its manliness, its dignity, its prosperity. To preserve these as they should be preserved, is enough to occupy fully the time and attention of any man. If to this be added the general supervision of a newspaper establishment, which most editors have to encounter, the wonder is, how they can find room 'to write at all!'"

General Intelligence.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

The steamship Cambria, which reached Boston on Thursday evening last, brought fifteen days later foreign news.

The fears entertained of a failure in crops were dissipated by fine weather.

The mania for railway speculation continues unabated in England, France, and other countries.

The steamship Great Britain, from this port; arrived at Liverpool Sept. 15, at 7 o'clock, A. M., she sailed Aug, 30th.

The Queen has returned from her German tour. She called, on her way home, at the Chateau d'Eu, and passed a night or two under the hospitable roof of the King of the French. The meeting of the two monarchs on the shore of Treport is set forth with all the wordy minuteness of London letter-writers. A bathing-machine was the only available conveyance at hand for landing Queen Victoria on the dominions of her powerful neighbor, and in this frail thing of planks the "anointed" monarchs embraced, with a becoming sense of the ludicrous.

An explosion of a most awful nature took place in the Laboratory department of the Royal Arsenal, Woolwich, on the 17th ult., by which seven persons were killed instantaneously. The whole of the glass of the windows was destroyed by the explosion, and the building set on fire, and on bursting open the door a most awful spectacle was presented of the dreadfully scorched bodies heaped above each other at the back of the door, to which it appears they had rushed, but failed in opening it. The clothes of the deceased were literally burned off their bodies, and their remains blackened.

Experimental trips have been made on the Croydon Atmospheric Railway, which, with allowance for the fact that every thing is not yet in complete working order, have been very satisfactory. The line is five miles long, extending from the Dartmouth arms to Croydon. The average speed, only one engine being employed for the five miles, thirty miles an hour; the greatest velocity forty-five.

Our advices from Switzerland dwell much upon the agitated state of the country, but give no details worth repeating. The people of Berne are much excited, and it is believed that when the harvest shall have been got in, all Switzerland will be again in a state of convulsion. At present the people are too much occupied to make war upon each other, but the disposition is not wanting.

The Pope is in a declining state of health. He is sadly plagued with a cancer in his nose. Being upwards of eighty years of age, it is not likely that, with his maladies, he will long be spared. He is a good-hearted, well-meaning, pious man, and is personally much beloved.

The Bishop of Munster lately celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of his elevation to the Diocese with much ecclesiastical pomp. It was a sort of set-off to the defections brought about by Ronge. With the exception of a French Bishop, this prelate is the only one who has presided over one diocese for fifty years since Rome ruled Christendom.

The Pope has severely reprehended the laxity of the discipline and exertions of the Catholic Priests in Whestphalia.

The Frankfort Journal mentions that the King of Wurtemburg has been twice fired at at Meran, in Tyrol, but fortunately without being injured.

King Oscar of Sweden has entirely won the hearts of his people by equalizing the law of marriage and inheritance, despite the opposition of the nobles.

Some fanatics have been preaching at Exeter to immense audiences, announcing that the end of the world is fixed for the 10th day of this month.

The London papers announce the death, on the 17th of September, of William Penn, Esq., great grandson of William Penn, the founder of Philadelphia. His age was 69 years.

The iron-ship builders, Messrs. Hodgeson & Co. of Liverpool, are building an iron ship of 1,200 tons burden, the first of a line of steamers between New York and Liverpool.

A terrible conflagration occurred at the market town of Morton-hampstead, Devonshire, levelling in its progress no fewer than fifty dwelling houses, besides consuming a vast amount of property.

The general opinion in Europe was that there would be no war with Mexico. They predicated this opinion more on the poverty of Mexico than on the want of cause of war.

It is stated that orders have been sent out within the last two months, to the amount of three millions sterling, for the importation of foreign grain, under the expectation that it will be required before the harvest of 1846, either to be mixed with english grain, or to be used separately.

Ireland.—It was rumored that the Queen was about to visit Cork.

The Repeal agitation has lost an able, enthusiastic, and withal an honest champion, by the untimely death of Mr. Thomas Davis, the principal editor of the Nation newspaper, who died Sept. 16th from the effects of a gastric fever, with which he was seized about ten days previous. Mr. Davis had barely entered the prime of life, being little over 30 years of age, and the columns of the journal over which he has presided since its establisment bore ample testimony to his capacity as a writer of no ordinary ability. The Repeal Association, it is said, have determined to honor the lamented gentleman with a public funeral.

Mr. O'Connell is still rusticating at Darrynane, from whence he issues his weekly missives to the repealers in Conciliation Hall. He is about emerging from his mountain home, to attend "monster" demonstrations in Kerry, Mayo, and Tipperary.

The eldest son of the late Mrs. Hemans has been appointed engineer to the Irish Great Western Railway.

France.—Mexico and the United States have again occupied much of the attention of the Parisian journalists; but all that has been said may be summed up thus, either that there will be no war at all, or that, if a war, the United States will completely crush their puny adversary.

DISEASED POTATOES.—The disease amongst the potatoe crop seems to be universal; it has attacked the esculent simultaneously in Great Britain, and on the European as it did last year on the American continent. Several suggestions have been thrown out for remedying the evil, the most practical of which has been put forth by a farmer of Dusseldorf; he recommends harrowing deeply the earth in which the tubercles are planted. This plan, it is said, will produce evaporation, by which the humidity caused by the fermentation will disappear. Some districts have escaped the ravages of the disease, but the injury is too wide-spread not to cause alarm. On the European continent the potatoe crop has been all but destroyed, and in Holland, Belgium, and the north of France, the most serious fears were entertained—so serious that the exportation of food was rigidly prohibited, and all duties on the importation of it rescinded.

GRAND BATTLE IN CIRCASSIA.—Intelligence, via. Odessa, has been received of a battle between the Circassian forces under Schamil Bey, and the Russian army (50,000 strong) under General Woronzoff, who attacked the town of Dargo, the head-quarters of Schamil. After five days' hard fighting the Circassians were obliged to abandon the fortress to the enemy, having expended all their ammunition, not, however, without carrying off their artillery and baggage to the mountains. The loss on the part of the Russians is said to amount in killed alone to 8000, among whom are three generals and forty other officers, and four aids-de-camp of the commander-in-chief. The latter, finding his army so much crippled, for the number of wounded is enormous, was destroying the fortifioations to retire to Tiflis, to reorganize his force. Dargo was defended by Schamil's regular troops, consisting of a corps of Dagastan infantry, and the Russian and Polish deserters from the Emperor's service.

A SOUNDING ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH.— At the meeting of the Academy of Sciences on Thursday M. Laborde laid before the Academy a description of a new electrical telegraph, the signals of which are made by sounds. A system of electric telegraph was also presented by Garnier, which, however, has one remarkable feature—viz., a double dial-plate, for letters or signals, arranged in such a way as to prevent some of the confusion that exists in the present system.

MELANCHOLY.—Died, at the residence of his father, in West Goshen, on Wednesday afternoon, the 27th ult., John Patten, aged 11 years. In recording the above we are pained to add another to the melancholy effects resulting almost directly from the perpetration of the horrid crime for which Jabez Boyd has been recently tried and convicted. John Patten could not survive the death of his elder brother. The mutilated and disfigured remains haunted his imagination day and night, and gave his youthful memory no rest. To use his own language, "he could not cover Wesley up." From the moment of witnessing the sad and harrowing spectacle presented in the fiendish murder of an affectionate brother, a deep and settled gloom took possession of his mind, which the constant care of those around him could not alleviate. He was sent to school, in hope that the scenes of boyish fancy, and the mingled play of young associates would bring back the life and joy of his eye; but there was no rest, no respite for the gloom around him. In the midst of the play, and whilst repeating his lessons, the spectacle was still before him, and he would burst out in uncontrolable grief, until the heart sickened at his sufferings. His frame sunk under the oppression, and still the vision was there; and when, a short time before his death, maternal care hung over and enquired his wants, it was still "Wesley,"—"Wesley is giving me a drink of water," was his reply. Who can fathom the depth of his sufferings? But they are now over; he has left this early scene, and passed into the embrace of an affectionate brother, who stood upon the bright shores of eternity, beckoning him to the scenes of joys unnumbered. [West Chester (Pa.,) Jeff.

FUGITIVE SLAVES.—A sad and unwarrantable case is stated in the West-Jersey Mail. A party of strangers in a wagon called at the house of Jefferson Johnson, a colored man, having a wife and three children living near Eastham Mount, and they learned from the children that their mother had gone to work at Mr. Beck's. Thither they went, and seeing the woman in the barn-yard, milking, they immediately seized hold of her and dragged her up to one of the wagons by main force. Here Mr. Beck came up, and to his inquiry as to the meaning of this incursion into his premises, these men declared the woman to be their property—their slave. Before Mr. Beck had time to recover from the surprise into which he was thrown by the unexpectedness of the rencontre, the poor creature was hurried into the wagon, and the party drove off at the top of their horses' speed. Arriving at Johnson's house, they seized the three children, that were born in New Jersey, and pitching them into the wagons, like calves for the market, put whip to their horses and escaped. This is an outrageous proceeding, and calculated to make the worst impression against those who have legal claims, and are willing to test them in a proper manner.

EXTENSIVE RELATIONSHIP.—During the course of the trial of Dr. Boughton, now going on, it became necessary, says the Hudson Republican, for Judge Edmonds to remark upon the degrees of relationship with the parties to a suit, by which persons were disqualified from serving as jurors. The exemption extended, His Honor stated, to the ninth degree of consanguinity, or as far as third cousins. In speaking upon this subject, he said that when appointed to the office of Recorder of that city some years since, knowing from the fact that his ancestors were among the first settlers of the place, that he had an extensive relationship there, though in many cases very distant, he requested his mother to give him the names of all the persons she knew in the city, who came within the degree of third cousins, whose case it would be improper for him to try, if they should ever come before him. Extraordinary as it may seem, she gave him the names of 2,300! This, in a population of 5,500, is what we should call a pretty extensive relationship.

THE MILLERITES ATTEMPTING TO RAISE THE DEAD!—Last Sunday one of the followers of Miller and Himes, committed suicide at Nashua, N. H., by walking deliberately into the Merrimac river, in the presence of several persons on the opposite side, who could not reach him till he had drowned. It soon became noised about among his Miller brethren of the town, a number of whom repaired to the spot, took charge of the body, and carried it to one of their own houses. All at once they became filled with faith that they could restore him to life, and with that view actually prayed and sung over the corpse nearly all Sunday night.

Such a degree of infatuation as this, at this enlightened day, is hardly credible, but the above facts came to us in such an authentic form that we are not permitted to doubt the statement, as strange as it may seem. [Boston Times.

SHAVINGS FOR TREES.—The season of the year for transplanting has arrived. The following we take from the Boston Cultivator:

A Mr. Cass, in West Roxbury, set out two elm trees on dry sandy soil, and put pine shavings around one, and in four years, the one around which the shavings were put, was twice as big as the other. Otherwise than the shavings, they were treated alike, and when set they were about of the same size.

Capt. Joshua Lovett 2d, of Beverly, is a very successful cultivator of trees, as is evident by his superior specimens of fruit exhibited at the Horticultural Room. He has made numerous experiments, and he thinks one of the best substances to lay around trees to protcet them from drought, and promote their growth, is the dust from shavings; of course the shavings themselves would be good on decomposition.

THE MONEY MADE BY FARMERS.—A Wisconsin letter relates the following, as a not unusual operation among the farmers of that Territory.

"I have heard of repeated instances here of men coming into Wisconsin in the Spring, taking up a quarter section (160 acres) of land, at $1 25, breaking up and fencing 50 acres, putting in wheat, and realizing from the sale of their crop the following year more than enough to pay for the land, improvements, seed and all—that is over one hundred per cent. in the year."

This throws into the shade the profits of steam mills, and indeed of manufactures of all sorts. There can be no great distress in a country where agricultural operations, pursued in this rude way, pay so well. The time is yet far distant, in this country, when the man willing to work will suffer for the want of either the luxuries or the necessaries of life. Agriculture, poorly as the free traders say it is rewarded, is on the whole, the least crowded and best paid of all the departments of industry. The wonder is that any man should aim to be anything else than a good farmer. [Express.

LATEST FROM MEXICO.—The Santa Ana party are in favor of postponing the declaration of war against the United States to a more propitious time, in view of the present distracted and unprepared condition of the country. The Siglo XIX still contends, as it did in the outset, that as the war with the United States is a war of defence solely, the object of which is to recover a portion of territory which has been wrested from Mexico, that an express declaration or announcement of war is not necessary; that the previous protest and solemn declarations of Mexico cover the whole ground.

The Government is so beset with difficulties and embarrassed in its resources, and the country is in so distracted a state, that it is believed that another revolution is inevitable, and that it may occur at any moment. [N. O. Pic., Sept. 23.

EXPOSURE OF A CONSPIRACY.—We published a year ago, some account of the trial and conviction of a Catholic Priest in Indiana (Romain Weinzœplin,) for an aggravated crime upon a female of his church, while at confession. The testimony was of a revolting character, and the wretch was consigned to the Penitentiary, loathed by all except a few friends who believed him innocent. Several months elapsed, when circumstances led others to apprehend that he was the victim of a conspiracy. An effort was about to be made to obtain a pardon, but he interposed against this, unless his innocence could first be established, saying that liberty and life were of no value to him without his good name. Recently, facts have come to light which fully establish that innocence. Schmoll, the prosecuter, who had gone off to Missouri, there confessed the conspiracy to four German acquaintances, who disclosed the facts in a letter to Rev. Mr. Deydeir, of Evansville, Indiana. One of the counsel of the imprisoned Priest went to Missouri, and obtained affidavits setting forth that the wife of Schmoll, who swore against the Priest, had been suborned to do so by her husband, who threatened to abandon her if she refused. Rev. C. T. TORREY.—A correspondent of the Hallowell, (Me.) Standard, who lately visited this individual in the Maryland Penitentiary, states that his confinement is undermining his health; his eyes are dim, his voice hoarse, and his spirits depressed; and it is feared he cannot live out the period (five years) for which he was sentenced.

The Pittsburg Gazette says, that a man who hires a house for any definite time, is accountable for rent during the whole of that time, even though the house should be burnt down in the first quarter. For example—a person hired a house in Pittsburg in March. In April, it was burnt down. In June, the landlord sued for a quarter's rent, recovered it, and in September he may sue again.

The fashions in Paris at present are the most ridiculous that can be imagined. Men wear tiny hats, with scarcely any brims; coats almost without tails; trousers without straps, and about a yard wide at the ankles; tremendous waistcoats, of the fashion and dimensions worn in the year of grace 1745; enormous watch ribbons, bearing ponderous bunches of seals. The ladies wear robes fitting tight to the body, and buttoning up to the chin like a soldier's jacket; paletots, fastened in every respect like those of men, only made of silk; and bonnets resembling corpulent and apopletic coal-scuttles.

The New York Tribune very justly remarks: 'There are people in the world who consider every generous sentiment, every liberal tendency, every expression of sympathy for the oppressed or suffering, as rank 'demagoguism,' which must have its origin in some selfish, sinister, sordid purpose. The Junks of the Chinese are now all managed by American oars, and the small boats of all Europe and Asia are now propelled by the enterprise of the people of this village.

Dr. Amos Parker, of Bolton, is believed to be the oldest postmaster in Massachusetts, having been appointed in the year 1808.

The New Orleans Courier mentions the accession of one of the compositors upon that paper to a fortune of $10,000—announced to him by letter while at work at the case. He coolly finished his work, and left for Missouri, where the property lies.

It is said the New York pick-pockets are about prosecuting steamboat captains for cautioning passengers to beware of them. It injures the business.

The Massachusetts State Agricultural Society, with the view to improve the dairy breed of cattle in that State, has sent a Commissioner to Ayrshire for the purpose of purchasing a number of cows and a bull.

The Athenæum says, "Mr. Lyell has, we understand, left England for another tour of the United States."

The Providence Journal says, we have heard it suggested that Henry Wheaton, now U. S. Minister at Berlin, would probably receive an invitation to accept the Lane Professorship of Law in Harvard University, in the place of Judge Story, deceased. It is understood that Edward Everett will be the successor of Mr. Quincy, as President of the University.

Judge Morris, in his History of the town of Litchfield, Ct., says:—

"The first use of the violin in this town for a dance, was in the year 1748. The whole expense of the amusement, although the young people generally attended, did not exceed one dollar, out of which the fiddler was paid. When this instance of profusion took place, parents and old people exclaimed that they should be ruined by the extravagance of the youth. In 1798, a ball, with the customary entertainments and variety of music, cost $160, and nothing was said about it. Such has been the difference in the manners of Litchfield within a half century."

Asia Minor is at the present moment suffering all the horrors of a famine. For the last two years the crops have failed, and water is so scarce that the quantity required for the consumption of a small family costs an enormous sum. The exportation of corn has been prohibited after the 15th of August, excepting in the case of contracts previously entered into.

At Constantinople the drought has been so great that water, usually abundant, sold as high as 2d. per gallon. The surrounding district suffers severely.

A remarkable instance of liberality occurred at Lowell last week. In one of the factories a lad lost his arm by its becoming entangled in the machinery. The company made him a present of $300; the hands employed there $300 more.

A Mr. P. Lee, of Maysville, Kentucky, advertises seven runaway slaves, offers a reward of seven hundred dollars for their apprehension and arrest. Among the fugitives was an infant four months old, and a white woman described thus by Mr. Lee: "Fanny, the mother of four children, is about 25 years of age, white as most white women—straight light hair."

It has been estimated that a quantity of spider's web, weighing a quarter of an ounce, would reach from London to Edinburgh, a distance of four hundred miles.

DIED,

At his residence in Marlborough, Salem Co., N. J., Sept. 25, of brain fever, CALEB A. MOORE, in the 25th year of his age. Although his bodily sufferings were great, he endured them all with that perfect resignation which the religion of Jesus only affords—"Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord." COPIED.

At Lost Creek, Va., on the 27th of September, Miss EDITH BOND, daughter of Eli and Amelia Bond, aged 21 years.

The circumstances attending her death were truly heart-rending. On Sabbath day, Sept. 20, in company with a brother, she started on horseback to ride eight miles and attend a meeting where a new Baptist minister was expected to preach. After proceeding more than half the distance, her horse took fright, and threw her off, dashing her head against a stone. This so stunned her, that she never revived sufficiently to open her eyes or speak, although she lived a little more than one week. She was a remarkably amiable and affectionate daughter; and although she had never made a public profession of religion, her friends hope to meet her in a better world. May the blessed Lord sanctify the affliction to the salvation of precious souls. How important that we have our work done, and stand ready and waiting for the coming of the Lord. COMM.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' SEMINARY.

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, Principal, and Professor of Languages.
IRA SAYLES, Associate Principal, and Professor of Mathematics
GURDON EVANS, Professor of Natural Sciences.
J. R. HARTSHORN, Professor of Anatomy and Physiology.
O. STILLMAN, Professor of Vocal and Instrumental Music.
Miss C. B. MAXSON, Preceptress, Instructress in French, Italian, Drawing and Painting.
Mrs. M. B. KENYON, Assistant in the Female Department.

From the very liberal patronage extended to this Institution during the past seven years, the Trustees have been induced to make arrangements for greatly increasing its facilities. The Chemical, Philosophical, Astronomical, and Mathematical apparatus is amply sufficient for a full illustration of the different departments of those Sciences. The apparatus will be farther increased at the commencement of the ensuing Fall Term, by the introduction of whatever may be necessary in other Sciences than those above mentioned, especially, by a MANIKIN of the most approved structure, now being imported from Paris, expressly for this Institution. This will enable the student of Physiology and Anatomy to pursue his studies with advantages nearly equal to those afforded by an actual subject, having this farther advantage of being divested of all those revolting circumstances ever attendant on the dissecting room.

THE TEACHERS' CLASSES, as usual, will be exercised in practical teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective Instructors. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. Daily Lectures will also be given during the Fall and Winter Terms; and the public may be assured that this department of the Institution shall be conducted upon the principles of the best regulated Normal Schools, in this, or any other country.

Finally, the proprietors pledge themselves, that the reputation of this Institution shall be sustained by the introduction of whatever may be necessary to meet the demands of an intelligent public.

The Institution is liberally endowed and subject to the visitation of the Regents.

Its Library is choice and extensive, and accessible, also, to all the students gratis.

THE ACADEMIC YEAR for 1845—6 consists of three Terms, as follows:—The First, commencing Wednesday August 13, 1845, and ending Thursday, November 20. The Second, commencing Wednesday, November 26, and ending Thursday, March 6, 1846. The Third, commencing Wednesday, March 25, and ending Thursday, July 2.

EXPENSES.—Tuition, per term, from $3 50 to $5 00. Board, per week, $1 00. Piano, (extra,) per term, $10 00. Washing, lights and fuel, per term, from $2 00 to $5 00. The entire expenses for an Academic Year, including board, washing, lights, fuel and tuition, (except on the Piano,) need not exceed $70 00; and may even be reduced much below this, where individuls board themselves, either separately or in clubs. For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense. SAMUEL RUSSELL,
President of the Board of Trustees

The Dying Boy to his Mother.

"Let me go where angels go."

Mother, do let my spirit fly
Beyond this world of wo:
Pray let me soar above the sky,
And go where angels go.

Look upward with believing eye,
And hearken to their song:
They beckon me to come on high,
To join their shining throng.

How happily the angels live!
How beautiful they are!
Ne'er shall their countenance receive
Furrow from pain or care.

They dwell in ever-living bowers,
God's glorious throne in view:
I want to cull immortal flowers,
And be an angel too.

I see, I see an angel-band
Come through the heavenly gate;
And now around my bed they stand:
Mother, for me they wait!

Then weep not, mother, Christ the Lord,
Whom soon I hope to see,
Yes Christ himself hath spoke the word,
"Let children come to me."

Weep not, but let me go to joy
Beyond what tongue can tell;
And praise Him who will place your boy
Where saints and angels dwell.

IGNORANCE THE MOTHER OF SUPERSTITION.

It has been coined as one of the great lies of Infidelity and Atheism, that Ignorance is the Mother of Devotion. The truth is, that Ignorance is the Mother of Superstition, and where there is not an intelligent devotion, founded on the people's acquaintance with the Word of God, there will be an immeasurable fund of superstition passed over to the power of the Priests for them to work upon at their pleasure. This is the secret of the illimitable despotism which the Romish Priests have always exerted over their subjects. It can be maintained only by keeping their subjects in profound ignorance of God's Word. Hence their hostility against the Scriptures. While the Word of God is concealed, they can fill the spiritual world with whatever shapes of terror they please, to evoke from its darkness the affrighted conscience. They let down the curtain of their own traditions over the nature of that spiritual world as God has revealed it, and of our duties in regard to it, and then filling that curtain with curious and awful paintings addressed to the superstitious vision of ignorant minds, they have lighted up behind it the fires of their own kindling, to terrify and subdue the world by the moving phantasmagoria of shapes which the genius of superstition has invented.—They have turned out from the temple of God, the beautiful and winning forms of religious truth, and have set in play the whole machinery against which the ptophetic apostle so early warned the Church under the titles of voluntary humilities, and worshipping of angels, seducing spirits, and doctrine of devils. Many times has the world's superstitious vision been crowded with such supernatural terrors. The world's Priests have been the world's Magicians, with all the shoals and armies of evil spirits and dark miracles at their command. But when the Word of God rises on the world's darkness, then air is freed from those shapes, that in the midnight of the mind have brooded at the altar, and watched at men's doorposts, and weighed upon the intellect. In the language of Milton, describing the conquest of the demons by the Babe of Bethlehem,

> The flocking shadows pale
> Troop to th' infernal jail;
> Each fetter'd ghost slips to his several grave.

So, when the Word of God broke upon the world in the Reformation, there was a renewal of that exorcism of devils, which took place at the coming of Christ, from Pagan oracles and altars. The secrets of Popish superstition were unveiled, and the Flamens or Priests of Romanism trembled in the midst of services as quaint and unchristian as those of Paganism itself.

> The oracles are dumb,
> No voice or hideous hum
> Runs through the arched roof in words deceiving.
> Apollo from his shrine,
> Can no more divine,
> With hollow shriek the steep of Delphos leaving.
> No mighty trance, or breathed spell,
> Inspires the pale-eyed priest from the prophetic cell.
> In consecrated earth,
> And on the holy hearth,
> The Lars and Lemures moan with midnight plaint;
> In urns and altars round
> A dread and dying sound
> Affright the Flamens at their service quaint;
> And the chill marble seems to sweat,
> While each peculiar power foregoes his wonted seat.

Over a great part of the Christian world there was such a dispossession of the dark genii of Romanism out of their haunts, when the Bible was reinstated on its throne; men's hearts and minds, as at the Roformation. In the new worship of traditions, temples and ordinances, now so rife in some directions, these exorcised spirits seem to be stealthily trooping back to their abodes.—Nor is it an easy matter for such a system, or for those who serve under and uphold such a system, to relinquish the wielding of so tremendous a power as it has exercised, or to lay bare the secrets by which it is maintained. To the light of God's Word they will not come, lest their deeds should be made manifest. [Cheever.

PURITY.—"I would have you attend to the full significance and extent of the term holy. It is not abstinence from outward deeds of profligacy alone; it is not a mere recoil from impurity in action. It is a recoil from impurity in thought; it is that quick and sensitive delicacy to which even the very conception of evil is offensive; it is a virtue which has its residence within, which takes guardianship of the heart, as of a citadel, or inviolated sanctuary, in which no wrong or worthless imagination is permitted to dwell. It is not purity of action that is all we contend for; it is exalted purity of heart—the ethereal purity of the third heaven; and if it is at once settled in the heart, it brings the peace, and the triumph, and the untroubled serenity of heaven along with it. In the maintenance of this, there is a constant elevation; there is the complacency, I had almost said the pride, of a great moral victory over the infirmities of an earthly and accursed nature; there is a health and a harmony in the soul, a beauty of holiness which, though it efflouresces in the countenance, and the outward path, is itself so thoroughly internal, as to make purity of heart the most distinctive evidence of a work of grace in time—the most distinctive evidence of a character that is ripening and expanding for the glories of eternity."

[Thomas Chalmers, D. D.

THE GREAT SEA SERPENT.

The following description of this monster of the deep, which has been exhibited in New York for some time past, we take from the True Wesleyan:—

The skeleton was found in March last, by Dr. Koch, a German scientific gentleman, who was engaged in making Geological researches in the South Western States. It was found in Washington County, Alabama, about 18 miles from Tombigby River, on a high bluff 140 feet above the surface of the Tombigby Bay, and about 130 miles from the Gulf of Mexico. The skeleton was found embedded in a limestone rock, out of which it was chiseled, the rock cleaving from the bone as it was broken up. The bones are petrified, and yet they retain so much of the quality and appearance of bone, as to leave no ground for deception. We have not the least doubt that it is what it professes to be, a real skeleton.

The skeleton is now 114 feet long, and as the bones of animals formed for coiling and for great distortions of body, are not so closely joined in the joints as other animals, it must have been much longer. The joints, as found, were so removed from each other as to make about three inches space between them. This being added to the present length of the skeleton, with the bones all compact, would increase its length to from 135 to 140 feet; it could not have been less than 135 feet long when living, and clothed with flesh. It now measures 7 feet through from rib to rib, and as the bones are naked, the addition of a reasonable amount of flesh would increase this measurement to nine or ten feet. This calculation would make the animal girt, when alive, from 26 to 30 feet. At the forward part of the body, where it must be supposed the neck of the animal commenced, were two feet or paddles, one on each side. From the last joint of the tail, it appears that the tail was forked, or rather spread like that of a fish. This was doubtless a propelling and steering power, while the feet or paddles forward, were propelling and balancing powers.

We are pretty confident that this creature did not belong to the fish tribe, but whether it belonged to the snake or lizard tribe, our limited examination does not enable us to express an opinion with certainty. It was one or the other, or a distinct species between the two. It would be folly for us to moralize upon the strength and omnivorous capacity of such an animal; our readers will do this for themselves, taking for the basis of their calculations an animal from 130 to 140 feet in length, and girdling from twenty-five to thirty feet, with head, jaws, teeth, and all other bones in proportion, and eyes as large as a large cannon ball, as they doubtless were, from the cavities they filled. We cannot estimate the power of such an animal, but only wonder at its greatness.

Thus far we have spoken with certainty, but there are other questions which are uncertain, and on which learned men will differ. As it was obviously a water animal, how came it where its remains were found? The general answer will be that that whole country was once an ocean. But when did this creature live and sport amid the billows, and reign king of the waters? for such he must have been. He lived, and had his day, and died previous to the formation of the rock in which his bones were found. At what exhibition of divine power was it that the waters fled from that country, when the billows hasted away to return no more? What power upheaved that mighty rock, in which was embedded these monster remains? When was all this done? How long did these bones slumber there? These are questions which we confess ourself unable to answer with any degree of certainty. We will close these remarks with a brief description of the Great Leviathan taken from the book of Job. We are not sure that these are not the bones of the creature so fearfully described by the Almighty himself, and now unknown to man among living animals.

"In his neck remaineth strength, the flanks of his flesh are joined together, they are firm, they cannot be moved. His heart is as firm as a stone; yea, as hard as a piece of nether mill-stone. When he raiseth up himself the mighty are afraid; the sword of him that layeth at him cannot hold; the arrow cannot make him flee: sling stones are turned by him into stubble. Darts are counted as stubble: he laugheth at the shaking of a spear. He maketh the deep to boil like a pot: he maketh the sea like a pot of ointment. He maketh a path to shine after him, one would think the deep to be hoary. Upon earth there is not his like, he is king over all the children of pride."

An Athenian, who wanted eloquence, but who was an able and brave man, when one of his countrymen had, in a brilliant speech, promised great things, got up and said, "Men of Athens, all that he has said I will do!"

Miraculous Escape.

An English paper, the Western Times, relates the following incident:

Budleigh Salterton has been the scene of a most thrilling incident. Six infant children on Wednesday morning, got into a boat on the beach, and a mischievous boy shoved it off. The boat drifted away to sea before the children were missed. Terrible was the agony of the mothers when they knew it. The preventive men went off in all directions; every boat was on the look out till far into the night. Daylight returned, and still there were no tidings of the helpless children; the day wore away, and still nothing was heard of them—they were lost either in the expanse of the wide ocean, or buried within its insatiable depths. A Plymouth trawler, on Friday morning early, while fishing saw something floating at a distance; she bore down to it and discovered it to be a boat—and in the bottom six children cuddled together like a nest of birds fast asleep, God having mercifully given that blessed solace after a day of terror and despair. The trawler took them aboard, feasted them with bread and cheese, and gladdened their despairing little hearts with a promise to take them home. Between three and four in the afternoon the trawler was seen in the offing with the boat astern. All eyes were turned towards her; the best spy glass in the town was rubbed again and again, and at last they made out it was the identical boat. The news flew through the town—the mothers came frantic to the beach, for there were no children discerned in the boat; none to be seen in the sloop. Intense was the agony of suspense, and all alike shared it with the parents. At last the trawler came in, and the word went round, "they're all safe," and many stout hearted men burst into tears, women shrieked with joy and became almost frantic with their insupportable happiness. It was indeed a memorable day, and prayer, eloquent for its rough sincerity, was offered up to Almighty God, who in his infinite mercy, had spared these innocent children from the perils and terrors of the sea during that fearful night. Five of these children were under five years of age, the sixth is but nine years old.

THINGS TO BE THOUGHT OF BY MEN IN TRADE.

Credit should be sparingly given, and integrity the basis of it.

Guarantees should only be taken in writing, and a consideration always expressed therein.

The honor of an honest man, as far as dollars and cents goes, dies when he dies—therefore, honorable conditions in writing.

Lying won't stand, while truth is truth.

Rascals may flourish, but honest men will outstep them.

Wealth is desirable, if honestly acquired, and is blessed by contentment.

Prudence in promises is a fair guarantee in the redemption of them.

A genuine scoundrel is a man who, by his sanctity has obtained credit; and through religious professions, keeps back property from his legitimate creditors.

A burglar is a gentleman compared with a smooth-faced merchant robber.

Credit or confidence given to men of doubtful integrity, is an injustice done to all who hold on to their honesty.

Liberality should never be extended to the niggardly and deceptive.

Risk any thing before you risk your reputation.

Truth is a restorative, it saves the conscience, and keeps up a glow of happiness under all the workings of life.

AGE OF POETS.—Are poets destined to a long life? It is rarely the case that they live to the common age of man, although instances are on record, where they have lived to fourscore years and upwards. If manual exercise is united with close study, a man may lengthen his days to a good old age. It is the disregard of what produces ill health and endangers life, that cuts down so many talented men in the flower of their days.

RUM CONVICTIONS IN BRISTOL COUNTY.—At the recent session of the Court of Common Pleas, last week, at Taunton—Judge Ward on the Bench, there were a large number of trials, some of which were carried to the Supreme Court by exceptions—some continued, some plead guilty, and others resulted in convictions. The amount of fines, as we learn from the Dew Drop, was 310 dollars. The Dew Drop says—"In nearly all these cases, the witnesses were temperance men, and some of them testified from minutes which they made about the time the liquor was bought. The court, notwithstanding the bullying of the defendant's counsel, ruled that this evidence was admissible, and in his charge to the Jury said, that the fact that these witnesses bought for the purpose of prosecuting the rumsellers, should not tend (if their motive for so doing were as appeared from the evidence) to invalidate their testimony. On the other hand, they were to be commended for the course they had taken."

George Atwood, the person who brutally assaulted the Editor of the Dew Drop, for his fearless and manly endeavors to stop the rascally traffic in Taunton—was arraigned, retracted his plea of not guilty, and was sentenced to imprisonment in the county Jail for ten months. Atwood will probably let that Editor alone for the future.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

The Butterfly.

BY MRS. SIGOURNEY.

A butterfly basked on a baby's grave,
Where a lily had chanced to grow:
Why art thou here with thy gaudy dye?
Where she of the bright and sparkling eye
Must sleep in the church-yard low.

Then it lightly soared through the sunny air,
And spoke from its shining track:
I was a worm till I won my wings,
And she whom thou mournest like a seraph sings:
Would'st thou call the blest one back?

The Young Chimney Sweeper.

Baptist had attained his twelfth year; he could sweep a chimney very well; but, poor child, he could not read. Nobody had ever taken pains to teach him. His master was a good-natured man, but very ignorant, and had not a single book in his house.

One day, while Baptist was walking in the street, he happened to see several scholars about his own age, who, after being let loose from school, were amusing themselves by playing at marbles. This was his favorite play, and he stopped to look at them. Very soon something, quite new to him, attracted his attention; this was their books, ranged in a line against the wall. He took one of them up, and was turning over the leaves, when the boy to whom it belonged came to him, and, much displeased, asked him what he was doing. Baptist put his hand into his pocket, and taking out some marbles, presented them to the scholar, saying, "Pray do let me look at it while you play?" The request was granted, and he continued to turn over and over the leaves, without being able to understand any thing. When the play was finished he gave the book to its owner, and, with a timid air, taking another marble from his pocket, he gave it to him, saying, "I wish you could read me a little before going." The scholar consented.

Baptist had always a strong desire to learn to read, but knew not how to attain his object. He went daily to the playground adjoining the school, and waited for the little boy with whom he had become acquainted; and, entering into conversation with him, at length made a bargain that he should teach him to read, and that for every letter he taught him he would pay him a marble. He strove to get marbles to pay his teacher, and applied to his book so diligently, that in a few weeks he began to spell words of one syllable very well. One day, however, coming as usual to his lesson, his young teacher thus accosted him: "You little dirty fellow, I cannot teach you any more; my father and mother have scolded me because you have dirtied my book with your black hands." Poor Baptist little expected to see his hopes thus cut off: very different, however, from those idle children who are glad of any excuse not to learn their book, he offered immediately to give his little master two marbles instead of one, and promised that he would also wash his hands. But whether it was ill-nature, or fear of being scolded a second time, the boy refused the poor chimney-sweeper's offer. Baptist, discouraged and sorrowful, retired, having now lost all hope, till suddenly he recollected he had seen letters on the tomb-stones in the neighboring burying ground; "I shall not dirty them," cried he, and immediately returns to the scholars, and offers to pay, in marbles, any one who would undertake to teach him to read on the tomb-stones. The boys, struck with his desire of learning, promised to give him lessons turn about, which they did accordingly. Their pupil made so rapid a progress that they proposed to take him to a Sunday school. This he accepted with joy. The master, satisfied with his application, and affected by the desire to learn which the young chimney-sweeper constantly manifested, gave him lessons daily, of which Baptist so well profited that he was soon able both to read and write. No sooner had he received a Bible than he embraced the truth it contains; and this poor chimney-sweeper, who, without instruction, might have remained in ignorance and sin, thus became a good man, a pious Christian, beloved by his brethren, and blessed of God.

[London Child's Magazine.

"She Hath Done What She Could."

"She hath done what she could," said the Saviour, of one whose devotion to him, led her to the tomb of her crucified Lord, to watch for his resurrection. Young Christian, can that be said of you? "She hath done what she could!" O, how full of encouragement is the simple story of Mary's love, especially to the female disciple of the Saviour.

There lived in a little log hut, in the outskirts of a neighboring State, a girl of sixteen. The only means of instruction ever enjoyed by her, did not exceed six months, but her mind was awakened by an ardent desire for knowledge. After she had learned by heart the few books within her reach, she took the Bible, and though she had seldom heard the gospel preached, yet the spirit of God inspired her with wonder, as she read the story of a Saviour's love.—Her wonder was changed to penitence; she was humbled; she sought pardon; and with a sense of forgiveness, came the inquiry, what she, a poor, ignorant child, could do for her Saviour. She thought of her brothers, she read to them over and over again, the lessons she had learned from the Bible. She had heard of Sunday schools, and with a determination to establish one among the few neighbors in her vicinity, she persuaded her father to lend his kitchen for a school room. When the Sunday came, twenty poor, ignorant children, filled her room. Soon, her school increased; old men and middle aged came, and the youthful teacher was happy, yet with a trembling heart she persevered.

Years passed, and in place of scores, hundreds gathered in that school, each returning Lord's day, and it is now in the midst of a flourishing village. A neat church stands by the site of the old log kitchen, and the songs of Zion echo from its walls, and the voice of the gospel minister is heard from its pulpit, on the Lord's day. That teacher sleeps! Her pure spirit has gone to receive the blessed commendation—"She hath done what she could."

Yes, she has ceased from her labors; but mark the sequel! A brother who listened to the first lessons of holiness that trembled on her lips, is preparing for the Christian ministry; others are devoted, useful Christians, and one of the scholars is already on missionary ground. Verily, "She hath done what she could."

To every young Christian we would say, "Go and do likewise." But do you ask what you can do? Look around you.—Are your brothers and sisters better for your example? Are your companions looking to you for a pattern of holiness, or are you a stumbling-block, over which they will plunge into the abodes of the lost? Say, is your heart steeped in the love of Christ? Is it burning with a missionary spirit? You can be a missionary even where you are, in your own town, in your own neighborhood, for there are those all around you who seldom hear the sound of the gospel. Seek them out; bring them to Christ. Thus, you may bear fruit to the glory of God, and of you too, it may be said, "She hath done what she could,"—and your name will stand out emblazoned upon the firmament of the upper world, as with the rays of a celestial sun. Is not the very thought enough to startle the soul with a thrill of heavenly rapture?

The Little Girl and the Bear.

A farmer and his family lived on the borders of a large forest in Germany, where there were a great many bears and other wild beasts. The farmer kept several dogs to guard his house and yard, and all the cattle in his fields, from the attacks of these fierce animals. The most vigilant of them all was a very fine Newfoundland dog that was called Lion. This faithful creature never suffered one of them to come near the house; and if ever any of the family were out late, he was sent to meet them, and always found out which way they were gone, and guarded them home again.

The farmer had a little girl, who ran into the forest one day, without thinking of the danger of going there by herself. It was a fine afternoon; and she found so much amusement in gathering flowers, and in many other ways, that she staid till it began to grow dusk. When she perceived that it was getting dark she was very much frightened, and set out to run home; but as she had not taken notice which way she had come, she was quite at a loss what path to take. At last, after looking about and considering which way she ought to go, she took a path that she thought led to her father's house. But she soon found how foolish she had been not to mind more what she had been about for this path carried her further into the forest, where she saw a bear coming towards her. This sight alarmed her most terribly. She turned about, and ran as fast as she could; but still she heard the bear coming after her.

Just at the instant when the bear was almost close to her, she heard a dog bark, and the next moment saw Lion running towards her. The bear stopped when he heard the barking of the dog; but Lion perceiving him, flew at him immediately, and gave him such a bite that the bear ran away roaring with pain.

When the father and mother missed their child, they set Lion out after her; and he had followed every step where she had been in the forest till he found her.

Lion came back to the little girl when he had made the bear run away, and went directly into the shortest path to his master's house. She went along with him, and he kept close to her till they got safe home.

It was great joy to all the family to see the little girl again, for they had been very unhappy about her. Indeed, if it had not been for this sagacious faithful dog, she would certainly have been killed by the bear. [Juv. Wes.

The Sabbath Recorder.

EDITED BY GEORGE B. UTTER. "THE SEVENTH DAY IS THE SABBATH OF THE LORD THY GOD." PUBLISHED AT NO. 9 SPRUCE ST.

VOL. II—NO. 17. NEW YORK, FIFTH-DAY, OCTOBER 16, 1845. WHOLE NO. 69.

The Sabbath Recorder.

PECULIARITIES OF THE WALDENSES.

Selected for the Recorder from Jones' History of the Christian Church.

"The term simply signifies inhabitants of vallies, and no more." p. 299. "These vallies were principally situated among the Alps, which divide France from Italy, Switzerland, and Germany; and among the Pyrenees, which divide France from Spain." p. 242-3.

"From the borders of Spain throughout the greatest part of the south of France, among and below the Alps, along the Rhine, and even to Bohemia, thousands of the disciples of Christ were found, even in the very worst times, preserving the faith in its purity." p. 244.

"They were called Piedmontese, Albigenses, Leonists, and Vaudois; as they lived at the foot of the mountains, in the city of Alby, in the city of Lyons, or more remotely in the mountain vallies." p. 277.

"Perrin, who wrote their history, had in his possession a New Testament in the Vallese language, written on parchment in a very ancient letter; and a book entitled in their language, "Qual cosa sia l'anti-Christ?" that is, What is Anti-Christ? under the date of the year 1120. And another book, entitled "The Noble Lesson," is dated A. D. 1100." p. 301.

"Rhinerius Saccho, a popish inquisitor, and one of their most implacable enemies, admits that the Waldenses flourished 500 years before Waldo," (one of their pastors) which carries their history back to the early part of the eighth century. p. 301.

The following were some of their peculiarities:

"Whatever is preached without Scripture proof, they account no better than fable." "And affirm that the traditions of the church are no better than the traditions of the Pharisees; insisting, moreover, that greater stress is laid on the observance of human tradition, than on keeping the law of God." p. 317.

"They look upon a church built of stone as no better than a common barn, neither do they believe that God dwells there." "And affirm that the temple of God is the universe; and that to build churches, monasteries and oratories to him, under the supposition that the divine goodness could be more favorably found in them than in other places, is limiting the divine majesty." p. 318.

"They say we ought not to have any set form of prayer." p. 322.

"They celebrate the Eucharist in their houses, hold cups, and say that the corporal or cloth on which the host (or consecrated bread) is laid, is no holier than the cloth of their breeches." p. 317.

"They say that there is no difference as to rank and dignity among priests. That every one has liberty to preach or instruct." p. 318.

"They condemn watching with the dead by night, because of the folly and wickedness which are practiced on these occasions." p. 318.

"They say that the souls of the dead, immediately on their parting from the body, enter into happiness or misery." p. 322.

"They take the Old and New Testaments for the rule of their lives. And say that the Holy Scriptures contain all things necessary to our salvation; and that we are called to believe only what they teach, without any regard to the authority of man." p. 334.

"They admit all the sacraments instituted by Christ, and the ten commandments." p. 465.

"They say, those act against the first precept of the Decalogue, who believe the planets can control the free will of man. Against such the Apostle Paul says, "Ye observe days, and months, and times, and years; I am afraid of you, lest I have bestowed on you labor in vain." p. 334.

"Because they would not observe saints' days, they were falsely supposed to neglect the Sabbath also, and were called Insabbati, or Insabbathists." p. 300.

"On the contrary, they kept the Sabbath day, observed the ordinance of baptism according to the primitive church, instructed their children in the articles of the Christian faith, and the commandments of God." p. 338.

"In their lives and morals they are perfect, irreprehensible, and without reproach among men, addicting themselves with all their might to observe the commandments of God." p. 336.

"Luther says, he had found among them one thing worthy of admiration, that laying aside the doctrines of men, they meditated in the law of God day and night, and were well versed in the sacred scriptures." p. 342.

In 1823, an English clergyman named Gilly, visited the Vaudois in the valley of Perosa, making his journey thither by Turin, and had an interview with Mr. Peyrani, whom he calls the late moderator of the Vaudois valleys, who was then 70 years of age, and is since dead. He was the successor of a line of prelates whom tradition would extend to the Apostles themselves; and represents him as having a library amply supplied with books and parchments, and paper manuscripts accumulated by his ancestors. He conversed freely in the English, French, Latin, and Italian languages.—Of the pastor's labors he says:
